INTRODUCTION.

VERY soon after the Treaty of Peace, by which the Independence of the United States was recognised by the Government from which they had effected their separation, the want of a general superintending power over commerce, with the correlative power of taxation, was almost universally felt, and very generally deplored by the inhabitants of all the States, though not to the same extent in all.

It was easier to see the defect, and to feel the evils which flowed from it, than to provide the remedy. Intelligent citizens, however, soon busied themselves in devising the means of forming a Union, which should possess the requisite authority, and become the foundation of certain and durable prosperity.

Of the manner in which this desirable object was consummated, the following brief account is condensed from Marshall's Life of Washington, the most authentic history of that period :

While the advocates for Union were exerting themselves to impress its necessity on the public mind, measures were taken in Virginia, which, though originating in different views, terminated in a proposition for a general Convention to revise the state of the Union.

To form a compact relative to the navigation of the rivers Potomac and Pocomoke, and of part of the bay of Chesapeake, commissioners were appointed by the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, who assembled in Alexandria, in March, 1785. While at Mount Vernon on a visit, they agreed to propose to their respective Governments the appointment of other commissioners, with power to make conjoint arrangements, to which the assent of Congress was to be solicited, for maintaining a naval force in the Chesapeake; and to establish a tariff of duties on imports, to which the laws of both States should conform. When these propositions received the assent of the Legislature of Virginia, an additional resolution was passed, directing that which respected the duties on imports to be communicated to all the States in the Union, who were invited to send deputies to the meeting.

On the 21st of January, 1786, a few days after the passage of these resolutions, another was adopted by the same Legislature, appointing certain commissioners, "who were to meet such as might be appointed by the other States in the Union, at a time and place to be agreed on, to take into consideration the trade of the United States; to examine the relative situation and trade of the said States; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial relations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony; and to report to the several States such an act relative to this great object, as, when unanimously ratified by them, will enable the United States, in Congress assembled, effectually to provide for the same."

In the circular letter transmitting these resolutions to the respective States, Annapolis, in Maryland, was proposed as the place, and the ensuing September as the time, of meeting.

The Convention at Annapolis was attended by commissioners from only five States, [New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia.] These, after appointing Mr. Dickinson their Chairman, proceeded to discuss the objects for which they had convened. Perceiving that more ample powers would be required to effect the beneficial purposes which they contemplated, and hoping to procure a representation from a greater number of States, the Convention determined to rise without coming to any specific resolutions on the particular subject which had been referred to them. Previous to their adjournment, however, they agreed on a Report to be made to their respective States, in which they represented the necessity of extending the revision of the federal system to all its defects, and recommended that Deputies for that purpose be appointed by the several Legislatures, to meet in Convention in the city of Philadelphia, on the second day of the ensuing May.

The reasons for preferring a Convention to a discussion of this subject in Congress, were stated to be "that, in the latter body, it might be too much interrupted by the ordinary business before them, and would, besides, be deprived of the valuable counsels of sundry individuals who were disqualified by the constitution or laws of particular States, or by peculiar circumstances, from a seat in that assembly."

A copy of this Report was transmitted to Congress in a letter from the Chairman, stating the inefficacy of the Federal Government, and the necessity of devising such further provisions as would render it adequate to the exigencies of the Union.

On receiving this Report, the Legislature of Virginia passed an act for the appointment of Deputies, to meet such as might be appointed by other States; to assemble in Convention at Philadelphia, at the time, and for the purposes specified in the recommendation from the Convention which had met at Annapolis.

At the time and place appointed, the Representatives of twelve States convened. In Rhode Island alone, a spirit sufficiently hostile to every species of reform was found, to prevent the election of Deputies on an occasion so generally deemed momentous. Having unanimously chosen General WASHINGTON for their President, the Convention proceeded, with closed doors, to discuss the interesting and extensive subject submitted to their consideration.

On the 17th of September, the Constitution was presented to the American public. The instrument, with its accompanying resolutions, was, by the unanimous order of the Convention, transmitted to Congress in the following letter:

IN CONVENTION, September 17, 1787.

SIR: We have now the honor to submit to the consideration of the United States in Congress assembled, that Constitution which has appeared to us the most advisable.

The friends of our country have long seen and desired that the power of making war, peace, and treaties, that of levying money, and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union; but the impropriety of delegating such extensive trust to one body of men is evident: hence results the necessity of a different organization.

It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance, as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be preserved; and, on the present occasion, this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests.

In all our deliberations on this subject, we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American, the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety—perhaps our national existence. This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the Convention to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude than might have been otherwise expected; and thus, the Constitution which we now present is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession, which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable.

That it will meet the full and entire approbation of every State is not, perhaps, to be expected; but each will, doubtless, consider, that had her interest alone been consulted, the consequences might have been particularly disagreeable or injurious to others; that it is liable to as few exceptions as could reasonably have been expected, we hope and believe; that it may promote the lasting welfare of that country so dear to us all, and secure her freedom and happiness, is our most ardent wish.

With great respect, we have the honor to be, sir, your excellency's most obedient and humble servants. By the unanimous order of the Convention.

GEO. WASHINGTON, President.

Congress resolved, unanimously, that the Report, with the letter accompanying it, be transmitted to the several Legislatures, in order to be submitted to a Convention of Delegates chosen in each State by the People thereof.

After a discussion of the Constitution in the Conventions of the several States, during which its ultimate fate hung for some time in dubious and painful suspense, the Conventions of eleven out of the thirteen States assented to, and ratified the Constitution in the following form:

INTRODUCTION.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES,

AS ORIGINALLY ADOPTED.*

WE, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

1. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION 2.

1. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

2. No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

3. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall be directed by law. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three; Massachusetts eight; Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one; Connecticut five; New York six; New Jersey four; Pennsylvania eight; Delaware one; Maryland six; Virginia ten; North Carolina five; South Carolina five; and Georgia three.

4. When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

5. The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker, and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SECTION 3.

1. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

2. Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided, as equally as may be, into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

3. No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

4. The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

5. The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

6. The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

7. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

* The Amendments subsequently adopted, and which are now a part of the Constitution, will be found in the Appendix, at the close of this volume.

INTRODUCTION.

SECTION 4.

1. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make, or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SECTION 5.

1. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

2. Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

3. Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment request secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House, on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

4. Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

SECTION 6.

1. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to or returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

2. No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

SECTION 7.

1. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

2. Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and, if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the person voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

3. Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

SECTION 8.

The Congress shall have power—

1. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States;

2. To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

3. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;

4. To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States;

5. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;

6. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;

INTRODUCTION.

7. To establish post offices and post roads;
8. To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;
9. To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations;
10. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;
11. To raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;
12. To provide and maintain a navy;
13. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;
14. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;
15. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;
16. To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings; and,
17. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

SECTION 9.

1. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight; but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person.
2. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.
3. No bill of attainder, or ex post facto law, shall be passed.
4. No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.
5. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State; no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.
6. No money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.
7. No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

SECTION 10.

1. No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts; or grant any title of nobility.
2. No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States, and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress. No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II.—SECTION 1.

1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:
2. Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.
3. The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the House of Representatives. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose, by ballot, one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list, the said House shall, in like manner, choose the President. But, in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them, by ballot, the Vice President.

4. The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

5. No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

6. In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President; and the Congress may, by law, provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President; and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

7. The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

8. Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION 2.

1. The President shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices; and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

2. He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

3. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

SECTION 3.

1. He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and, in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

SECTION 4.

1. The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III.—SECTION 1.

1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, in both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

SECTION 2.

1. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

2. In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

3. The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

SECTION 3.

1. Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

2. The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

ARTICLE IV.—SECTION 1.

1. Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

SECTION 2.

1. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

2. A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

3. No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

SECTION 3.

1. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

2. The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SECTION 4.

1. The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

ARTICLE V.

1. The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

INTRODUCTION.

ARTICLE VI.

1. All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.

2. This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII.

1. The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

Done in Convention, by the unanimous consent of the States present, the seventeenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, and of the independence of the United States of America the twelfth. In witness whereof we have hereunto subscribed our names.

The preparatory measures having been taken for bringing the Constitution into operation, and the necessary elections of Representatives, Senators, President, and Vice President, having been held, nothing remained to start it into life but the assembly and organization of the two Houses of Congress.

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK, MARCH 4, 1789,

UNDER THE CONSTITUTION SUBMITTED BY THE FEDERAL CONVENTION IN PHILADELPHIA, SEPTEMBER 17, 1787.

[This seems to be a proper place to notice a fact, which is necessary to account for the meagreness of the report of the Senate proceedings in the earlier days of the Government, viz: that the Legislative as well as Executive sittings of the Senate were held with closed doors until the second session of the third Congress, with the single exception of the discussion of the contested election of A. GALLATIN, as Senator from Pennsylvania, during which discussion the galleries were opened by a special order of the Senate. On the 20th February, 1794, the Senate came to a resolution that, after the end of that session of Congress, the galleries of the Senate should be permitted to be opened whilst the Senate should be engaged in its Legislative capacity, unless specially ordered otherwise. This, it will be perceived, was an important change in the constitution of the Senate.]

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1789.

This being the day for the meeting of the new Congress, the following members of the Senate appeared and took their seats:

From New Hampshire, JOHN LANGDON and PAINE WINGATE.
From Massachusetts, CALEB STRONG.
From Connecticut, WILLIAM S. JOHNSON and OLIVER ELLSWORTH.
From Pennsylvania, WILLIAM MACLAY and ROBERT MORRIS.

From Georgia, WILLIAM FEW.

The members present not being a quorum, they adjourned from day day to day, until

WEDNESDAY, March 11.

When the same members being present as on the 4th instant, it was agreed that a circular should be written to the absent members, requesting their immediate attendance.

THURSDAY, March 12.

No additional members appearing, the members present adjourned from day to day, until

WEDNESDAY, March 18.

When no additional members appearing, it was agreed that another circular should be written to eight of the nearest absent members, particularly desiring their attendance, in order to form a quorum.

THURSDAY, March 19.

FRIDAY, March 20.

No additional member appeared.

SATURDAY, March 21.

RICHARD BASSETT, from Delaware, appeared and took his seat.

A sufficient number of members to form a quorum not appearing, the members present adjourned from day to day, until

SATURDAY, March 28.

JONATHAN ELMER, from New Jersey, appeared and took his seat.

No other member appearing, an adjournment took place from day to day, until

MONDAY, April 6.

RICHARD HENRY LEE, from Virginia, then appearing, took his seat, and formed a quorum of the whole Senators of the United States.

The credentials of the members present being read and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceded, by ballot, to the choice of a President, for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. ELLSWORTH inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates, and counting the votes of the Electors of the several States in the choice of a President; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

Mr. ELLSWORTH reported that he had delivered the message; and Mr. BOURNOR, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the Electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The Speaker and the members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber; and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes, declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which were as follows:

That Mr. ELLSWORTH, PATERSON, MACLAY, STRONG, LEE, BASSETT, FEW, and WINGATE, were appointed a committee to bring in a bill for organizing the Judiciary of the United States.

Messrs. ELLSWORTH, LEE, STRONG, MACLAY, and BASSETT, were appointed a committee to prepare rules for the government of the two Houses in cases of conference, and to take under consideration the manner of electing Chaplains, and to confer thereupon with a committee of the House of Representatives.

The same committee were also to prepare rules for conducting the business of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, April 8.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for a Secretary, and SAMUEL ALYX OTIS, Esq., was elected.

Cornelius Maxwell was appointed Messenger.

THURSDAY, April 9.

Messrs. LANGDON, JOHNSON, and FEW, were appointed a committee to make arrangements for receiving the President, and were empowered to confer with any committee of the House of Representatives that may be appointed for that purpose.

MONDAY, April 13.

RALPH IZARD, from South Carolina, CHARLES CARROLL, from Maryland, and GEORGE REED, from Delaware, appeared and took their seats.

The report of the committee to prepare rules for conducting the business of the Senate was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Messrs. JOHNSON, IZARD, and MACLAY, were appointed a committee to confer with any committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, upon the future disposition of the papers in the office of the late Secretary of Congress, and report thereon.

The committee appointed to make arrangements for receiving the President, were directed to settle the manner of receiving the Vice President also.

ments for receiving the President, were directed to settle the manner of receiving the Vice President also.

Mr. CARROLL and Mr. IZARD were added to the Judiciary Committee.

TUESDAY, April 14.

TRISTRAM DALTON, from Massachusetts, appeared and took his seat.

A letter was written to the Mayor of the city of New York, by the President of the Senate, acknowledging the respect shown to the Government, and accepting of the offer made by him of the City Hall for the use of Congress.

WEDNESDAY, April 15.

The committee appointed the 7th of April, to prepare a system of rules to govern the two Houses in cases of conference, to take into consideration the manner of electing Chaplains, and to confer thereon with a committee of the House of Representatives, reported:

That they had conferred with a committee of the House of Representatives, for that purpose appointed. Whereupon,

Resolved, That, in every case of an amendment to a bill agreed to in one House and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient time, to be agreed on by their chairman, meet in the conference chamber, and state to each other verbally, or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon.

The committee above mentioned, further reported:

That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, the Senate to appoint one, and give notice thereof to the House of Representatives, who shall, thereupon, appoint the other; which Chaplains shall commence their services in the Houses that appoint them, but shall interchange weekly.

Which was also accepted.

The committee to whom it was referred to consider of, and report respecting the ceremonial of receiving the President, and the arrangements necessary for the reception of the Vice President, agreed to the following report, viz:

That Mr. Osgood, the proprietor of the house lately occupied by the President of Congress, be requested to put the same, and the furniture thereof, in proper condition for the residence and use of the President of the United States, and otherwise, at the expense of the United States, to provide for his temporary accommodation.

That it will be more eligible, in the first instance, that a committee of three members from the Senate, and five members from the House of Representatives, and be appointed by the two Houses respectively, attend to receive the President, at such place as he shall embark from New Jersey to this city, and conduct him, without form, to the house lately occupied by the President.

side of Congress; and that, at such time thereafter as the President shall signify it will be most convenient for him, he be formally received by both Houses.

That a committee of two members from the Senate, and three members from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Houses respectively, as soon as the Vice President of the United States, as soon as he shall come to this city, and, in the name of the Congress of the United States, congratulate him on his arrival.

Which report was read and accepted.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee upon rules for conducting the business of the Senate, and, after some progress, adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, April 16.

The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of the committees, conformably to the report of the committee of both Houses, agreed to on the 15th instant: Mr. LANGDON, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. JOHNSON, were appointed to wait on the President, and Mr. ELLSWORTH, and Mr. DALTON, were appointed to wait on the Vice President.

Ordered, That Mr. STRONG, Mr. IZARD, and Mr. LEE, be a committee to report a mode of communication to be observed between the Senate and House of Representatives with respect to papers, bills, and messages, and to confer thereon with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives for that purpose.

The report of the committee appointed to determine upon rules for conducting business in the Senate, was agreed to. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the following rules, from No. I to XIX, inclusive, be observed:

I. The President having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the journal of the preceding day shall be read, to the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall have been made in the entries.

II. No member shall speak to another, or otherwise interrupt the business of the Senate, or read any printed paper while the journals or public papers are reading, or when any member is speaking in any debate.

III. Every member, when he speaks, shall address the chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished, shall sit down.

IV. No member shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day, without leave of the Senate.

V. When two members rise at the same time, the President shall name the person to speak; but in all cases the member first rising shall speak first.

VI. No motion shall be debated until the same shall be seconded.

VII. When a motion shall be made and seconded, it shall be reduced to writing, if desired by the President, or any member, delivered in at the table, and read by the President before the same shall be debated.

VIII. While a question is before the Senate, no motion shall be received unless for an amendment.

for the previous question, or for postponing the main question, or to commit it, or to adjourn.

IX. The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the chair shall be: "Shall the main question be now put?" And if the yeas prevail, the main question shall not then be put.

X. If a question in debate contain several points, any member may have the same divided.

XI. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the members present, each member called upon shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare, openly and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question. In taking the yeas and nays, and upon the call of the House, the names of the members shall be taken alphabetically.

XII. One day's notice at least shall be given of an intended motion for leave to bring in a bill.

XIII. Every bill shall receive three readings previous to its being passed; and the President shall give notice at each, whether it be the first, second, or third; which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise.

XIV. No bill shall be committed or amended until it shall have been twice read, after which it may be referred to a committee.

XV. All committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice.

XVI. When a member shall be called to order, he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not; and every question of order shall be decided by the President, without debate; but, if there be a doubt in his mind, he may call for the sense of the Senate.

XVII. If a member be called to order for words spoken, the exceptionable words shall be immediately taken down in writing, that the President may be better enabled to judge of the matter.

XVIII. When a blank is to be filled, and different sums shall be proposed, the question shall be taken on the highest sum first.

XIX. No member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained.

FRIDAY, April 17.

The petition of Leonard Bleecker, to be appointed Sergeant-at-arms, was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SATURDAY, April 18.

A letter from the Speaker of the House to the President was read, enclosing a concurrence of the House, with the resolve of Senate of the 15th, upon the mode of conference between the Senate and House of Representatives; also, a concurrence upon the mode of choosing Chaplains.

On motion,

Resolved, That the following be subjoined to the standing orders of the Senate:

XX. Before any petition or memorial, addressed to the Senate, shall be received and read at the table, whether the same shall be introduced by the President or a member, a brief statement of the contents of the petition or memorial shall verbally be made by the introducer.

MONDAY, April 20.

JOHN HENRY, from Maryland, and JAMES GUNN, from Georgia, appeared and took their seats.

Messrs. STRONG and IZARD were appointed a committee to wait on the Vice President, and conduct him to the Senate Chamber.

TUESDAY, April 21.

The committee appointed to conduct the Vice President to the Senate Chamber, executed their commission, and Mr. LANGDON, the Vice President pro tempore, meeting the Vice President on the floor of the Senate Chamber, addressed him as follows:

Sir: I have it in charge from the Senate to introduce you to the Chair of this House; and, also, to congratulate you on your appointment to the office of Vice President of the United States of America.

After which Mr. LANGDON conducted the Vice President to the Chair, when the Vice President addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Invited to this respectable situation by the suffrages of our fellow-citizens, according to the Constitution, I have thought it my duty cheerfully and readily to accept it. Unaccustomed to refuse any public service, however dangerous to my reputation, or disproportionate to my talents it would have been inconsistent to have adopted another maxim of conduct at this time, when the prosperity of the country, and the liberties of the people, require, perhaps, as much as ever, the attention of those who possess any share of the public confidence.

I should be destitute of sensibility, if, upon my arrival in this city, and presentation to this Legislature, and especially to this Senate, I could see, without emotion, so many of those characters, of whose virtuous exertions I have so often been a witness—from whose countenances and examples I have ever derived encouragement and animation; whose disinterested friendship has supported me, in many intricate conjunctures of public affairs, at home and abroad; those celebrated defenders of the liberties of this country, whom menaces could not intimidate, corruption seduce, or flattery allure: those intrepid assertors of the rights of mankind, whose philosophy and policy have enlightened the world, in twenty years, more than it was ever before enlightened in many centuries, by ancient schools, or modern universities.

I must have been inattentive to the course of events, if I were either ignorant of the fame, or insensible to the merit of those other characters in the Senate, to whom it has been my misfortune to have been hitherto personally unknown.

It is with satisfaction that I congratulate the people of America on the formation of a national Constitution, and the fair prospect of a consistent administration of a government of laws; on the acquisition of a House of Representatives, chosen by themselves; of a Senate thus composed by their own State Legislatures; and on the prospect of an Executive authority, in the hands of one whose portrait I shall not presume to draw. Were I blessed with powers to do justice to his character, it would be impossible to increase the confidence or affection of his country, or make the smallest addition to his glory. This can only be effected by a discharge of the present exalted trust on the same principles, with the same abilities and virtues, which have uniformly appeared in all his former conduct, public or private. May I, nevertheless, be indulged to inquire, if we look over the catalogue of the first magistrates of nations, whether they have been denominated Presidents or Consuls, Kings or Princes, where shall we find one, whose commanding talents and virtues, whose over-ruling good fortune, have so completely united all hearts and voices in his favor! who enjoyed the esteem and admiration of foreign nations and fellow-citizens with equal unanimity! Qualities so uncommon, are no common blessings to the country that possesses them. By those great qualities, and their benign effects, has Providence marked out the head of this nation, with a hand so distinctly visible, as to have been seen by all men, and mistaken by none.

It is not for me to interrupt your deliberations by any general observations on the state of the nation, or by recommending or proposing any particular measure. It would be superfluous, to gentlemen of your great experience, to urge the necessity of order. It is only necessary to make an apology for myself. Not wholly without experience in public assemblies, I have been more accustomed to take a share in their debates, than to preside in their deliberations. It shall be my constant endeavor to behave towards every member of this most honorable body with all that consideration, delicacy, and decorum, which becomes the dignity of his station and character; but if, from inexperience or inadvertency, any thing should ever escape me inconsistent with propriety, I must entreat you, by imputing it to its true cause, and not to any want of respect, to pardon and excuse it.

A trust of the greatest magnitude is committed to this Legislature; and the eyes of the world are upon you. Your country expects, from the results of your deliberations, in concurrence with the other branches of Government, consideration abroad, and contentment at home—prosperity, order, justice, peace, and liberty. And may God Almighty's Providence assist you to answer their just expectations.

WEDNESDAY, April 22.

Saturday next was assigned for proceeding to elect a Chaplain.

The petition of William Finnie to be appointed Sergeant-at-arms, was read and laid on the table.

THURSDAY, April 23.

The committee appointed on the 16th of April, to report a mode of communication to be observed between the Senate and House of Representatives, with respect to papers, bills, and messages, and to confer thereon with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives for that purpose, have conferred with a committee of the House, and have agreed to the following report:

When a bill or other message shall be sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it shall be carried by the Secretary, who shall make one obeisance to the Chair, on entering the door of the House of Representatives, and another on delivering it at the table into the hands of the Speaker. After he shall have delivered it, he shall make an obeisance to the Speaker, and repeat it as he retires from the House.

When a bill shall be sent up by the House of Representatives to the Senate, it shall be carried by two members, who, at the bar of the Senate, shall make their obeisance to the President, and thence, advancing to the Chair, make a second obeisance, and deliver it into the hands of the President. After having delivered the bill, they shall make their obeisance to the President, and repeat it as they retire from the bar. The Senate shall rise on the entrance of the members within the bar, and continue standing until they retire.

All other messages from the House of Representatives shall be carried by one member, who shall make his obeisance as above mentioned; but the President of the Senate, alone, shall rise.

Read and accepted.

On motion,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members, be appointed to consider and report, what style or titles it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and Vice President of the United States; if any other than those given in the Constitution. Also, to consider of the time, place, and manner, in which, and the person by whom, the oath prescribed by the Constitution shall be administered to the President; and to confer thereon with such committee as the House of Representatives shall appoint for that purpose. [Mr. LEE, Mr. IZARD, and Mr. DALTON, were chosen.]

FRIDAY, April 24.

On motion, to reconsider the commission of the committee appointed the 23d instant, to report what titles shall be annexed to the offices of President and Vice President. Passed in the affirmative.

On motion, that the following words, "What titles it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and of Vice President of the United States; if any other than those given in the Constitution," be struck out. Passed in the negative.

On motion, that the words "style or" before the word "title," be added. Passed in the affirmative.

SATURDAY, April 25.

The Right Reverend SAMUEL PROVOST was elected Chaplain.

A letter from CHARLES THOMSON, Esq., dated the 24th of April, 1789, directed to the President of the Senate, purporting his having delivered to General WASHINGTON the certificate of his being elected President of the United States, was read, and ordered to be filed.

ment of the United States, and to confer with a committee of the House appointed for that purpose, report:

That the President hath been pleased to signify to them, that any time or place which both Houses may think proper to appoint, and any manner which shall appear most eligible to them, will be convenient and acceptable to him; that requisite preparations cannot probably be made before Thursday next; that the President be on that day formally received by both Houses in the Senate Chamber; that the Representatives' Chamber being capable of receiving the greater number of persons, that, therefore, the President do take the oath in that place, and in the presence of both Houses. That, after the formal reception of the President in the Senate Chamber, he be attended by both Houses to the Representatives' Chamber, and that the oath be administered by the Chancellor of the State of New York.

The committee further report it as their opinion, that it will be proper that a committee of both Houses be appointed to take order for conducting the business.

Read and accepted.

Whereupon, Mr. LEE, Mr. IZARD, and Mr. DALTON, on the part of the Senate, together with a committee that may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, were empowered to take order for conducting the business.

An order of the House of Representatives, concurring in the appointment of a committee on their part to confer with a committee appointed on the 24th instant, on the part of the Senate, to consider and report, "what style, &c., it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and Vice President," was read, by which it appeared, that Mr. BENSON, Mr. AMES, Mr. MAISON, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. SHERMAN, were appointed on the part of the House.

The committee appointed to take order for conducting the ceremonial of the formal reception, &c., of the President, reported:

That it appears to them more eligible that the oath should be administered to the President in the outer gallery adjoining the Senate Chamber, than in the Representatives' Chamber, and, therefore, submit to the respective Houses the propriety of authorizing their committee to take order as to the place where the oath shall be administered to the President, the resolution of Saturday assigning the Representatives' Chamber as the place, notwithstanding. [Read and accepted.]

Resolved, That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, he, attended by the Vice President, and members of the Senate and House of Representatives, proceed to St. Paul's Chapel, to hear divine service, to be performed by the Chaplain of Congress already appointed. [Sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.]

nial to be observed in administering the oath, &c., to the President; and a bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths. The report was read and ordered to lie on the table; and the bill received its first reading.

The committee appointed to report a mode of communication between the two Houses with respect to papers, bills, &c., and to whom the subject was committed, having again conferred with the committee of the House of Representatives, agreed upon a report, which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, April 29.

The Senate proceeded to the second reading of the bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths; and, after debate, it was committed to Messrs. STRONG, PATERSON, REED, JOHNSON, and HENRY.

A letter from the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Vice President, was read, communicating the concurrence of the House on a report of a joint committee, on the mode of communicating papers, bills, and messages, between the Senate and House of Representatives:

Also, the concurrence of the House with the Senate, on the appointment of a committee respecting the future disposition of the papers in the office of the late Secretary; and Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. CADWALLADER, and Mr. JACKSON, were joined.

THURSDAY, April 30.

The report of the committee on the mode of communication between the Senate and House of Representatives, was taken up, and, after debate, postponed.

Mr. LEE, in behalf of the committee appointed to take order for conducting the ceremonial of the formal reception, &c., of the President of the United States, having informed the Senate that the same was adjusted, the House of Representatives were notified that the Senate were ready to receive them in the Senate Chamber, to attend the President of the United States, while taking the oath required by the Constitution. Whereupon, the House of Representatives, preceded by their Speaker, came into the Senate Chamber, and took the seats assigned them, and the joint committee, preceded by their Chairman, agreeably to order, introduced the President of the United States to the Senate Chamber, where he was received by the Vice President, who conducted him to the Chair, when the Vice President informed him, that "the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States were ready to attend him to take the oath required by the Constitution, and that it would be administered by the Chancellor of the State of New York." To which the President replied, he was ready to proceed; and being attended to the gallery in front of the Senate Chamber, by the Vice President and Senators, the Speaker and Representatives, and the other public characters present, the oath was administered. After which, the Chancellor proclaimed, "Long live George Washington, President of the United States!"

The President, having returned to his seat, after a short pause arose, and addressed the Senate and House of Representatives as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Among the vicissitudes incident to life, no event could have filled me with greater anxieties than that of which the notification was transmitted by your order, and received on the 14th day of the present month. On the one hand, I was summoned by my country, whose voice I can never hear but with veneration and love, from a retreat which I had chosen with the fondest predilection, and, in my flattering hopes, with an immutable decision, as the asylum of my declining years; a retreat which was rendered every day more necessary, as well as more dear to me, by the addition of habit to inclination, and of frequent interruptions in my health, to the gradual waste committed on it by time. On the other hand, the magnitude and difficulty of the trust to which the voice of my country called me, being sufficient to awaken in the wisest and most experienced of her citizens a distrustful scrutiny into his qualifications, could not but overwhelm with despondence one, who, inheriting inferior endowments from nature, and unpractised in the duties of civil administration, ought to be peculiarly conscious of his own deficiencies. In this conflict of emotions, all I dare aver is, that it has been my faithful study to collect my duty from a just appreciation of every circumstance by which it might be effected. All I dare hope is, that if, in executing this task, I have been too much swayed by a grateful remembrance of former instances, or by an affectionate sensibility to this transcendent proof of the confidence of my fellow-citizens, and have thence too little consulted my incapacity as well as disinclination for the weighty and untried cares before me, my error will be palliated by the motives which misled me, and its consequences be judged by my country, with some share of the partiality in which they originated.

Such being the impressions under which I have, in obedience to the public summons, repaired to the present station, it would be peculiarly improper to omit, in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe—who presides in the councils of nations—and whose providential aids can supply every human defect—that his benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States, a Government instituted by themselves, for these essential purposes: and may enable every instrument employed in its administration to execute with success the functions allotted to his charge. In tendering this homage to the Great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own, nor those of my fellow-citizens at large less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency; and in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their united Government, the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities from which the event has resulted, cannot be compared with the means by which most Governments have been established, without some return of pious gratitude, along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seems to presage. These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking, that there are none under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free Government can more auspiciously commence.

By the article establishing the Executive department, it is made the duty of the President "to recommend to your consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." The circumstances under which I now meet you will acquit me from entering into that subject, further than to refer to the great Constitutional charter under which you are assembled, and which, in defining your powers, designates the objects to which your attention is to be given. It will be more consistent with those circumstances, and far more congenial with the feelings which actuate me, to substitute, in place of a recommendation of particular measures, the tribute that is due to the talents, the rectitude, and the patriotism, which adorn the characters selected to devise and adopt them. In these honorable qualifications, I behold the surest pledges, that, as on one side no local prejudices or attachments, no separate views, nor party animosities, will misdirect the comprehensive and equal eye which ought to watch over this great assemblage of communities and interests; so, on another, that the foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality, and the pre-eminence of free Government be exemplified by all the attributes which can win the affections of its citizens, and command the respect of the world. I dwell on this prospect with every satisfaction which an ardent love for my country can inspire: since there is no truth more thoroughly established, than that there exists, in the economy and course of nature, an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness; between duty and advantage; between the genuine maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy, and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity: since we ought to be no less persuaded that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which Heaven itself has ordained; and since the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty, and the destiny of the republican model of Government, are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally, staked, on the experiment entrusted to the hands of the American people.

Besides the ordinary objects submitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution, is rendered expedient at the present juncture, by the nature of objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them. Instead of undertaking particular recommendations on this subject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your discernment and pursuit of the public good: for, I assure myself, that whilst you carefully avoid every alteration which might endanger the benefits of a united and effective Government, or which ought to await the future lessons of experience; a reverence for the characteristic rights of freemen, and a regard for the public harmony, will sufficiently influence your deliberations on the question, how far the former can be more imprudently forfeited, or the latter be safely and advantageously promoted.

To the preceding observations I have one to add, which will be most properly addressed to the House of Representatives. It concerns myself, and will, therefore, be as brief as possible. When I was first honored with a call into the service of my country, then on the eve of an arduous struggle for its liberties, the light in which I contemplated my duty required that I should renounce every pecuniary compensation. From this resolution I have in no instance departed. And being still under the impressions which produced it, I must decline, as inapplicable to myself, any share in the personal emoluments which may be indispensably included in a permanent provision for the Executive department; and must accordingly pray that the pecuniary estimates for the station in which I am placed may, during my continuance in it, be limited to such actual expenditures as the public good may be thought to require.

Having thus imparted to you my sentiments, as they have been awakened by the occasion which brings us together, I shall take my present leave; but not without resorting once more to the benign Parent of the human race, in humble supplication, that, since He has been pleased to favor the American people with opportunities for deliberating in perfect tranquility, and dispositions for deciding with unparalleled unanimity on a form of Government for the security of their Union, and the advancement of their happiness, so his divine blessing may be equally conspicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate consultations, and the wise measures on which the success of this Government must depend.

G. WASHINGTON.

April 30, 1789.

The President, the Vice President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, &c. then proceeded to St. Paul's Chapel, where divine service was performed by the Chaplain of Congress, after which the President was reconducted to his house by the committee appointed for that purpose.

The Vice President and Senate returned to the Senate Chamber; and Upon motion, unanimously agreed, That a committee of three should be appointed to prepare an answer to the President's Speech. Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. PATERSON, and Mr. CARROLL, were elected.

FRIDAY, May 1.

The report of the joint committee, to whom was recommended the mode of communication between the Senate and House of Representatives, as made by the committee on the part of the Senate, was taken up, and not accepted.

The same report of the committee on the part of the House, and the acceptance thereof by the House, was considered in the Senate, and it was determined that it should lie until further order.

A motion, "That, when a messenger shall come from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and shall be announced by the door-keeper, the messenger shall be received at the bar of this House by the Secretary, and the bill or paper that he may bring shall there be received from him by the Secretary, who shall deliver it to the President of the Senate," was committed to Mr. ELLSWORTH, Mr. LEE, and Mr. READ.

And the committee were instructed to report a mode of sending papers, bills, and messages, from the Senate to the House of Representatives.

SATURDAY, May 2.

Agreed, That, until a permanent mode of communication shall be adopted between the Senate and House of Representatives, the Senate will receive messages by the Clerk of the House, if the House shall think proper to send him; and the Secretary at the bar of the Senate, and by him be conveyed to the President.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BECKLEY, their Clerk, brought to the Senate the proceedings of the House on a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ult.; also, communicated the appointment of the Rev. WM. LYNS, D. D., one of the Chaplains of Congress.

Mr. SWANE, from the committee to whom the bill from the House of Representatives was referred, to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths, reported sundry amendments thereto, which were assigned for consideration on Monday next.

MONDAY, May 4.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths.

In line 1, strike out the words "Congress of the United States," and insert, "Senate and Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled."

At the end of the second paragraph, add the words "of the Senate," and insert the following clause: "And be it further enacted, That the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several States, who have been heretofore chosen or appointed, or who shall be chosen or appointed before the first day of August next, and who shall then be in office, shall, within one month thereafter, take the same oath or affirmation, except where they shall have taken it before; which may be administered by any person authorized by the law of the State in which such office shall be held to administer oaths. And the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several States, who shall be chosen or appointed after the said first day of August, shall, before they proceed to execute the duties of their respective offices, take the foregoing oath or affirmation, which shall be administered by the person or persons, who, by the law of the State, shall be authorized to administer the oath of office; and the person or persons so administering the oath hereby required to be taken, shall cause a record or certificate thereof to be made, in the same manner as, by the law of the State, he or they shall be directed to record or certify the oath of office."

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

In the last paragraph, strike out the words "of the United States of America," in the third and fourth lines, and insert the same words in the fourth line next after the words "as the case may be;" and which, being accepted, Tuesday morning, 11 o'clock, was assigned for the third reading of the bill.

TUESDAY, May 5.

The bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths was read the third time, and passed with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary carry the aforementioned bill to the House of Representatives, together with the amendments, and address the Speaker in the words following:

"SIR: The Senate have passed the bill entitled 'An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths,' with amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of your House."

Ordered, That when a bill has passed the Senate the Secretary shall endorse the final determination thereon, and the day when such final determination was taken, previous to its being transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Adjourned to Thursday morning.

THURSDAY, May 7.

The committee appointed to confer with such committee as might be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to report what style or titles it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, if any other than those given in the Constitution, reported.

Which report was ordered to lie for consideration.

The report of the committee upon the motion committed May 1st was considered, and the first paragraph thereof accepted; whereupon,

Ordered, That, when a messenger shall come from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and shall be announced by the door-keeper, the messenger or messengers being a member or members of the House, shall be received within the bar, the President rising when the message is by one member, and the Senate also when it is by two or more; if the messenger be not a member of the House, he shall be received at the bar by the Secretary, and the bill or papers that he may bring shall there be received from him by the Secretary, and be by him delivered to the President.

The committee appointed to prepare an answer to the President's Speech, delivered to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, reported as follows:

SIR: We, the Senate of the United States, return you our sincere thanks for your excellent Speech delivered to both houses of Congress; congratulate you on the complete organization of the Federal Government; and felicitate ourselves and our fellow-citizens on your elevation to the office of President—an office highly important by the powers constitutionally annexed to it, and extremely honorable from the manner in which the appointment is made. The unanimous suffrage of the elective body in your favor, is peculiarly expressive of the gratitude, confidence, and affection of the citizens of America, and is the highest testimonial at once of your merit and their esteem. We are sensible, sir, that nothing but the voice of your fellow-citizens could have called you from a retreat chosen with the fondest predilection, endeared by habit, and consecrated to the repose of declining years. We re-joice, and with us all America, that, in obedience to the call of our common country, you have returned once more to public life. In you all parties confide; in you all interests unite; and we have no doubt that your past services, great as they have been, will be equalled by your future exertions; and that your prudence and sagacity as a statesman will tend to avert the dangers to which we are exposed, to give stability to the present Government, and dignity and splendor to that country which your skill and valor as a soldier so eminently contributed to raise to independence and empire.

When we contemplate the coincidence of circumstances, and wonderful combination of causes, which gradually prepared the people of this country for independence; when we contemplate the rise, progress, and termination of the late war, which gave them a name among the nations of the earth; we are, with you, unavoidably led to acknowledge and adore the great Author of the universe, by whom empires rise and fall. A review of the many signal instances of divine interposition in favor of this country claims our most pious gratitude; and permit us, sir, to observe that, among the great events which have led to the formation and establishment of a Federal Government, we esteem most auspicious and important

In the execution of the trust reposed in us, we shall endeavor to pursue that enlarged and liberal policy to which your Speech so happily directs. We are conscious that the prosperity of each State is inseparably connected with the welfare of all, and that, in promoting the latter, we shall effectually advance the former. In full persuasion of this truth, it shall be our inviolable aim to divest ourselves of local prejudices and attachments, and to view the great assemblage of communities and interests committed to our charge with an equal eye. We feel, sir, the force, and acknowledge the justness of the observation, that the foundation of our national policy should be laid in private morality. If individuals be not influenced by moral principles, it is in vain to look for public virtue; it is, therefore, the duty of legislators to enforce, both by precept and example, the utility, as well as the necessity, of a strict adherence to the rules of distributive justice. We beg you to be assured that the Senate will, at all times, cheerfully co-operate in every measure which may strengthen the Union, conduce to the happiness, or secure and perpetuate the liberties of this great confederated Republic.

We commend you, sir, to the protection of Almighty God, earnestly beseeching him long to preserve a life so valuable and dear to the people of the United States; and that your administration may be prosperous to the nation, and glorious to yourself.

Read and accepted; and Ordered, That the Vice President should affix his signature to the Address, in behalf of the Senate.

Mr. BECKLEY, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, delivered a message, purporting "that the House had concurred with the Senate in the to the President's Speech further reported; whereupon it was agreed, That the Senate should wait on the President at his own house on Monday next, at a quarter after 11 o'clock, and that the Vice President then present the Address of the Senate, as agreed to on the 7th instant.

The Senate proceeded to determine the classes, agreeably to the resolve of yesterday, on the mode of carrying into effect the provision of the second clause of the third section of the first article of the Constitution; and the numbers being drawn, the classes were determined as follows:

Lot No. 1, drawn by Mr. Dalton, contained Mr. Dalton, Mr. Ellsworth, Mr. Elmer, Mr. Maclay, Mr. Read, Mr. Carroll, and Mr. Grayson; whose seats shall, accordingly, be vacated in the Senate at the expiration of the second year.

Lot No. 2, drawn by Mr. Wingate, contained Mr. Wingate, Mr. Strong, Mr. Paterson, Mr. Bassett, Mr. Lee, Mr. Butler, and Mr. Few; whose seats shall, accordingly, be vacated in the Senate at the expiration of the fourth year.

Lot No. 3, drawn by Mr. Langdon, contained Mr. Langdon, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Morris, Mr. Henry, Mr. Izard, and Mr. Gann; whose seats shall, accordingly, be vacated in the Senate at the expiration of the sixth year.

SATURDAY, May 16.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House had concurred in the appointment of a committee, consisting of Mr. Sylvester, Mr. Wynkoop, and Mr. Smith of South Carolina, to confer with a committee appointed on the part of the Senate the 13th instant, and to report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with at the public expense; and that it was an instruction to the said committee, on the part of the House, to receive proposals for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress.

The question being taken, "Whether the Senate will give a similar instruction to the committee on their part?" it passed in the affirmative. And the Secretary informed the House of Representatives of the concurrence.

Ordered, That the petition from sundry printers, presented to the Senate, be referred to the committee of the Senate appointed the 13th instant.

The committee appointed the 14th of April to consider the mode of keeping and publishing the journals, &c., reported; and the report was ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, May 18.

Agreeably to the order of the 15th instant, the Senate waited on the President of the United States at his own house, when the Vice President, in their name, delivered to the President the Address agreed to on the 7th instant. To which the President of the United States was pleased to make the following reply:

GENTLEMEN: I thank you for your Address, in which the most affectionate sentiments are expressed in the most obliging terms. The coincidence of circumstances which led to this auspicious crisis, the confidence reposed in me by my fellow-citizens, and the assistance I may expect from counsels which will be dictated by an enlarged and liberal policy, seem to promise a more prosperous issue to my administration than a diffidence of my abilities had taught me to anticipate. I now feel myself inexpressibly happy in a belief that Heaven, which has done so much for our infant nation, will not withdraw its providential influence before our political felicity shall have been completed, and in a conviction that the Senate will at all times co-operate in every measure which may tend to promote the welfare of this confederated republic. Thus supported by a firm trust in the great Arbiter of the universe, aided by the collective wisdom of the Union, and imploring the divine benediction on our joint exertions in the service of our country, I readily engage with you in the arduous but pleasing task of attempting to make a nation happy.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives brought to the Senate a bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States; which he informed the Senate the House had passed, and to which they desired the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill above mentioned was read a first time, and Thursday next was assigned for the second reading.

Ordered, That Mr. Lee be a committee, on the part of the Senate, to join any committee appointed for that purpose on the part of the House of Representatives, to lay before the President of the United States, for his approbation, a bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths; after it shall be enrolled, examined by the said committee, and signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and by the Vice President.

TUESDAY, May 19.

The Secretary carried to the House of Representatives the resolve of the Senate, passed the 18th instant, appointing a committee on their part, to lay before the President a bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths; after it shall be enrolled, &c.

The committee to whom was referred the motion for printing the journals of the Senate, and furnishing each member with a copy thereof; and also, to report upon the mode of keeping the journals, and who were instructed to consider whether the minutes be amended, so as to record only the acts of the Senate on the journal, reported as follows:

"That one hundred and twenty copies of the journals of the legislative proceedings only be printed once a month, commencing the first publication on the first day of June next, and that each member be furnished with a copy; that the proceedings of the Senate, when they shall act in their executive capacity, shall be entered and kept in separate and distinct books.

"That every vote of the Senate shall be entered on the journals, and that a brief statement of the contents of each petition, memorial, or paper, presented to the Senate, be also inserted on the journals.

"That the journals, previous to each publication, be revised by a committee, to be appointed from time to time for that purpose," which report was accepted.

The committee appointed to confer with a committee of the House of Representatives, and report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with at the public expense, reported in part; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That Mr. PATERSON, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. WINGATE, be a committee to revise the journal, previous to its publication.

WEDNESDAY, May 20.

The petition of Thomas Allen, to supply the stationery that may be wanted for the use of Congress, was read, and referred to the committee on petitions of a similar nature.

THURSDAY, May 21.

WILLIAM GRAYSON, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

Resolved, That all bills on a second reading shall be considered by the Senate in the same manner as if the Senate were in a committee of the whole, before they shall be taken up and proceeded on by the Senate, agreeably to the standing rules, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. GRAYSON was added to the committee appointed the 13th of May, "to define the crimes and offences that shall be cognizable under the authority of the United States, and their punishment."

FRIDAY, May 22.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they had appointed Messrs. Partridge and Floyd, a committee on their part, to lay before the President, after it shall have passed the formalities prescribed in the resolve of the 18th of May, the bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths.

The committee appointed to examine the aforementioned bill, reported, that they had performed the service; whereupon, the bill was signed by the Vice President, and was, by the committee thereunto appointed, laid before the President of the United States for his approbation.

MONDAY, May 25.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and, after progress, adjourned.

The Senate to-day, for the first time, entered upon Executive business, having received from the President of the United States a communication covering a report from the Secretary of War, on the negotiations of the Governor of the Western Territory with certain northern and northwestern Indians, and the treaties made in consequence thereof at Fort Harmar, on the 9th of January, 1789, which was read, as follows; and ordered to lie on the table.

That the several treaties of peace which have been made with the northern tribes of Indians, and those northwest of the Ohio, since the conclusion of the late war with Great Britain, are as follows, to wit:

1st. The treaty at Fort Stanwix, on the 22d day of October, 1784, between Oliver Wolcott, Richard Butler, and Arthur Lee, Commissioners Plenipotentiary from the United States, on the one part, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations on the other.

2d. The treaty entered into by the said Commissioners Plenipotentiary and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Chippawa, and Ottawa nations of Indians, at Fort McIntosh, the 21st day of January, 1785.

3d. The treaty at the mouth of the Great Miami, the 31st day of January, 1786, between commissioners from the United States, and the chiefs and warriors of the Shawanoe nation.

That the treaties of Fort Stanwix and Fort McIntosh were entered on the journals of the United States, in Congress assembled, June 3d, 1786; and the treaty of the Miami on the 17th day of April, 1786.

That it may be proper to observe, that the Indians are greatly tenacious of their lands, and generally do not relinquish their right, excepting on the principle of a specific consideration expressly given for the purchase of the same.

That the practice of the late English colonies and Government, in purchasing the Indian claims, has firmly established the habit in this respect, so that it cannot be violated but with difficulty, and an expense greatly exceeding the value of the object.

That the treaties of Fort Stanwix and of Fort McIntosh do not state that the limits therein defined are by virtue of a purchase from the Indians.

That the said treaties have been opposed and complained of, will appear by the representation to Congress accompanying this report, marked No. 1.

That, in consequence of the said representation, Congress, on the 21st day of July, 1787, passed the following resolve:

"Resolved, That the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Northern Department inform the Five Nations, the Hurons, and other Indian nations, who joined in the representation made to Congress, dated the 18th day of December, 1786, that Congress, on the 18th of the present month, July, 1787, received their said representation, and have taken it into their serious consideration, and in due time will send them an answer."

That, on the 5th of October following, Congress resolved:

"That a general treaty be held with the tribes of Indians within the limits of the United States, inhabiting the country northwest of the Ohio, and about Lake Erie, as soon after the 1st of April next as convenient; may be, and at such place and at such particular time, as the Governor of the Western Territory shall appoint, for the purpose of knowing the causes of uneasiness among the said tribes, and hearing their complaints, of regulating trade, and amicably settling all affairs concerning lands and boundaries between them and the United States.

"That the Governor of the Western Territory hold the said treaty, agreeably to such instructions as shall be given him for that purpose."

That, on the 12th of October, 1787, Congress resolved:

"That twenty thousand dollars be, and hereby are, appropriated for the purpose of Indian treaties, whenever the same shall hereafter be judged necessary by a majority of the United States in Congress assembled; and that the resolutions for holding a general treaty with the Indians, passed the 5th day of the present month, be, and they are hereby repealed."

That, on the 22d of October, 1787, Congress resolved:

"That the Governor of the Western Territory be, and he is hereby empowered, to hold a general treaty with the Indian tribes the ensuing spring, if in his judgment the public good requires it, and that he be authorized to draw for such sums of money, appropriated by the resolve of Congress of the 12th instant, as may be necessary to effect this object, not exceeding the sum of fourteen thousand dollars."

That, on the 2d of July, 1789, Congress resolved:

"That the sum of twenty thousand dollars, in addition to the fourteen thousand dollars already appropriated, be appropriated for defraying the expenses of the treaties which have been ordered, or which may be ordered to be held in the present year, with the several Indian tribes in the northern department, and for extinguishing the Indian claims; the whole of the said twenty thousand dollars, together with six thousand dollars of the said fourteen thousand dollars, to be applied solely to the purpose of extinguishing Indian claims to the lands they have already ceded to the United States, by obtaining regular conveyances for the same, and for extending a purchase beyond the limits hitherto fixed by treaty: but that no part of the said sums be applied for any purpose other than those above mentioned."

That the instructions to the Governor of the Western Territory, marked No. 2, will further show the sense of Congress on this subject.

That the treaties of Fort Harmar, on the 9th of January, 1789, with the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, the Mohawks excepted, and with the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawatam, and Sac nations, inhabiting part of the country northwest of the Ohio, appear to have been negotiated by the Governor of the Western Territory, so as to unite the interests of the United States with the justice due the said Indian nations.

That the reservation, in the treaty with the Six Nations, of six miles square round the fort at Oswego, is within the territory of the State of New York, and ought to be so explained as to render it conformable to the Constitution of the United States.

That, if this explanation should be made, and the Senate of the United States should concur in their approbation of the said treaties, it might be proper that the same should be ratified and published, with a proclamation enjoining an observance thereof.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, June 1.

The Secretary carried to the House of Representatives the concurrence of the Senate upon a resolve of the House on the 29th of May, on the mode of receiving communications from the President of the United States.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BROCKLEY, their Clerk.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed to inform the Senate that the President has affixed his signature to a bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths, and has returned it to the House of Representatives, from whence it originated.

The Senate proceeded in the consideration of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and, after debate, adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 2.

The resolve of the House of Representatives of the 28th ultimo was considered as follows:

The House proceeded to consider the two reports, one made the 19th instant, the other the 26th instant, by the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, to consider and report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with at the public expense, and to receive proposals for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress; and the first report, in the words following:

"That, in their opinion, public economy requires that the expense heretofore incurred by the public, of supplying every member of Congress, should be retrenched in future; but, as your committee consider the publication of newspapers to be highly beneficial in disseminating useful knowledge throughout the United States, and deserving of public encouragement, they recommend that each member of Congress be supplied, at the public expense, with one paper, leaving the choice of the same to each member; and that it be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to give the necessary directions to the different printers, to furnish each member with such paper as he shall choose."

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said report.

The other report being again read, and amended to read as follows:

"That it would be proper that it should be left to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to contract with such person as shall engage to execute the printing and binding business on the most reasonable terms, the paper being furnished by the said Secretary and Clerk, to such person, at the public expense; that such person as they shall contract with shall be obliged to render a state of his accounts quarterly; and that six hundred copies of the acts of Congress, and seven hundred copies of the journals, be printed, and distributed to the executive and judicial, and heads of departments of the Government of the United States, and the executive, legislative, and judicial of the several States."

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said report.

And, on the question of concurrence on the first report, it was postponed.

The other report was read, and concurred with an amendment, viz: after the words "and distributed to the," insert "members of the legislative, to the."

The Senate proceeded in the consideration of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States.

WEDNESDAY, June 3.

Proceeded in the consideration of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and further postponed the second reading until to-morrow.

The Secretary informed the House of Representatives of the concurrence of the Senate, in a resolve of the 28th of May, upon the mode of printing the acts and journals of Congress, as agreed to yesterday; and requested the House of Representatives to send to the Senate "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths."

A message from the House of Representatives brought to the Senate the act last mentioned, and informed the Senate of the concurrence of the House of Representatives in their amendment on a resolve of the 28th May, on the mode of printing the acts and journals of Congress.

Ordered, That Mr. LANGDON administer the oath to the VICE PRESIDENT; which was done accordingly.

And the VICE PRESIDENT administered the oath, according to law, to the following members: Messrs. LANGDON, WINGATE, STRONG, DALTON, JOHNSON, ELLSWORTH, PATTERSON, MACLAY, MORRIS, READ, BASSETT, CARROLL, HENRY, LEE, GRAYSON, IZARD, VEW, GUNN.

The same oath was, by the VICE PRESIDENT, administered to the Secretary, together with the oath of office.

Ordered, That Messrs. MORRIS, CARROLL, LANGDON, READ, and LEE, be a committee to consider and report the mode of communicating the acts of Congress to the several States in the Union, and the number necessary for that purpose.

THURSDAY, June 4.

On the report of the committee, appointed the 3d June, to consider the mode of communicating the acts of Congress to the several States in the Union,

Resolved, That, in ten days after the passing of every act of Congress, during the present session, or until some other regulations shall be adopted, twenty-two printed copies thereof, signed by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and certified by them to be true copies of the original act, be lodged with the President of the United States; and that he be requested to cause to be transmitted two of the said copies, so attested as aforesaid, to each of the supreme Executives in the several States.

The Secretary carried the aforesaid resolve to the House of Representatives for their concurrence. The Senate proceeded to the second reading of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, June 5.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BECKLEY, their Clerk, who informed the Senate of the concurrence of the House on the resolution of the 4th of June, upon the mode of communicating the acts of Congress to the Executive of the several States in the Union.

According to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded in the second reading of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States.

MONDAY, June 8.

PIERCE BUTLER, from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat. The Vice President administered the oath to Mr. BUTLER.

The Senate concurred with the resolution of the House of Representatives, that every member of the present Congress, who is not yet furnished with a copy of the journals of the late Congress, shall, on application to the Keeper of the Records of the late Congress, be entitled to receive a complete set of such journals.

The Senate proceeded in the second reading of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, and agreed that Mr. ELLSWORTH, Mr. MORRIS, Mr. LEE, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. DALTON, be a committee to consider and report the expediency of adding a clause prohibiting the importation of goods from China, or India, in ships or vessels other than those belonging to the citizens of the United States.

TUESDAY, June 9.

Sundry petitions were presented. The bill imposing duties on tonnage was read a first time, and Tuesday next was assigned for the second reading.

The Senate proceeded in the second reading of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and Wednesday next was assigned for the third reading of the bill.

WEDNESDAY, June 10.

Agreeably to the order of the day, proceeded to a third reading of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States.

THURSDAY, June 11.

Proceeded in the third reading of the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States.

And the question being taken upon the bill, it was concurred in with sundry amendments.

The Senate entered on Executive business, and received from the President of the United States a communication in relation to the functions and prerogatives of Consuls, Vice Consuls, &c., which was ordered to lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, June 12.

Mr. LEE, in behalf of the committee thereto appointed, reported a bill to establish the judicial courts of the United States.

The Senate entered on Executive business. They referred the President's Message of the 25th ult., to a committee, consisting of Messrs. FEW, READ, and HENRY.

The consideration of the Message of the 11th instant was postponed.

MONDAY, June 15.

Proceeded to the second reading of a bill imposing duties on tonnage; and, after debate, adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 16.

Proceeded in the second reading of the bill imposing duties on tonnage.

The Senate entered on Executive business. A communication from the President informed them that Mr. JEFFERSON wished to return home, and he proposed WILLIAM SHORTT, Esq. to take his place as Minister to France. Laid on the table.

WEDNESDAY, June 17.

Agreeably to the order of the day, proceeded to the third reading of the bill imposing duties on tonnage, and concurred in the same, with sundry amendments.

Ordered, That a committee, to consist of Messrs. BUTLER, MORRIS, LANGDON, DALTON, and LEE, be appointed to arrange and bring forward a system for the regulation of the trade and intercourse between the United States and the territory of other Powers in North America and the West Indies, so as to place the same on a more beneficial and permanent footing.

The committee, appointed May the 9th, to view the rooms in the City Hall, and to confer with a committee of the House of Representatives appointed for that purpose, reported.

Ordered, That the report lie for consideration. The Senate went into Executive business. They examined into the fitness of Mr. SHORTT to supply the place of Mr. JEFFERSON, but came to no conclusion.

THURSDAY, June 18.

The Senate went into Executive business, and confirmed the appointment of Mr. SHORTT to take charge of our affairs at the Court of France, during the absence of the Minister.

FRIDAY, June 19.

The committee, appointed May 9th, to view the rooms in the City Hall, and to confer with a committee of the House of Representatives, appointed for that purpose, reported in part:

"That the two rooms on the first floor, in the southwest angle of the said hall, are not necessary for the accommodation of Congress; and that the mayor of the city be notified thereof, that the said rooms may be occupied by such persons as the corporation may employ to take charge of the building."

Read and accepted, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

MONDAY, June 22.

Proceeded to the second reading of the bill to establish the judicial courts of the United States; and, after progress, adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 23.

Proceeded to the third reading of a bill to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and

Resolved, That the Senate do concur therein, with sundry amendments.

[SENATE.]

The Senate entered on Executive business. The Secretary of Foreign Affairs reported his opinion upon the consular convention between France and the United States, as follows:

"The Secretary of the United States for the Department of Foreign Affairs, under the former Congress, in pursuance of the resolution of the 22d of July, 1789, reports:

"That he has compared the two conventions of 1784 and 1788.

"That the copies of them, received from Mr. Jefferson, and now before the Senate, are so printed, and their variations so clearly marked, as that he cannot contrast them in a manner better calculated for an easy and accurate comparison.

"That, in his opinion, there exist in the convention of 1788, no variations from the original scheme sent to Doctor Franklin in 1782, nor from the convention of 1784, but such as render it less ineligible than either of the other two.

"That, although he apprehends that this convention will prove more inconvenient than beneficial to the United States, yet he thinks that the circumstances under which it was formed render its being ratified by them indispensable.

"The circumstances alluded to are these:

"The original scheme of 1782, however exceptionable, was framed and agreed to by Congress.

"The convention of 1784 was modelled by that scheme, but in certain instances deviated from it; but both of them were to be perpetual in their duration.

"On account of those deviations, Congress refused to ratify it, but promised to ratify one corresponding with the scheme, provided its duration was limited to eight or ten years; but they afterwards extended it to twelve.

"By an instruction to Mr. Jefferson of 3d October, 1786, he was, among other things, directed to propose to the King, 'That the said convention be so amended as perfectly to correspond with the scheme in every part, where a deviation from the same is not permitted by the said act of 1782; and, further, that he represent to His Majesty the desire of Congress to make the said convention probationary, by adding a clause for limiting its duration to eight or ten years; that he assure His Majesty of the determination of Congress to observe, on all occasions, the highest respect for candor and good faith in all their proceedings; and that on receiving the convention, so amended, and with such a clause, they will immediately ratify it.'

"In the letter which accompanied these instructions is the following paragraph:

"The original scheme of the convention is far from being unexceptionable, but a former Congress having agreed to it, it would be improper now to recede; and, therefore, Congress are content to ratify a convention made conformable to that scheme, and to their act of the 25th January, 1782, provided a clause limiting its duration be added."

"On the 27th July, 1787, Congress gave to Mr. Jefferson a commission, in general terms, to negotiate and conclude, with His Most Christian Majesty, a convention for regulating the privileges, &c., of their respective consuls.

"In one of the letters then written to him is this paragraph:

"Congress confide fully in your talents and discretion, and they will ratify any convention that is not liable to more objections than the one already, in part, concluded; provided that an article, limiting its duration to a term not exceeding twelve years, be inserted."

"As the convention in question is free from several objections to which the one of 1784 was liable, and in every respect, preferable to it, and as it contains a clause limiting its duration to twelve years, it seems to follow, as of necessary consequences, that the United States ought to ratify it.

"All which is submitted to the wisdom of the Senate.

"JOHN JAY."

TUESDAY, July 28.

Mr. JOHNSON, in behalf of the committee appointed the 13th of May, reported a bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, which was read a first time, and Monday next was assigned for a second reading.

The Secretary carried to the House of Representatives the bill to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, or merchandises, imported into the United States; concurred in, with amendments.

On motion, the Senators from the State of New York proceeded to draw lots for their classes, in conformity to the resolve of the 14th of May; and two lots, No. 3, and a blank, being, by the Secretary, rolled up and put into the box, Mr. SCHUYLER drew blank; and Mr. KING having drawn No. 3, his seat shall accordingly be vacated in the Senate at the expiration of the sixth year.

The Secretary proceeded to put two other lots into the box, marked Nos. 1 and 2; and Mr. SCHUYLER having drawn lot No. 1, his seat shall accordingly be vacated in the Senate at the expiration of the second year.

WEDNESDAY, July 29.

Resumed the second reading of the bill for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys.

Resumed the second reading of the bill to establish the Treasury Department; and postponed the further consideration thereof until to-morrow.

Proceeded to the second reading of the bill for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States; and assigned to-morrow for a third reading.

The Senate entered on Executive business; and having duly considered the convention between His Most Christian Majesty and the United States of America, for the purpose of defining and establishing the privileges and functions of their respective consuls and vice-consuls, transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, through the Secretary for Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, unanimously. That the Senate do consent to the said convention, and advise the President of the United States to ratify the same.

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

THURSDAY, July 30.

Proceeded to a third reading of the bill for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States; and resolved, that the Senate do concur therein; and the Secretary notified the House of Representatives accordingly.

Proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys.

Proceeded to the consideration of the bill to establish the Treasury Department; and assigned to-morrow for a third reading.

On motion, that the sense of the Senate should be taken on the following resolve, to wit:

Resolved, That a clause passed, or amendment made, in committee, shall not be revised in the same committee, but may be so done in the Senate; and no amendment or clause agreed to in the Senate shall be reconsidered until the next reading of the bill, except at the third reading of a bill, when, by the consent of the Senate, it may be amended.

Passed in the negative.

FRIDAY, July 31.

Proceeded to a third reading of the bill to establish the Treasury Department, which was passed after being amended; and the Secretary carried the bill to the House of Representatives, concurred in with the amendments; also, the concurrence of the Senate in the resolve of the 31st July, and the appointment of Mr. WINGATE as a standing committee, jointly with a committee of the House, to examine and present the enrolled bills that may pass the Senate and House of Representatives from time to time.

Proceeded to the second reading of the bill to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio; and postponed the consideration thereof to Monday next.

MONDAY, August 3.

Proceeded to the second reading of the bill to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio; and assigned to-morrow for a third reading.

The bill for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, concurred in with amendments, was carried to the House of Representatives by the Secretary.

The bill to establish an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of War, was considered, and a third reading postponed until to-morrow.

The bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States was read a second time; and the further consideration thereof was postponed.

The Senate entered on Executive business. The President communicated to them a list of about one hundred appointments as collectors, naval officers, and surveyors. The Senate advised and consented to about one-half the list; the rest lay till to-morrow.

TUESDAY, August 4.

Proceeded to a third reading of the bill to establish an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of War; which the Senate concurred in, with amendments.

Proceeded to a third reading of the bill to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio; which passed.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up a bill for making compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States, and desired the concurrence of the Senate therein.

Informed the Senate that the House had agreed to the amendments to the bill for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys;

Brought up the acceptance, by the House of Representatives, of a report of a joint committee upon the mode of presenting addresses, the enrollment of bills, &c.;

Together with the appointment of Messrs. WADSWORTH, CARROLL, and HARTLEY, a committee, to join with a committee of the Senate to be appointed for the purpose, "to consider of and report when it will be convenient and proper that an adjournment of the present session of Congress should take place; and to consider and report such business, now before Congress, and such as may be conveniently postponed to the next session; and, also, to consider and report such matters, now before Congress, but which it will be necessary should be considered and determined by Congress before an adjournment."

The Senate again entered on Executive business, and advised and confirmed all the remainder of the list of appointments presented yesterday, one excepted.

WEDNESDAY, August 5.

Proceeded to a first reading of a bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States, and assigned to-morrow for the second reading.

Appointed Messrs. SPRONG, ELLSWORTH, and CARROLL, a committee, jointly with the committee of the House of Representatives, to that purpose appointed, to consider what business is necessary to be acted upon prior to an adjournment, and to report a proper time at which an adjournment shall take place, agreeably to a proposition from the House of Representatives of the 4th of August.

The resolve of the House of Representatives, on the report of a joint committee appointed the 8th of May, upon the enrollment and presentation of the acts of Congress, &c., was read, and ordered to be printed for the consideration of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up the concurrence of the House on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill to establish an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of War; and their concurrence on the proposed amendments to the bill to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio.

Mr. BUTLER, in behalf of the committee to whom it was referred "to arrange and bring forward a system to regulate the trade and intercourse between the United States and the territory of other Powers in North America and the West Indies," reported:

That it will be expedient to pass a law for imposing an increased duty of tonnage, for a limited time, on all foreign ships and other vessels that shall load in the United States, with the produce of the same, to any port or place in America whereto the vessels of the United States are not permitted to carry their own produce; but such a law being of the nature of a revenue law, your committee conceive that the originating bill for that purpose is, by the Constitution, exclusively placed in the House of Representatives.

Your committee beg leave further to report, as their opinion, that it will be expedient to direct a bill to be brought in for imposing similar restraints upon the trade of the European settlements in America with the United States, that are imposed on the trade of the United States with those settlements.

Resolved, That the first clause of this report be accepted, and that the remainder of the report be referred, and that it be an instruction to the committee, in case it shall be their opinion that a legislative provision ought to be made on the subject of that commitment, to report a bill for that purpose; and that Messrs. ELLSWORTH, KING, and READ, be added to the committee.

THURSDAY, August 6.

The Senate proceeded to a second reading of the bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States, and committed it to Messrs. MORRIS, READ, ELMER, SCHUYLER, LANGDON, CARROLL, ELLSWORTH, STRONG, FEW, IZARD, and LEE.

The following joint rules, established between the two Houses, were received from the House of Representatives:

"That while bills are on their passage, between the two Houses, they shall be on paper, and under the signature of the Secretary or Clerk of each House, respectively.

"After a bill shall have passed both Houses, it shall be duly enrolled on parchment, by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House, before it shall be presented to the President of the United States.

"When bills are enrolled, they shall be examined by a joint committee of one from the Senate, and two from the House of Representatives, appointed as a standing committee for that purpose, who shall carefully compare the enrollment with the engrossed bills, as passed in the two Houses, and, correcting any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report forthwith to the respective Houses.

"After examination and report, each bill shall be signed in the respective Houses, first by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and then by the President of the Senate.

"After a bill shall have thus been signed in each House, it shall be presented, by the said committee, to

Along with this object, I am induced to suggest another, with the national importance and necessity of which I am deeply impressed—I mean some uniform and effective system for the militia of the United States. It is unnecessary to offer arguments in recommendation of a measure, on which the honor, safety, and well-being of our country so evidently and so essentially depend; but it may not be amiss to observe, that I am particularly anxious it should receive as early attention as circumstances will admit, because it is now in our power to avail ourselves of the military knowledge disseminated throughout the several States, by means of the many well-instructed officers and soldiers of the late army; a resource which is daily diminishing by death and other causes. To suffer this peculiar advantage to pass away unimproved, would be to neglect an opportunity which will never again occur, unless, unfortunately, we should again be involved in a long and arduous war.

NEW YORK, August 7, 1789.

The above Message was ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. MORRIS, in behalf of the committee on the bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States, reported an amendment, to wit:

To expunge, in the provision for the Vice President, "five thousand dollars," and insert "six thousand dollars."

On motion to reduce the provision for the President of the United States, from "twenty-five thousand" to "twenty thousand dollars."

Passed in the negative.

On motion to make the provision for the Vice President, eight thousand dollars, instead of five thousand dollars:

Passed in the negative.

And, on motion, the further consideration of this clause of the bill was postponed.

The concurrence of the Senate upon the resolve of the House on the mode of enrolment, and the presentation of bills, &c., was carried to the House of Representatives.

The Senate entered on Executive business.

The following Messages from the President were laid before them:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

My nomination of Benjamin Fishbourn for the place of naval officer of the port of Savannah not having met with your concurrence, I now nominate Lachlan McIntosh for that office.

Whatever may have been the reasons which induced your dissent, I am persuaded they were such as you deemed sufficient. Permit me to submit to your consideration whether, on occasions where the propriety of nominations appear questionable to you, it would not be expedient to communicate that circumstance to me, and thereby avail yourselves of the information which led me to make them, and which I would with pleasure lay before you. Probably my reasons for nominating Mr. Fishbourn may tend to show that such a mode of proceeding, in such cases, might be useful. I will, therefore, detail them.

First. While Colonel Fishbourn was an officer, in actual service, and chiefly under my own eye, his conduct appeared to me irreproachable; nor did I ever hear

A Message from the House of Representatives brought up a bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses; and requested the concurrence of the Senate therein.

A Message from the President of the United States, by General Knox:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I have directed a statement of the troops in the service of the United States to be laid before you for your information.

These troops were raised by virtue of the resolves of Congress of the 20th of October, 1786, and the 3d of October, 1787, in order to protect the frontiers from the depredations of the hostile Indians; to prevent all incursions on the public lands; and to facilitate the surveying and selling of the same, for the purpose of reducing the public debt.

As these important objects continue to require the aid of the troops, it is necessary that the establishment thereof should, in all respects, be conformed by law to the Constitution of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

New York, August 10, 1789.

The Senate proceeded to the second reading of a bill for registering and clearing of vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes.

The Senate entered on Executive business. The following Communication was read from the President:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In consequence of an act providing for the expenses which may attend negotiations or treaties with the Indian tribes, and the appointment of commissioners for managing the same, I nominate Benjamin Lincoln as one of three commissioners whom I shall propose to be employed to negotiate a treaty with the Southern Indians. My reason for nominating him at this early moment is, that it will not be possible for the public to avail itself of his services on this occasion, unless his appointment can be forwarded to him by the mail which will leave this place to-morrow morning.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

New York, August 20, 1789.

Proceeded to consider the nominations of Governor, &c. of the Western Territory, as contained in the Message from the President of the United States of the 18th August, and the Senate did advise and consent to the appointment of

Arthur St. Clair, to be Governor of the Western Territory;

Of Winthrop Sargent, to be Secretary; and Of Samuel Holden Parsons, John Clevens Symmes, and William Barton, to be Judges.

Proceeded to consider the nomination of Ebenezer Tucker, to be Surveyor of Little Egg Harbor, in the State of New Jersey, and of William Gibb, to be Collector of Folly Landing, in the State of Virginia. And the Senate did advise and consent to their being appointed to office, agreeably to the nominations respectively.

Also, proceeded to consider the nomination of Benjamin Lincoln, as one of the three commissioners to be employed to negotiate a treaty with the Southern Indians.

And the Senate did advise and consent to his appointment accordingly.

[August, 1789.]

Mr. Izard, in behalf of the committee appointed the 6th of August, "to wait on the President of the United States, and confer with him on the mode of communication," &c. reported:

The consideration of which was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, August 21.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for registering and clearing of vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes.

Ordered, That the bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The Senate entered on Executive business. They proceeded to consider the report made by Mr. Izard, yesterday, as follows:

The committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and confer with him on the mode of communication proper to be pursued between him and the Senate, in the formation of treaties, and making appointments to offices, reported:

Resolved, That when nominations shall be made in writing by the President of the United States to the Senate, a future day shall be assigned, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise, for taking them into consideration; that when the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber, the President of the Senate shall have a chair on the floor, be considered as at the head of the Senate, and his chair shall be assigned to the President of the United States; that when the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the President of the Senate and Senators shall attend at the place appointed. The Secretary of the Senate shall also attend to take the minutes of the Senate.

That all questions shall be put by the President of the Senate, either in the presence or absence of the President of the United States; and the Senators shall signify their assent or dissent by answering aye no, aye or no.

Another Message was received from the President, viz:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In addition to the nomination which I made yesterday, of Benjamin Lincoln, as one of the three commissioners to be employed to negotiate a treaty with the Southern Indians, I now nominate Cyrus Griffin and David Humphreys, as the two other commissioners to be employed to negotiate the before-mentioned treaty.

NEW YORK, August 21, 1789.
GEO. WASHINGTON.

Proceeded to the consideration of the last reported nominations, and the Senate did advise and consent to the appointments accordingly.

Also, the following Message:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The President of the United States will meet the Senate, in the Senate Chamber, at half-past eleven o'clock to-morrow, to advise with them on the terms of the treaty to be negotiated with the Southern Indians.

in favor of the Cherokees could be immediately adopted by the General Government.

"The commissioners for negotiating with the Southern Indians may be instructed to transmit a message to the Cherokees, stating to them, as far as may be proper, the difficulties arising from the local claims of North Carolina, and to assure them that the United States are not unmindful of the treaty at Hopewell, and as soon as the difficulties which are at present opposed to the measures shall be removed, the Government will do full justice to the Cherokees.

"The distance of the Choctaws and Chickasaws from the frontier settlements seems to have prevented those tribes from being involved in similar difficulties with the Cherokees.

"The commissioners may be instructed to transmit messages to the said tribes, containing assurances of the continuance of the friendship of the United States, and that measures will soon be taken for extending a trade to them, agreeably to the treaties of Hopewell. The commissioners may also be directed to report a plan for the execution of the said treaties respecting trade.

"But the case of the Creek nation is of the highest importance, and requires an immediate decision. The cause of the hostilities between Georgia and the Creeks is stated to be a difference in judgment concerning three treaties made between the said parties, to wit: at Augusta, in 1783, at Galphinton, in 1785, and at Shouderbone, in 1786. The State of Georgia asserts, and the Creeks deny the validity of the said treaties.

"Hence arises the indispensable necessity of having all the circumstances respecting the said treaties critically investigated by commissioners of the United States, so that the further measures of Government may be formed on a full knowledge of the case.

"In order that the investigation may be conducted with the highest impartiality, it will be proper, in addition to the evidence of the documents in the public possession, that Georgia should be represented at this part of the proposed treaty with the Creek nation.

It is, however, to be observed, in any issue of the inquiry, that it would be highly embarrassing to Georgia to relinquish that part of the lands stated to have been ceded by the Creeks, lying between the Ogeechee and Oconee rivers; that State having surveyed and divided the same among certain descriptions of its citizens, who settled and planted thereon until dispossessed by the Indians.

"In case, therefore, the issue of the investigation should be unfavorable to the claims of Georgia, the commissioners should be instructed to use their best endeavors to negotiate with the Creeks for a solemn conveyance of the said lands to Georgia.

"By the report of the commissioners who were appointed under certain acts of the late Congress, by South Carolina and Georgia, it appears that they have agreed to meet the Creeks on the 15th of September ensuing. As it is with great difficulty the Indians are collected together at certain seasons of the year, it is important that the above occasion should be embraced, if possible, on the part of the present Government, to form a treaty with the Creeks. As the proposed treaty is of great importance to the future tranquillity of the State of Georgia, as well of the United States, it has been thought proper that it should be conducted on the part of the General Government by commissioners whose local situations may free them from the imputation of prejudice on this subject.

"As it is necessary that certain principles should be fixed, previously to forming instructions for the commissioners, the following questions, arising out of the foregoing communications, are stated by the President of the United States, and the advice of the Senate requested thereon.

"1st. In the present state of affairs between North Carolina and the United States, will it be proper to take any other measures for redressing the injuries of the Cherokees than the one herein suggested?

"2d. Shall the commissioners be instructed to pursue any other measures respecting the Chickasaws and Choctaws than those herein suggested? "3d. If the commissioners shall adjudge that the Creek nation was fully represented at the three treaties with Georgia, and that the cessions of land were obtained with the full understanding and free consent of the acknowledged proprietors, and that the said treaties ought to be considered as just and equitable: in this case shall the commissioners be instructed to insist on a formal renewal and confirmation thereof? and in case of a refusal, shall they be instructed to inform the Creeks that the arms of the Union shall be employed to compel them to acknowledge the justice of the said cessions?

"4th. But if the commissioners shall adjudge that the said treaties were formed with an inadequate or unauthorized representation of the Creek nation, or that the treaties were held under circumstances of constraint, or unfairness of any sort, so that the United States could not, with justice and dignity, request or urge a confirmation thereof: in this case, shall the commissioners, considering the importance of the Oconee lands to Georgia, be instructed to use their highest exertions to obtain a cession of said lands? If so, shall the commissioners be instructed, if they cannot obtain the said cession on better terms, to offer for the same, and for the further great object of attaching the Creeks to the Government of the United States, the following conditions: 1st. A compensation in money or goods, to the amount of ——— dollars; the said amount to be stipulated to be paid by Georgia, at the period which shall be fixed, or, in failure thereof, by the United States. 2d. A secure port on the Altamaha, or on St. Mary's river, or at any other place between the same, as may be mutually agreed to by the commissioners and the Creeks. 3d. Certain pecuniary considerations to some, and honorable military distinctions to other influential chiefs, on their taking oaths of allegiance to the United States. 4th. A solemn guarantee by the United States to the Creeks of their remaining territory; and to maintain the same if necessary, by a line of military posts.

"5th. But if all offers should fail to induce the Creeks to make the desired cession to Georgia, shall the commissioners make it an ultimatum?"

"6th. If the said cessions shall not be made an ultimatum, shall the commissioners proceed and make a treaty, and include the disputed lands within the limits which shall be assigned to the Creeks?"

marked; making the Oconee the line, and the other parts of the treaty be concluded? In this case, shall a secure port be stipulated, and the pecuniary and honorary considerations granted?"

In other general objects shall the treaties formed at Hopewell with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, be the basis of a treaty with the Creeks?"

"7th. Shall the sum of twenty thousand dollars, appropriated to Indian expenses and treaties, be wholly applied, if necessary to a treaty with the Creeks? If not, what proportion?"

Whereupon the Senate proceeded to give their advice and consent.

The first question, viz: in the present state of affairs between North Carolina and the United States, will it be proper to take any other measures for redressing the injuries of the Cherokees than the one herein suggested?" was, at the request of the President of the United States, postponed.

"The second question, viz: 'Shall the commissioners be instructed to pursue any other measure respecting the Chickasaws and Choctaws than those herein suggested?' being put, was answered in the negative.

The consideration of the remaining questions was postponed till Monday next.

MONDAY, August 24.

The Senate was to-day wholly engaged in Executive business.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES being present in the Senate Chamber, attended by General Knox.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the state of facts, and questions thereto annexed, laid before them by the President of the United States, on Saturday last. And the first question, viz: "In the present state of affairs between North Carolina and the United States, will it be proper to take any other measures for redressing the injuries of the Cherokees than the one herein suggested?" being put was answered in the negative.

The third question, viz: "If the commissioners shall adjudge that the Creek nation was fully represented at the three treaties with Georgia, and that the cessions of land were obtained with the full understanding and free consent of the acknowledged proprietors, and that the said treaties ought to be considered as just and equitable: in this case, shall the commissioners be instructed to insist on a formal renewal and confirmation thereof, and, in case of a refusal, shall they be instructed to inform the Creeks that the arms of the Union shall be employed to compel them to acknowledge the justice of the said cessions?" was wholly answered in the affirmative.

The fourth question, and its four subdivisions, viz: "But if the commissioners shall adjudge that the said treaties were formed with an inadequate or unauthorized representation of the Creek nation, or that the treaties were held under circumstances of constraint or unfairness of any sort, so that the United States could not, with justice and dignity, request or urge a confirmation thereof: in this case, shall the commissioners, considering the importance of the Oconee lands to Georgia, be instructed to use their highest exertions to obtain a cession of said lands?" If so, shall the commissioners be instructed, if they cannot obtain the said cessions on better terms, to offer for the same, and for the further great objects of attaching the Creeks to the Government of the United States, the following conditions:

"1st. A compensation, in money or goods to the amount of ——— dollars; the said amount to be stipulated to be paid by Georgia at the period which shall be fixed, or, in failure thereof, by the United States.

"2d. A secure port on the Altamaha or on St. Mary's river, or at any other place between the same, as may be mutually agreed to by the commissioners and the Creeks.

"3d. Certain pecuniary considerations to some, and honorary military distinctions to other influential chiefs, on their taking oaths of allegiance to the United States.

"4th. A solemn guarantee by the United States to the Creeks of their remaining territory, and to maintain the same, if necessary, by a line of military posts," was wholly answered in the affirmative. The blank to be filled at the discretion of the President of the United States.

The fifth question, viz: "But if all offers should fail to induce the Creeks to make the desired cession to Georgia, shall the commissioners make it an ultimatum?" was answered in the negative.

The sixth question being divided, the first part, containing as follows, viz: "If the said cessions shall not be made an ultimatum, shall the commissioners proceed and make a treaty, and include the disputed lands within the limits which shall be assigned to the Creeks?" was answered in the negative.

The remainder, viz: "If not shall a temporary boundary be marked, making the Oconee the line and the other parts of the treaty be concluded?" and "In this case shall a secure port be stipulated, and the pecuniary and honorary considerations granted?"

"In other general objects, shall the treaties formed at Hopewell, with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, be the basis of a treaty with the Creeks?" were all answered in the affirmative.

On the seventh question, viz: "Shall the sum of twenty thousand dollars, appropriated to Indian expenses and treaties, be wholly applied, if necessary, to a treaty with the Creeks? If not what proportion?" It was agreed to advise and con-

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES withdrew from the Senate Chamber, and the Vice President put the question of adjournment; to which the Senate agreed.

TUESDAY, August 25.

Mr. MACLAY presented a draft of ten miles square, including the borough of Lancaster, with a letter, containing a description of the same, from Edward Hand, directed to the Honorable ROBERT MORRIS and the Honorable WILLIAM MACLAY.

Mr. MACLAY likewise nominated Wright's Ferry, on the Susquehanna; Yorktown, west of the Susquehanna; Carlisle, west of the Susquehanna; Harrisburg, on the Susquehanna; Reading, on the Schuylkill; and Germantown, in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, as different places in Pennsylvania, which had been proposed for the permanent seat of Government of the United States.

The letter being read, was, together with the draft, ordered to lie for consideration.

Proceeded to the third reading of the bill for registering and clearing of vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes; and

Resolved, That the Senate do concur therein with sixty-nine amendments.

Also, the bill to establish the Treasury Department, with an adherence of the House of Representatives to a part of the eighth amendment, to wit: "Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office of Secretary, the assistant shall, during the vacancy, have the charge and custody of the records, books, and papers, appertaining to the said office."

Also, the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 24th of August, "that the Vice President and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses on the twenty-second day of September next, to meet again on the first Monday in December next."

Also, the resolve of the House of Representatives, "that certain articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States;" and requested the concurrence of the Senate therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 24th of August, "to adhere to the part of their eighth amendment," before recited, and,

On motion that the Senate do recede therefrom, the yeas and nays being required by one-fifth of the Senators present, the determination was as follows:

YEA—Messrs. Bassett, Carroll, Ellsworth, Elmer, Henry, King, Morris, Paterson, Read, and Schuyler—10.

NAY—Messrs. Butler, Dalton, Few, Gunn, Johnson, Izard, Langdon, Lee, MacLay, and Wingate—10.

The Senate being equally divided, the Vice President determined the question in the affirmative. So it was Resolved, That the Senate do recede from so much of the eighth amendment as was disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 24th of August, proposing "that the Vice President and Speaker be empowered to adjourn the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, on the 22d of September, &c.; and it was agreed to.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, with seventeen articles to be proposed as additions to, and amendments of, the Constitution of the United States. [Such of these articles as have been agreed to, and ratified, will be found in the appendix to this volume.]

Resumed the consideration of the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses.

Ordered, That it be committed to Messrs. King, MORRIS, CARROLL, IZARD, and LEE.

WEDNESDAY, August 26.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States; and, after progress, adjourned.

The Senate entered on Executive business.

Proceeded to consider the report of a committee, appointed June the 10th, on Indian treaties made at Fort Harmar, the 9th day of January, 1789, viz:

The committee, to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of the 25th of May, 1789, with the Indian treaties and papers accompanying the same, report:

That the Governor of the Western Territory, on the 9th day of January, 1789, at Fort Harmar, entered into two treaties; one with the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, the Mohawks excepted; the other with the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawattima, and Sac nations; that those treaties were made in pursuance of the power and instructions heretofore given to the said Governor by the late Congress, and are a confirmation of the treaties of Fort Stanwix, in October, 1784, and of Fort McIntosh, in January, 1785, and contain a more formal and regular conveyance to the United States of the Indian claims to the lands yielded to these States by the said treaties of 1784 and 1785.

Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution, viz:

That the treaties concluded at Fort Harmar, on the 9th day of January, 1789, between Arthur St. Clair, Esq., Governor of the Western Territory, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, (the Mohawks excepted,) and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawattima, and Sac nations, be accepted; and that the President of the United States be advised to execute and enjoin an observance of the same.

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

THURSDAY, September 3.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the first, second, and third amendments, and had agreed to all the others.

Also, the bill to suspend part of the act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States.

FRIDAY, September 4.

The Senate proceeded in the consideration of the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 24th of August, on "Articles to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States."

MONDAY, September 7.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded in the third reading of the bill to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States, and for other purposes; and, on the report of the committee,

Resolved, To concur therein, with amendments. The Senate proceeded in the third reading of the bill for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks; and

Resolved, to concur therein, with amendments. The bill to suspend part of an act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, was read the first time.

Ordered, That this bill be read the second time to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 2d of September, on their disagreement to the first, second, and third amendments of the Senate to the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses.

On motion, that the Senate do adhere to their first amendment to the said bill;

And the yeas and nays being required by one-fifth of the Senators present, the determination was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bassett, Butler, Dalton, Ellsworth, Gunn, Henry, Johnson, Izard, King, Lee, Morris, and Read—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Carroll, Elmer, Paterson, Schuyler, and Wingate—5.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate do adhere to the first amendment to the said bill.

Resolved, That the Senate do recede from their second and third amendments to the said bill.

Proceeded in the third reading of the bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States; and, on motion of the committee,

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the said bill, with the following amendments, to wit: In the compensation to the Vice President, strike out "five thousand," and insert "six thousand."

Ordered, That the Secretary do carry the bill to the House of Representatives, and request their concurrence in the amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 24th of August, on "Articles to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States."

On motion, to adopt the twelfth article of the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives, amended by the addition of these words to the article, to wit: "where the consideration exceeds twenty dollars;" it passed in the affirmative.

On motion to adopt the thirteenth article of the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion to adopt the fourteenth article of the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives, it passed in the negative.

In the consideration of the fifteenth article proposed by the House of Representatives, on motion to add the following to the proposed amendments, to wit: "That the General Government of the United States ought never to impose direct taxes, but where the moneys arising from the duties of impost and excise are insufficient for the public exigencies; nor then, until Congress shall have made a requisition upon the States to assess, levy, and pay their respective portions of such requisitions; and in case any State shall neglect or refuse to pay its proportion, pursuant to such requisition, then Congress may assess and levy such State's proportion, together with interest thereon, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time of payment prescribed by such requisition;" it passed in the negative.

On motion to add the following to the proposed amendments, viz: "That the third section of the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States ought to be amended, by inserting the word "other" between the words "no" and "religions;" it passed in the negative.

TUESDAY, September 8.

The Senate proceeded in the consideration of the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 24th of August, "On articles to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as amendments to the Constitution of the United States." Several amendments were proposed, but none of them were agreed to. The subject was postponed till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, September 16.

The following Message from the President of the United States, was received by the Secretary of War:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The Governor of the Western Territory has made a statement to me of the reciprocal hostilities of the Wabash Indians, and the people inhabiting the frontiers bordering on the river Ohio, which I herewith lay before Congress.

The United States, in Congress assembled, by their acts of the 21st day of July, 1787, and of the 12th August, 1788, made a provisional arrangement for calling forth the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania, in the proportions therein specified.

As the circumstances which occasioned the said arrangement continue nearly the same, I think proper to suggest to your consideration the expediency of making some temporary provision for calling forth the militia of the United States for the purposes stated in the Constitution, which would embrace the cases apprehended by the Governor of the Western Territory.

Ordered, That the last mentioned bill, together with the amendments, be committed to Messrs. ELLSWORTH, BUTLER, and PATERSON.

The Senate entered on Executive business.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

It doubtless is important that all treaties and compacts formed by the United States with other nations, whether civilized or not, should be made with caution, and executed with fidelity.

It is said to be the general understanding and practice of nations, as a check on the mistakes and indiscretions of ministers or commissioners, not to consider any treaty negotiated and signed by such officers, as final and conclusive, until ratified by the Sovereign or Government from whom they derive their powers. This practice has been adopted by the United States respecting their treaties with European nations, and I am inclined to think it would be advisable to observe it in the conduct of our treaties with the Indians; for, though such treaties being, on their part, made by their chiefs or rulers, need not be ratified by them, yet, being formed on our part by the agency of subordinate officers, it seems to be both prudent and reasonable that their acts should not be binding on the nation until approved and ratified by the Government. It strikes me that this point should be well considered and settled, so that our national proceedings, in this respect, may become uniform, and be directed by fixed and stable principles.

The treaties with certain Indian nations, which were laid before you with my message of the 25th May last, suggested two questions to my mind, viz: 1st, Whether those treaties were to be considered as perfected, and consequently, as obligatory, without being ratified? If not, then 2dly, Whether both, or either, and which of them, ought to be ratified? On these questions I request your opinion and advice.

You have, indeed, advised me "to execute and enter into an observance of" the treaty with the Wyandots, &c. You, gentlemen, doubtless intended to be clear and explicit; and yet, without further explanation, I fear I may misunderstand your meaning: for if by my executing that treaty you mean that I should make it (in a more particular and immediate manner than it now is) the act of Government, then it follows that I am to ratify it. If you mean by my executing it, that I am to see that it is carried into effect and operation, then I am led to conclude, either that you consider it as being perfect and obligatory in its present state, and therefore to be executed and observed; or, that you consider it to derive its completion and obligation from the silent approbation and ratification which my proclamation may be construed to imply. Although I am inclined to think that the latter is your intention, yet it certainly is best that all doubts respecting it be removed. Permit me to observe, that it will be proper for me to be informed of your sentiments relative to the treaty with the Six Nations, previous to the departure of the Governor of the Western Territory; and therefore I recommend it to your early consideration.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

September 17, 1789.

Ordered, That the President's Message be committed to Messrs. CARROLL, KING, and READ.

FRIDAY, September 18.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, which informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had agreed to postpone the consideration of the bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, which had passed the Senate, and was sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence, until the next session of Congress. It also brought up a resolve of the House of Representatives making it "the duty of the Secretary of State to procure, from time to time, such of the statutes of the several States as may not be in his office," to which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The Senate proceeded to the second reading of the bill to regulate processes in the courts of the United States.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The resolve of the House of Representatives of the 18th September, empowering the Secretary of State to procure, from time to time, such of the statutes of the several States as may not be in his office, was read; whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the above resolution sent up for concurrence by the House of Representatives.

The Senate entered on Executive business.

Mr. CARROLL, on behalf of the committee appointed yesterday, reported as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred a Message from the President of the United States of the 17th September, 1789, report:

That the signature of treaties with the Indian nations has ever been considered as a full completion thereof, and that such treaties have never been solemnly ratified by either of the contracting parties, as hath been commonly practised among the civilized nations of Europe: wherefore, the committee are of opinion, that the formal ratification of the treaty concluded at Fort Harmar, on the 9th day of January, 1789, between Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Western Territory, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawattama, and Sac nations, is not expedient or necessary; and that the resolve of the Senate of the 8th September, 1789, respecting the said treaty, authorizes the President of the United States to enjoy a due observance thereof.

That, as to the treaty made at Fort Harmar, on the 9th of January, 1789, between the said Arthur St. Clair and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, (except the Mohawks,) from particular circumstances affecting a part of the ceded lands, the Senate did not judge it expedient to pass any act concerning the same.

Ordered, That the consideration of the report be postponed until Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the Message from the President of the United States, of September 11th, nominating William McPherson as surveyor of the port of Philadelphia; and, Upon the question to advise and consent to his appointment, it passed in the affirmative.

SATURDAY, September 19.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded in the second reading of the bill to regulate processes in the courts of the United States.

Ordered, That the rules be so far dispensed with, as that the last recited bill have the third reading at this time. Ordered, That the bill be engrossed.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up a bill for amending part of an act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States to which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Ordered, That the last recited bill now have the first reading.

Ordered, That the rules be so far dispensed with, as that this bill have a second reading at this time.

Ordered, That this bill have the third reading on Monday next.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up the bill for allowing certain compensation to the Judges of the Supreme and other Courts, and to the Attorney General of the United States; and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had agreed to all the amendments proposed to the said bill, except the fourth, to which they had disagreed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the disagreement of the House of Representatives to their fourth amendment to the bill last recited; and,

Resolved, That the Senate do recede therefrom.

MONDAY, September 21.

Mr. MORRIS, in behalf of the Senators from the State of Pennsylvania, introduced a resolve, of the General Assembly of that State, of March the 5th 1789, making "a respectful offer to Congress of the use of any or all the public buildings in Philadelphia, the property of the State, &c., in case Congress should, at any time, incline to make choice of that city for the temporary residence of the Federal Government," which was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up a resolve of the House of this date, to agree to the 2d, 4th, 8th, 12th, 13th, 16th, 18th, 19th, 25th, and 26th amendments, proposed by the Senate, to "Articles of amendment to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States;" and to disagree to the 1st, 3d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 14th, 15th, 17th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th amendments; two-thirds of the members present concurring on each vote; and "that a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to," and that Messrs. MADISON, SHERMAN, and VIVING, be appointed managers of the same on the part of the House of Representatives.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States to pass laws, making it expressly the duty of the keepers of their jails to receive, and safe keep therein, all prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, until they shall be discharged by due course of the laws thereof, under the like penalties as in the case of prisoners committed under the authority of such States respectively; the United States to pay for the use and keeping of such jails, at the rate of fifty cents per month for each prisoner thereof, during the time such prisoners shall be therein confined; and, also, to support such of said prisoners as shall be committed for offences.

TUESDAY, September 22.

A message from the House of Representatives brought up an order of the House of Representatives, for postponing the adjournment of Congress until the 26th of September, for concurrence.

The Senate proceeded to consider the order of the House of Representatives of this day, "re-scinding the order to the Vice President, and Speaker, of the 25th of August, to adjourn the respective Houses of Congress on the 22d, and empowering them to adjourn the same on the 26th instant;" and,

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the said order.

Ordered, That the bill to establish the seat of Government of the United States have the first reading at this time.

Ordered, That it be read a second time to-morrow.

The Senate entered on Executive business.

They proceeded to consider the report of the committee, appointed the 17th, on the President's Message of that date; and,

On motion to postpone the report, to substitute the following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent that the President of the United States ratify the treaty concluded at Fort Harmar, on the 9th day of January, 1789, between Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Western Territory, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pottawattama, and Sac nations.

It passed in the affirmative.

And it being suggested that the treaty concluded at Fort Harmar, on the 9th day of January, 1789, between Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Western Territory, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, (except the Mohawks,) may be construed to prejudice the claims of the States of Massachusetts and New York, and of the grantees under the said States, respectively;

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed until next session of Senate.

So it passed in the negative.

On motion to amend the second section, to read as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint three commissioners, who are, under his direction, to locate a district, not exceeding ten miles square, in the said counties, and including therein the said Northern Liberties and town of Germantown, and to purchase such quantity of land within the same as may be necessary, and to accept grants of lands for the use of the United States, and to erect thereon, within four years, suitable buildings for the accommodation of the Congress and of the officers of the United States."

It passed in the affirmative.

On motion to strike out the two last sections, and to substitute the following:

"Provided, That no powers herein vested in the President of the United States, shall be carried into effect until the State of Pennsylvania, or individual citizens of the same, shall give satisfactory security to the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish and pay, as the same may be necessary, one hundred thousand dollars, to be employed in erecting the said buildings."

It passed in the affirmative.

Ordered, That this bill be read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had passed a resolve requesting "the President of the United States to transmit to the Executives of the several States, which have ratified the Constitution, copies of the amendments proposed by Congress to be added thereto; and like copies to the Executives of the States of Rhode Island and North Carolina; and that the House requested the concurrence of the Senate therein. It also informed the Senate, that the House of Representatives had passed a bill making appropriations for the service of the present year; to which concurrence was also requested.

Ordered, That the last mentioned bill be now read the first time.

Ordered, That this bill be read the second time to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to consider the Message from the House of Representatives of the 24th, with amendments to the amendments of the Senate, to "Articles to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States," and, Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had passed a resolve appointing a joint committee "to wait on the President of the United States, to request that he would recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer to be observed; and, "An act, providing for the payment of the invalid pensioners of the United States;" to all which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill to regulate processes in the courts of the United States, and

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in all the amendments except the first, in which they do not concur.

The Senate proceeded in the second reading of the bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress. It was read the third time.

SATURDAY, September 26.

The following Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES, by Mr. Jay:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Having yesterday received a letter written in this month, by the Governor of Rhode Island, at the request, and in behalf, of the General Assembly of that State, addressed to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the eleven United States of America in Congress assembled, I take the earliest opportunity of laying a copy of it before you.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

September 26, 1789.

Ordered, That the Message, together with the letter therein referred to, lie for consideration.

Resolved, That the order of the 22d instant, directing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, to adjourn their respective Houses on this day, be rescinded; and, instead thereof, that they be directed to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 29th instant.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had concurred in the above resolve. The Senate proceeded to the second reading of the bill making appropriations for the service of the present year.

On motion that the further consideration of this bill be postponed to the next session of Congress, it passed in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, September 29.

The following Communications from the President were received by Mr. Jay:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

His Most Christian Majesty, by a letter dated the 7th of June last, addressed to the President and members of the General Congress of the United States of North America, announces the much lamented death of his son, the Dauphin. The generous conduct of the French monarch and nation towards this country renders every event that may affect his or their prosperity interesting to us; and I shall take care to assure him of the sensibility with which the United States participate in the affliction which a loss so much to be regretted must have occasioned, both to him and to them.

SEPTEMBER 29.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Having been yesterday informed by a joint committee of both Houses of Congress that they had agreed to a recess, to commence this day, and to continue until the first Monday of January next, I take the earliest opportunity of acquainting you, that, considering how long and laborious this session has been, and the reasons which, I presume, have produced this resolution, it does not appear to me expedient to recommend any measures to their consideration at present, or now to call your attention, gentlemen, to any of those matters in my department which require your advice and consent, and yet remain to be despatched.

Proceedings.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House had concurred in all the amendments to the bill to recognize and adapt to the Constitution of the United States the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, except the seventh, to which they had disagreed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the last amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, on the bill to recognize and adapt to the Constitution of the United States the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, and for other purposes therein mentioned; and, Resolved, To insist on the said seventh amendment.

Ordered, That the Secretary do acquaint the House of Representatives herewith.

The Senate proceeded to the third reading of the bill to allow the Baron de Glaubeck the pay of a captain in the army of the United States.

Resolved, That this bill do pass.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had passed the following resolve, to which the concurrence of the Senate was requested: "Ordered, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House, at the end of each session, to send a printed copy of the journals thereof, respectively, to the supreme Executives and to each branch of the Legislature of every State;" it also informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had receded from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the Senate to a bill to recognize and adapt to the Constitution of the United States the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, and for other purposes therein mentioned; and that the House had passed the bill to allow the Baron de Glaubeck the pay of a captain in the army of the United States.

The Senate proceeded to consider the last recited order of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Senate do concur therein. A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives had finished the business of the session, and were ready to adjourn, agreeably to the order of the two Houses of Congress.

The Senate entered on Executive business.

They confirmed the appointment of William Carmichael, as Chargé des Affaires from the United States of America to the Court of Spain; and, also, a number of officers of the army; which nominations differ from the existing arrangement only in the following cases, to wit:

Lieutenant Erikuries Beatty promoted to a vacant captaincy in the infantry; Ensign Edward Spear promoted to a vacant lieutenantancy of artillery; Jacob Meleher, who has been serving as a volunteer, to be an ensign, vice Benjamin Lawrence, who was appointed nearly three years past, and has never been mustered or joined the troops; which were all confirmed.

The business of the session being brought to a close, the Vice President, agreeably to the resolve of the two Houses on the 28th instant, adjourned the Senate to the first Monday in January next, then to meet at the City Hall, in the city of New York.

From Pennsylvania—FREDERICK AUGUSTUS MUHLBERG, THOMAS HARTLEY, PETER MUHLBERG, and DANIEL HEISTER.

From Virginia—ALEXANDER WHITE.

From South Carolina—THO'S. TUDOR TUCKER.

A quorum of the members not being present, the House adjourned until to-morrow, at eleven o'clock.

MONDAY, March 23.

The following members appeared, to wit: From New Jersey, ELIAS BOUDINOT; and from Maryland, WILLIAM SMITH.

No additional member appeared on the 24th.

WEDNESDAY, March 25.

JONATHAN PARKER, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

No additional member arrived until the 30th instant.

MONDAY, March 30.

GEORGE GALE, from Maryland, and THEODO- RICK BLAND, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats.

No additional member on the 31st instant.

WEDNESDAY, April 1.

Two other members appeared, to wit: JAMES SCHUREMAN, from New Jersey, and THOMAS SCOTT, from Pennsylvania, who forming a quorum of the whole body, it was, on motion, Resolved, That this House will proceed to the choice of a Speaker by ballot.

The House accordingly proceeded to ballot for a Speaker, when it was found that a majority of the votes were in favor of FREDERICK AUGUSTUS MUHLBERG, one of the Representatives from Pennsylvania. Whereupon, Mr. MUHLBERG was conducted to the Chair, from whence he made his acknowledgments to the House for so distinguished an honor.

The House then proceeded in the same manner to the appointment of a Clerk, when it was found that Mr. JOHN BECKLEY was elected.

On motion, Ordered, That the members do severally deliver in their credentials at the Clerk's table.

THURSDAY, April 2.

LAMBERT CADWALADER, from New Jersey, appeared and took his seat.

On motion, Ordered, That a committee be appointed to

THURSDAY, March 5.

Several other members attended, viz: from New Hampshire, NICHOLAS GILMAN; from Massachusetts, BENJAMIN GOODHUE; from Connecticut, ROGER SHERMAN and JONATHAN STURGIS; and from Pennsylvania, HENRY WYNKOOP; and no other members arriving, a quorum not being present, the House adjourned, from day to day, until the 14th instant.

SATURDAY, March 14.

A quorum not being yet present, the House adjourned, from day to day, until the 17th instant.

TUESDAY, March 17.

SAMUEL GRIFFIN, from Virginia, took his seat.

WEDNESDAY, March 18.

ANDREW MOORE, from Virginia, took his seat.

No other member appearing, the House adjourned, from day to day, until the 23d instant.

prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceedings as may be proper to be observed in this House. And the following members were named on said committee, to wit: Messrs. GILMAN, GERRY, WADSWORTH, BOUNDINOT, HARTMAN, LEVY, SMITH, LEE, TUCKER, MADISON, SHERMAN, and GOODHUE.

Resolved, That a Doorkeeper and Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed for the service of this House.

On motion,
Ordered, That it be an instruction to the committee appointed to prepare and report such Standing Rules and Orders of proceedings as may be proper to be observed in this House, that they also report the duty and services of a Sergeant-at-arms, or other proper officer for enforcing the orders of the House.

FRIDAY, April 3.
GEORGE CLYMER, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat.

SATURDAY, April 4.
GEORGE PARTRIDGE, from Massachusetts, appeared and took his seat.

MONDAY, April 6.
DANIEL CARROLL, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a bill to regulate the taking the oath of affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution; and that Messrs. WHITE, MADISON, TRUMBULL, GILMAN, and CADWALLADER, do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion,
Resolved, That the form of the oath to be taken by the members of this House, as required by the third clause of the sixth article of the Constitution of the Government of the United States, be as followeth, to wit: "I, A. B., a representative of the United States in the Congress thereof, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) in the presence of Almighty God, that I will support the Constitution of the United States. So help me God."

A message from the Senate, by Mr. ELLSWORTH:
Mr. Speaker: I am charged by the Senate to inform this House, that a quorum of the Senate is now formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the Electors of the several States, in a choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in presence of this House, to discharge that duty. I have it also in further charge to inform this House that the Senate has appointed one of its members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of this House to appoint one or more of its members for the like purpose.

On motion,
Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate.

pose expressed in the message from the Senate; and that Mr. PARKER and Mr. HARTER be appointed, on the part of this House, to sit at the Clerk's table with the member of the Senate, and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared.

Mr. SPEAKER accordingly left the Chair, and, attended by the House, withdrew to the Senate Chamber, and after some time returned to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair.
Mr. PARKER and Mr. HARTER then delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the Electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the UNITED STATES, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of this House, which was ordered to be entered on the Journal.

On motion,
Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that it is the desire of this House that the notifications of the election of the President and Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons, and in such manner, as the Senate shall be pleased to direct; and that Mr. MADISON do communicate the said message.

TUESDAY, April 7.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Mayor of the city of New York, covering certain resolutions of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the said city, appropriating the City Hall for the accommodation of the General Government of the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOUNDINOT, from the committee appointed to prepare such Rules and Orders of proceedings as may be proper to be observed in this House, made the following report:

"The committee to whom it was referred to prepare such Standing Rules and Orders of proceedings as may be proper to be observed in this House, have, according to order, prepared the same, and agreed to the following report:
Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the rules and orders following are proper to be established as the Standing Rules and Orders of this House, to wit:

I.—Touching the duty of the Speaker.
He shall take the chair every day at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day; shall immediately call the members to order, and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the journal of the preceding day to be read.

He shall preserve decorum and order; may speak to points of order in preference to other members, rising from his seat for that purpose, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two members.

He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting.
Questions shall be distinctly put in this form, viz: "As many as are of opinion that—(as the question may be) say Aye: And, after the affirmative voice is expressed—"As many as are of a contrary opinion, say No."

If the Speaker doubts, or a division be called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative going to the right, and those in the negative to the left of the chair. If the Speaker still doubts, or a count be required, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side, to tell the numbers in the affirmative; which being reported, he shall then name two others, one from each side, to tell those in the negative; which being also reported, he shall rise and state the decision to the House.

The Speaker shall appoint committees, unless it be determined by the House that the committee shall consist of more than three members, in which case the appointment shall be by ballot of the House.

In all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases he shall not vote, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal, and in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost.

II. Of Decorum and Debate.

When the House adjourns, the members shall keep their seats until the Speaker go forth; and then the members shall follow.

When any member is about to speak in debate, or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise from his seat, and respectfully address himself to Mr. Speaker.

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, and the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House.

When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak.

No member shall speak more than twice to the same question, without leave of the House; not more than once, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Whilst the Speaker is putting any question, or addressing the House, none shall walk out or across the House; nor either in such case, or when a member is speaking, shall entertain private discourse, or read any printed book or paper; nor whilst a member is speaking, shall pass between him and the chair.

No member shall vote on any question, in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested; or in any other case where he was not present when the question was put.

Every member who shall be in the House when a question is put, shall vote on one side or the other, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him.

When a motion is made and seconded, it shall be stated by the Speaker; or being in writing, it shall be handed to the Chair, and read aloud by the Clerk before debated.

Every motion shall be reduced to writing, if the Speaker or any member desire it.

After a motion is stated by the Speaker, or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

[H. OF R.]

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received, unless to amend it, to commit it for the previous question, or to adjourn.

A motion to adjourn shall always be in order, and shall be decided without debate.

The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by five members; and until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment and further debate of the main question.

On a previous question no member shall speak more than once without leave.

Any member may call for the division of a question, where the sense will admit of it.

A motion for commitment, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House.

No new motion or proposition shall be admitted, under color of amendment, as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate.

Committees consisting of more than three members shall be ballotted for by the House; if upon such ballot, the number required shall not be elected by a majority of the votes given, the House shall proceed to a second ballot, in which a plurality of votes shall prevail; and in case a greater number than are required to compose or complete the committee shall have an equal number of votes, the House shall proceed to a further ballot or ballots.

In all other cases of ballot than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and where there shall not be such majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained.

In all cases where others than members of the House may be eligible, there shall be a previous nomination.

If a question depending be lost by adjournment of the House, and revived on the succeeding day, no member who has spoken twice on the day preceding shall be permitted to speak again without leave.

Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate shall be necessary, shall be read to the House, and laid on the table, on a day preceding that on which the same shall be moved, unless the House shall otherwise expressly allow.

Petitions, memorials, and other papers addressed to the House, shall be presented through the Speaker, or by a member in his place, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their first being read, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order they were read.

Any fifteen members (including the Speaker, if there be one,) shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

Upon calls of the House, or in taking the ayes and noes on any question, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically.

III. Of Bills.

Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House on the report of a committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice, at least, shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill; and every such motion may be committed.

Every bill shall receive three several readings in the House previous to its passage; and all bills shall be despatched in order as they were introduced, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but no bill shall be twice read on the same day without special order of the House.

The first reading of a bill shall be for information, and if opposition be made to it, the question shall be, "Shall the bill be rejected?" If no opposition be made, or the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question.

Upon the second reading of a bill, the Speaker shall state it as ready for commitment or engrossment, and, if committed, then a question shall be, whether to a Select Committee, or to a Committee of the whole House; if to a Committee of the whole House, the House shall determine on what day. But if the bill be ordered to be engrossed, the House shall appoint a day when it shall be read the third time. After commitment, and a report thereof to the House, a bill may be re-committed, or at any time before its passage.

All bills ordered to be engrossed shall be executed in a fair round hand.

The enacting style of bills shall be, "Be it enacted by the Senators and Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled."

When a bill shall pass, it shall be certified by the Clerk, noting the day of its passing at the foot thereof. No bill amended by the Senate shall be committed.

IV.—Of Committees of the whole House.

It shall be a standing order of the day, throughout the session, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. In forming a Committee of the whole House, the Speaker shall leave his chair, and a Chairman to preside in committee shall be appointed.

Upon bills committed to a Committee of the whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered. The body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk, on a separate paper, and so resubmitted to the Committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses, before a question to engross it be taken.

All amendments made to an original motion in committee, shall be incorporated with the motion, and so reported.

All amendments made to a report committed to a Committee of the whole, shall be noted and reported as in the case of bills.

All questions, whether in committee or in the House, shall be propounded in the order they were moved, except that, in filling up blanks, the largest sum and longest day shall be first put.

The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in committee, so far as they may be applicable, except that limiting the times of speaking.

On motion,

Ordered, That the Chief Justice of the State of New York be requested to attend this House, at the hour of its meeting to-morrow, for the purpose of administering to the Speaker, and other members of the House, the oath required by the Constitution, in the form agreed to yesterday.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 8.

Two other members, to wit: JOHN LAWRENCE, from New York, and THOMAS FITZSIMONS, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took their seats.

The Chief Justice of the State of New York attended, agreeably to the order of yesterday, and administered the oath required by the Constitution, in the form agreed to on Monday last, first to Mr. SPEAKER in his place, and then to the other members of the House present, to wit: Fisher Ames, Elias Boudinot, Theodore Bland, Lambert Cadwalader, George Clymer, Daniel Carroll, Thomas Fitzsimons, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Elbridge Gerry, George Gale, Samuel Griffin, Benjamin Huntington, Thomas Leonard, Richard Bland Lee, John Lawrence, Peter Muhlenberg, James Madison, Junr., Andrew Moore, George Partridge, John Page, Josiah Parker, Jonathan Sturges, Roger Sherman, James Schureman, William Smith, Thomas Scott, Geo. Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Henry Wynkoop, and Alexander White.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

On motion, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON.—I take the liberty, Mr. Chairman, at this early stage of the business, to introduce to the committee a subject, which appears to me to be of the greatest magnitude; a subject, sir, that requires our first attention, and our united exertions.

No gentleman here can be unacquainted with the numerous claims upon our revenue; nor with the impotency which prevented the late Congress of the United States from carrying into effect the dictates of gratitude and policy.

The Union, by the establishment of a more effective Government, having recovered from the state of imbecility that heretofore prevented a performance of its duty, ought, in its first act, to revive those principles of honor and honesty that have too long lain dormant.

The deficiency in our Treasury has been too notorious to make it necessary for me to advert upon that subject. Let us content ourselves with endeavoring to remedy the evil. To do this a national revenue must be obtained; but the system must be such a one, that while it secures the object of revenue, it shall not be oppressive to our constituents. Happy it is for us that such a system is within our power; for I apprehend that both these objects may be obtained from an impost on articles imported into the United States.

In pursuing this measure, I know that two points occur for our consideration. The first respects the general regulation of commerce; which, in my opinion, ought to be as free as the policy of nations will admit. The second relates to revenue alone; and this is the point I mean more particularly to bring into the view of the committee.

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

Not being at present possessed of sufficient materials for fully elucidating these points, and our situation admitting of no delay, I shall propose such articles of regulation only as are likely to occasion the least difficulty.

The propositions made on this subject by Congress in 1783, having received, generally, the approbation of the several States of the Union, in some form or other, seem well calculated to become the basis of the temporary system, which I wish the committee to adopt. I am well aware that the changes which have taken place in many of the States, and in our public circumstances, since that period, will require, in some degree, a deviation from the scale of duties then affixed; nevertheless, for the sake of that expedition which is necessary, in order to embrace the Spring importations, I should recommend a general adherence to the plan.

This, sir, with the addition of a clause or two on the subject of tonnage, I will now read, and with leave, submit it to the committee, hoping it may meet their approbation, as an expedient remedy eligible by the urgent occasion there is for the speedy supplies of the federal treasury, and a speedy rescue of our trade from its present anarchy.

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the following duties ought to be levied on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, viz:

On rum, per gallon, — of a dollar; on all other spirituous liquors, — on molasses, — on Madeira wine, — on all other wines, — on common bobea tea per lb., — on all other teas, — on pepper, — on brown sugars, — on loaf sugars, — on all other sugars, — on cocoa and coffee, — on all other articles, — per cent. on their value at the time and place of importation.

That there ought, moreover, to be levied on all vessels in which goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported, the duties following, viz: On all vessels built within the United States, and belonging wholly to citizens thereof, at the rate of — per ton.

On all vessels belonging wholly to the subjects of Powers with whom the United States have formed treaties, or partly to the subjects of such Powers, and partly to citizens of the said States, at the rate of — On all vessels belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of other Powers, at the rate of —

Mr. BOUNDINOT.—The necessity of adopting some measure, like the one proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, is too apparent to need any argument in its support. The plan which he has submitted to the committee, appears to be simple and sufficiently complete for the present purpose; I shall, therefore, for my own part, be content with it, and shall move you, sir, that the blanks be filled up in the manner they were recommended to be charged by Congress in 1783. My reason for this is, that those sums have been approved by the Legislatures of every State represented on this floor, and of consequence must have been agreeable to the sense of our constituents at that time; and, I believe, nothing since has intervened to give us reason to believe they have made an alteration in their sentiments.

Mr. WHITE.—I wish filling up the blanks may be deferred until the business is more matured; nor will this be attended with a loss of time, because the forms necessary to complete a bill will require so much as to give gentlemen leisure to consider the proper quantum of impost to be laid, as well as the enumerated articles as on the common mass of merchandise rated ad valorem; for, as was hinted by my colleague, something may have occurred to render an alteration in the sums recommended in 1783 in some degree necessary; and if so, time will be given to consider the subject with more attention in the progress of the bill, and no unnecessary delay can arise; wherefore, I move you, sir, that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MADISON.—I do not consider it at this moment necessary to fill up the blanks, nor had I it in contemplation at the time I offered the proposition. I supposed that most of the gentlemen would wish time to think upon the principles generally, and upon the articles particularly; while others, who, from their situation and advantages in life, are more conversant on this subject, may be induced to turn their particular attention to a subject they are well able to do justice to, and to assist the committee with their knowledge and information; unless such gentlemen are now prepared and disposed to proceed in filling up the blanks, I shall second the motion for the committee's rising.

Mr. PARKER.—As it is impossible that gentlemen should be prepared to go into the immediate discussion of my worthy colleague's motion for raising an impost, I shall heartily concur in the motion for the committee's rising.

The question on rising being put, was agreed to; when

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. PAGE reported progress.

Adjourned until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 9.

EGBERT BENSON, from New York, and ISAAC COLES, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. BOUNDINOT, from the committee appointed to prepare rules for the government of the House, made a further report; which, being read, was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEONARD and Mr. WYNKOOP asked and obtained leave of absence.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Esq., a member of the Senate, stating the appointment of a committee of that House to confer with a committee to be appointed on the part of this House, in preparing a system of rules to govern the two Houses in cases of conference, and to regulate the appointment of Chaplains.

Whereupon, Messrs. BOUNDINOT, SHERMAN,

TUCKER, MADISON, and BLAND, were elected by ballot for that purpose.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PACES in the Chair.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The subject of the proposition laid before the committee by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) will now, I presume, Mr. Chairman, recur for our deliberation. I imagine it to be of considerable importance, not only to the United States, but to every individual of the Union. The object of the revenue alone would place it in this situation, and in this light I mean now to consider it. If I am not mistaken, the honorable mover of the plan viewed it as a temporary system, particularly calculated to embrace the Spring importations; therefore, in order to discover whether the mode laid before you is well calculated to answer this end, it will be proper to consider its operation. The plan consists of certain distinct propositions; one part is intended to lay a specific sum on enumerated articles, the other a certain per cent. ad valorem: perhaps simplifying the system may be productive of happy consequences, and it strikes me that confusion and perplexity will be best avoided by such a measure; hence, it may be proper to lay a duty at a certain rate per cent. on the value of all articles, without attempting an enumeration of any; because, if we attempt to specify every article, it will expose us to a question which must require more time than can be spared, to obtain the object that appears to be in the view of the committee. A question, I say, sir, will arise, whether the enumeration embraces every article that will bear a duty, and whether the duty to be affixed is the proper sum the article is able to bear. On this head, sir, I believe that the committee have not materials sufficient to form even the basis of the system, beside being wholly incompetent to determine the rate most advantageous to the article of revenue, and most agreeable to the interest and convenience of our constituents. Knowledge on these points can only be obtained by experience; but hitherto we have had none, at least of a general nature. The partial regulations made by the States, throw but little light on the subject, and its magnitude ought to induce us to use the greatest degree of caution.

A system of the nature which I hinted at, will, in my opinion, be not only less complex and difficult in its formation, but likewise easier and more certain in its operation; because the more simple a plan of revenue is, the easier it becomes understood and executed: and it is, sir, an earnest wish of mine, that all our acts should partake of this nature. Moreover, by adopting the plan I have mentioned, you will embrace the Spring importations and give time for digesting and maturing one upon more perfect principles; and, as the proposed system is intended to be but a temporary one, that I esteem to be best which requires the least time to form it.

With great deference I have submitted these sentiments to the committee, as what occurred to me to be the better plan of the two; though, I must own, it is a subject on which I am not so fully informed as I wish to be, and therefore hope the indulgence of the committee in considering it.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I observe, Mr. Chairman, by what the gentlemen have said, that the proposed plan of revenue is viewed by them as a temporary system, to be continued only until proper materials are brought forward and arranged in more perfect form. I confess, sir, that I carry my views on this subject much further; that I earnestly wish such a one which, in its operation, will be some way adequate to our present situation, as it respects our agriculture, our manufactures, and our commerce.

An honorable gentleman (Mr. LAWRENCE) has expressed an opinion that an enumeration of articles will operate to confuse the business. So far am I from seeing it in this point of view, that, on the contrary, I conceive it will tend to facilitate it. Does not every gentleman discover that, when a particular article is offered to the consideration of the committee, he will be better able to give his opinion upon it than on an aggregate impost laid on such article by individual States is more or less known to every member in the committee. It is also well known that the amount of such revenue is more accurately calculated and better to be relied on, because of the certainty of collection, less being left to the officers employed in bringing it forward to the public treasury. It being my opinion that an enumeration of articles will tend to clear away difficulties, I wish as many to be selected as possible; for this reason I have prepared myself with an additional number, which I wish subjoined to those already mentioned in the motion on your table; among these are some calculated to encourage the productions of our country, and protect our infant manufactures; besides others tending to operate as sumptuary restriction upon articles which are often termed those of luxury. The amendment I mean to offer is in these words: I shall read it in my place, and, if I am seconded, hand it to you for the consideration of the committee:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the following duties ought to be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, to wit:

[The articles enumerated for duty were beer, ale, and porter; beef, pork, butter, candles, cheese, soap, cider, boots, steel, tables, cordage, twine or pack thread, malt, nails, spikes, tacks, or brads; salt, tobacco, snuff, blank books, writing, printing, and wrapping paper; pasteboard, cabinet ware; buttons, saddles, gloves, hats, millinery, castings of iron, slit, or rolled iron; leather, shoes, slippers, and gold shoes; coach, chariot, and other four wheel carriages; chaise, sloop, or other two wheel carriages; nutmegs, cinnamon, cloves, raisins, figs, currants, almonds.]

April, 1789.]

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

This motion was seconded by Mr. SCHUREMAN. Mr. WARREN.—I shall not pretend to say that there ought not to be specific duties laid upon every one of the articles enumerated in the amendment just offered; but, I am inclined to think, that entering so minutely into the detail, will consume too much of our time, and thereby lose us a greater sum than the additional impost on the last mentioned articles will bring in; because there may be doubts whether many of them are capable of bearing an increased duty; but this, sir, is not the case with those mentioned in the motion of my colleague: for I believe it will be readily admitted on all sides, that such articles as rum, wines, and sugar, have the capacity of bearing an additional duty besides a per cent. ad valorem. His system appears to be simple, and its principles, I conceive, are such as gentlemen are agreed upon, consequently a bill founded thereupon would pass this House in a few days; the operation of the law would commence early, and the treasury be furnished with money to answer the demands upon it. This law would continue until mature deliberation, ample discussion, and full information, enabled us to complete a perfect system of revenue: for, in order to charge specified articles of manufacture, so as to encourage our domestic ones, it will be necessary to examine the present state of each throughout the Union. This will certainly be a work of labor and time, and will perhaps require more of each than the committee have now in their power. Let us, therefore, act upon the principles which are admitted, and take in the most material and productive articles, leaving to a period of more leisure and information a plan to embrace the whole.

Mr. TUCKER.—In common with the other gentlemen on this floor, I consider the subject which engages our present deliberations as of very great importance as it relates to our agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; I also consider it of consequence that we should give full satisfaction to our constituents by our decision, be that whatever it may; and I think this most likely to be effected by establishing a permanent regulation, although, in the interim, a temporary system may be expedient. I wish, also, in the outset of this business, to attend to the interests of every part of the Union; this, I take it, can only be done by collecting the opinion of the members from the several States. At present, I look upon it as impracticable, because the representation from the States is not upon an equal footing; we ought to have a much fuller House than we have before we enter on the subject in its fullest extent. By looking around me, I perceive there is no representative, except myself, southward of Virginia; and whatever my opinion may be with respect to the propositions before you, I must own that I wish to be acquainted with that of my colleagues; besides, I acknowledge myself incompetent to decide at this time on a subject of such magnitude; but, even if I had more competency, I should hesitate, without I could consult with the members whose interests are inseparable from that part of the Union which I have the honor to represent.

I was in hopes, sir, that every thing which the committee had in contemplation would be secured by possessing a general impost, whilst a fuller consideration of the subject might be deferred to a future day, when the committee would have more leisure and information to enable them to determine and digest a plan capable of giving more general satisfaction.

I have no objection, sir, to go so far into the matter as to pass a law to collect an impost ad valorem, whilst it is understood to be but a temporary system; and likewise to lay a duty on such enumerated articles of importation as have been heretofore considered as proper ones by the Congress of 1783. So far, sir, the matter may be plain to us, and we run no hazard of doing any thing which may give dissatisfaction to any State in the Union. The duties proposed by the Congress of 1783 were, I believe, five per cent. on the value of all goods imported, and an additional duty on a few enumerated articles. This recommendation of Congress has been so universally received by the several States, that I think we run no risk of giving umbrage to any by adopting the plan; but the other articles, which have just been offered, are, I apprehend, to many of us so novel, and, at the same time, so important, as to make it hard to determine the propriety of taxing them in a few hours, or even in a few days.

I wish, with the honorable gentleman from New York, that the system we now adopt be considered as a temporary one, securing a duty only upon such articles of importation as are generally agreed to be proper; and, on this account, I wish the article of tonnage, mentioned in the first list of propositions, to be postponed; because, with respect to it, the different States are not upon an equal footing. It appears evidently to bear harder upon some States than upon others. In some they wish a high duty upon tonnage, even so high as to preclude the admission of foreign vessels altogether, having sufficient to carry on their whole trade within themselves. Others again wish more moderate duties, inasmuch as it may be convenient to employ foreign shipping in their commerce; whilst some others wish only such duty to be laid as to answer the sole purpose of revenue, being constrained, for want of vessels of their own, to employ foreigners in the transportation of their productions, which productions must eventually pay every charge of this nature.

I do not, sir, at this time, wish to enter into the merits of this subject; but just to state what I conceive to be the views and interests of the several States, in order that gentlemen may judge how far it would be prudent at this time to take a decisive step in matters so replete with difficulty as we see this to be, in reconciling the various and adverse interests of the Union, especially when it is considered that the vote of the committee, if carried into execution, will not place the eastern and southern States upon an equal footing.

In order to preserve the peace and tranquillity of the Union, it will become necessary that mutual deference and accommodation should take place on subjects so important as the one I have first touched upon. And, in order that this may take place, it is proper that gentlemen deliver their sentiments with freedom and candor. I have done this in a manner which I conceived it my duty to do, and shall just repeat that I wish to confine the question to that part of the motion made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Madison,) which respects laying a general impost on the value of all goods imported, and the small enumeration which precedes it: if it is in contemplation to do otherwise, I shall be under the necessity of moving for a division of the question. If I should lose this, and a high tonnage duty be insisted on, I shall be obliged to vote against the measure altogether; when, if the business is conducted on principles of moderation, I shall give my vote for it to a certain degree.

Where different interests prevail, it is to be supposed adverse sentiments will arise, and the gentlemen from those States which are interested in having a high tonnage duty laid on foreign shipping will naturally be more favorably inclined to a corresponding measure, than those from other States whose interest it would be to have little or no duty at all. Hence, all that can be expected, is such a degree of accommodation as to insure the greatest degree of general good, with the least possible evil to the individuals of the political community.

Mr. HARTLEY.—The business before the House is certainly of very great importance, and worthy of strict attention. I have observed, sir, from the conversation of some of the members, that it is in the contemplation of some to enter on this business in a limited and partial manner, as it relates to revenue alone; but, for my own part, I wish to do it on as broad a bottom as is at this time practicable. The observations of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Tucker,) may have weight in some future stage of the business, for the article of tonnage will not probably be determined for several days, before which time his colleagues may arrive and be consulted in the manner he wishes; but surely no argument, derived from that principle, can operate to discourage the committee from taking such measures as will tend to protect and promote our domestic manufactures.

If we consult the history of the ancient world, we shall see that they have thought proper, for a long time past, to give great encouragement to the establishment of manufactures, by laying such partial duties on the importation of foreign goods, as to give the home manufacturer a considerable advantage in the price when brought to market. It is also well known to this committee, that there are many articles that will bear a higher duty than others, which are to remain in the common mass, and be taxed with a certain impost ad valorem. From this view of the subject, I think it both politic and just that the fastening hand of the General Government should extend to all those manufactures which will tend to national utility. I am therefore sorry that gentlemen seem to fix their minds to so early a period as 1783; for we very well know our circumstances are much changed since that time: we had then but few manufactures among us, and the vast quantities of goods that flowed in upon us from Europe, at the conclusion of the war, rendered those few almost useless; since then we have been forced by necessity, and various other causes, to increase our domestic manufactures to such a degree as to be able to furnish some in sufficient quantity to answer the consumption of the whole Union, while others are daily growing into importance. Our stock of materials is, in many instances, equal to the greatest demand, and our artisans sufficient to work them up even for exportation. In these cases, I take it to be the policy of every enlightened nation to give their manufactures that degree of encouragement necessary to perfect them, without oppressing the other parts of the community; and, under this encouragement, the industry of the manufacturer will be employed to add to the wealth of the nation.

Many of the articles in the list proposed by my worthy colleague will have this tendency, and therefore I wish them to be received and considered by the committee; if sufficient information cannot be obtained, as to the circumstances of any particular manufacture, so as to enable the committee to determine a proper degree of encouragement, it may be relinquished; but at present it will, perhaps, be most advisable to receive the whole.

Mr. MADISON.—From what has been suggested by the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject before us, I am led to apprehend we shall be under the necessity of travelling further into an investigation of principles than what I supposed would be necessary, or had in contemplation when I offered the propositions before you.

It was my view to restrain the first essay on this subject principally to the object of revenue, and make this rather a temporary expedient than anything permanent. I see, however, that there are strong exceptions against deciding immediately on a part of the plan, which I had the honor to bring forward, as well as against an application to the resources mentioned in the list of articles just proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I presume, that, however much we may be disposed to promote domestic manufactures, we ought to pay some regard to the present policy of obtaining revenue. It may be remarked, also, that by fixing on a temporary expedient for this purpose, we may gain more than we shall lose by suspending the consideration of the other subject until we obtain fuller information of the state of our manufactures. We have at this time the strongest motives for turning our attention to the point I have mentioned; every gentleman sees that the prospect of our harvest from the Spring importations is daily vanishing; and if the committee delay levying and collecting an impost until a system of protecting duties shall be perfected, there will be no importations of any consequence on which the law is to operate, because, by that time, all the Spring vessels will have arrived. Therefore, from a pursuit of this policy, we shall suffer a loss equal to the surplus which might be expected from a system of higher duties.

I am sensible that there is great weight in the observation that fell from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Tucker,) that it will be necessary, on the one hand, to weigh and regard the sentiments of the gentlemen from the different parts of the United States; but, on the other hand, we must limit our consideration on this head, and, notwithstanding all the deference and respect we pay to those sentiments, we must consider the general interest of the Union; for this is as much every gentleman's duty to consider as is the local or State interest—and any system of impost that this committee may adopt must be founded on the principles of mutual concession.

Gentlemen will be pleased to recollect, that those parts of the Union which contribute more under one system than the other, are also those parts more thinly planted, and consequently stand most in need of national protection; therefore they will have less reason to complain of unequal burdens.

There is another consideration: the States that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade, they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions; by adopting the present Constitution, they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands; they must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here.

I am afraid, sir, on the one hand, that if we go fully into a discussion of the subject, we shall consume more time than prudence would dictate to spare; on the other hand, if we do not develop it, and see the principles on which we mutually act, we shall subject ourselves to great difficulties. I beg leave, therefore, to state the grounds on which my opinion, with respect to the matter under consideration, is founded, namely, whether our present system should be a temporary or a permanent one? In the first place, I own myself the friend to a very free system of commerce, and hold it as a truth, that commercial shackles are generally unjust, oppressive, and impolitic; it is also a truth, that if industry and labor are left to take their own course, they will generally be directed to those objects which are the most productive, and this in a more certain and direct manner than the wisdom of the most enlightened Legislature could point out. Nor do I think that the national interest is more promoted by such restrictions than that the interest of individuals would be promoted by legislative interference directing the particular application of its industry. For example, we should find no advantage in saying, that every man should be obliged to furnish himself, by his own labor, with those accommodations which depend on the mechanic arts, instead of employing his neighbor, who could do it for him on better terms. It would be of no advantage to the shoemaker to make his own clothes to save the expense of the tailor's bill, nor of the tailor to make his own shoes to save the expense of procuring them from the shoemaker. It would be better policy to suffer each of them to employ his talents in his own way. The case is the same between the exercise of the arts and agriculture—between the city and the country—and between city and town; each capable of making particular articles in abundance to supply the other: thus all are benefited by exchange, and the less this exchange is cramped by Government, the greater are the proportions of benefit to each. The same argument holds good between nation and nation, and between parts of the same nation.

In my opinion it would be proper also for gentlemen to consider the means of encouraging the great staple of America, I mean agriculture; which I think may justly be styled the staple of the United States, from the spontaneous productions which nature furnishes, and the manifest advantage it has over every other object of emolument in this country. If we compare the cheapness of our land with that of other nations, we see so decided an advantage in that cheapness, as to have full confidence of being unrivalled. With respect to the object of manufactures, other countries may and do rival us; but we may be said to have a monopoly in agriculture; the possession of the soil, and the lowness of its price, give us as much a monopoly in this case as any nation or other parts of the world have in the monopoly of any article whatever; but with this advantage to us, that it cannot be shared or injured by rivalry.

If my general principle is a good one, that commerce ought to be free, and labor and industry left at large to find its proper object, the only thing which remains will be to discover the exceptions that do not come within the rule I have laid down. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there are exceptions important in themselves, and which claim the particular attention of the committee. Although the freedom of commerce would be advantageous to the world, yet, in some particulars, one nation might suffer to benefit others, and this ought to be for the general good of society.

If America was to leave her ports perfectly free, and make no discrimination between vessels owned by her citizens and those owned by foreigners, while other nations make this discrimination, it is obvious that such policy would go to exclude American shipping altogether from foreign ports, and she would be materially affected in one of her most important interests. To this we may add another consideration, that by encouraging the means of transporting our productions with facility, we encourage the raising them; and this object, I apprehend, is likely to be kept in view by the General Government.

Duties laid on imported articles may have an effect which comes within the idea of national prudence. It may happen that materials for manufactures may grow up without any encouragement for this purpose; it has been the case in some of the States, but in others regulations have been provided, and have succeeded in producing some establishments, which ought not to be allowed to perish, from the alteration which has taken place: it would be cruel to neglect them and divert their industry to other channels; for it is not possible for the hand of man to shift from one employment to another without being injured by the change. There may be some manufactures, which, being once formed, can advance towards perfection without any adventitious aid, while others, for want of the fostering hand of Government, will be unable to go on at all. Legislative attention will therefore be necessary to collect the proper objects for this purpose, and this will form another exception to my general principle.

I observe that a sumptuary prohibition is within the view of some of the proposed articles, and forms another exception. I acknowledge that I do not, in general, think any great national advantage arises from restrictions passed on this head, because, as long as a distinction in point of value subsists, sumptuary duties, in some form or other, will prevail and take effect.

Another exception is embargoes in time of war. These may necessarily occur and shackle the freedom of commerce; but the reasons for this are so obvious, that it renders any remark unnecessary.

The next exception that occurs, is one on which great stress is laid by some well informed men, and this with great plausibility. That each nation should have within itself the means of defence, independent of foreign supplies: that in whatever relates to the operations of war, no State ought to depend upon a precarious supply from any part of the world. There may be some truth in this remark, and therefore it is proper for legislative attention. I am, though, well persuaded that the reasoning on this subject has been carried too far.

The difficulties we experienced a few years ago of obtaining military supplies, ought not to furnish too much in favor of an establishment which would be difficult and expensive; because our national character is now established and recognized throughout the world, and the laws of war favor national exertion more than intestine competition, so that there is good reason to believe that, when it becomes necessary, we may obtain supplies from abroad as readily as any other nation whatsoever. I have mentioned this because I think I see something among the enumerated articles that seems to favor such a policy.

The impost laid on trade for the purpose of obtaining revenue may likewise be considered as an exception; so far, therefore, as revenue can be more conveniently and certainly raised by this than any other method, without injury to the community, and its operation will be in due proportion to the consumption, which consumption is generally proportioned to the circumstances of individuals, I think sound policy dictates to use this means; but it will be necessary to confine our attention at this time peculiarly to the object of revenue, because the other subject involves some intricate questions, to unravel which we perhaps are not prepared. I have no objection to the committee's accepting the propositions offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because so far as we can enumerate the proper objects, and apply specific duties to them, we conform to the practice prevalent in many of the States, and adopt the most laudable method of collecting revenue; at least preferable to laying a general tax. Whether, therefore, we consult ease and convenience in collection, or pursuing habits already adopted and approved, specific duties, as far as the articles can be properly enumerated, is the most eligible mode of obtaining the end in contemplation. Upon the whole, as I think some of the propositions may be productive of revenue, and some may protect our domestic manufactures, though the latter subject ought not to be too confusedly blended with the former, I hope the committee will receive them, and let them lie over, in order that we may have time to consider how far they are consistent with justice and policy.

Mr. BOWDISH.—I believe that it will not be disputed, that the best and easiest way of supplying the public wants, is by raising a revenue on the importation of goods by way of impost, though the manner in which it should be done, I confess, is a subject on which I stand greatly in need of information. I should, therefore, most cordially comply with the request of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TUCKER) in order to obtain time for consideration, and to wait the arrival of the absent gentlemen, in order that we may have that assistance which is to be derived from them. Did I consider the question on the present motion final, I should be at a loss how to act; but this, I take it, is not the case. I presume it is intended by the mover only to lay his motion on the table, with the original propositions open for debate and consideration, till the committee are possessed of sufficient information to proceed. I also confess, that, in general, I am in favor of specific duties on enumerated articles. I shall therefore vote for the amendment; but, in doing this, I shall not consider myself as bound to support the whole, nor, indeed, any particular article which, upon due consideration, I may deem either impolitic or unjust; for I cannot conceive, that, by adopting the amendment, we tie up our hands, or prevent future discussion. No, sir, that is not the case; and as I trust we all have the same object in view, namely, the public good of the United States, so I hope that a willing ear will be lent to every proposition likely to promote this end; nor do I doubt but gentlemen are mutually inclined to sacrifice local advantages for the accomplishment of this great purpose.

I confess, sir, that I do not consider myself master of the subject, and shall therefore wait for information from those gentlemen who are best able to give it. I think we are much indebted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for going so far into the subject as his list of articles shows he has done; but I would beg of him to inform me, if there is any thing peculiar in the manufacture of glass, as I observe it is omitted in his enumeration; if there is nothing improper in adding this article, I shall certainly move for it, as I suppose we are capable of manufacturing this as well as many of the others—in fact, it is well known that we have, and can do it, as well as most nations, the materials being almost all produced in our country. If there is anything improper in it, I hope gentlemen will inform me; if there is not, I see no reason against its being enumerated with the others.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I hope there will be no difficulty in receiving the propositions I had the honor to present. When we come to consider them, article by article, for the purpose of taxing them, gentlemen will be at liberty to object; and if they offer good reasons for it, they may get them struck out; but this, I apprehend, cannot so conveniently be done in the present state of the business.

Mr. MADISON.—I suppose that the reason which induced the gentleman from Pennsylvania to introduce the list of articles now before us, is similar to the one which actuated me to enumerate those in the first proposition, namely, that they were capable, on the principle of policy, of bearing a higher duty than those left in the common mass to be taxed ad valorem. If gentlemen, on considering them, should think any incapable of sustaining such addition, they will be at liberty to move to have them struck out and restored to the general mass of articles, so that I see no very strong reason against receiving them for consideration.

The motion was put by the Chairman, and it was agreed to add them to the first list of articles introduced by Mr. MADISON.

On motion of Mr. LEE, the committee rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 10.

The House met, but adjourned without doing any business.

SATURDAY, April 11.

Mr. SMITH, (of Maryland) presented a petition from the tradesmen, manufacturers, and others, of the town of Baltimore, which was read, setting forth, That, since the close of the late war, and the completion of the Revolution, they have observed with serious regret the manufacturing and the trading interest of the country rapidly declining, and the attempts of the State Legislatures to remedy the evil failing of their object; that, in the present melancholy state of our country, the number of poor increasing for want of employment, foreign debts accumulating, houses and lands depreciating in value, and trade and manufactures languishing and expiring, they look up to the Supreme Legislature of the United States as the guardians of the whole empire, and from their united wisdom and patriotism, and ardent love of their country, expect to derive that aid and assistance which alone can dissipate their just apprehensions.

hensions, and animate them with hopes of success in future, by imposing on all foreign articles, which can be made in America, such duties as will give a just and decided preference to their labors; discountenancing that trade which tends so materially to injure them and impoverish their country; measures which, in their consequences, may also contribute to the discharge of the national debt and the due support of the Government; that they have annexed a list of such articles as are or can be manufactured amongst them, and humbly trust in the wisdom of the Legislature to grant them, in common with the other mechanics and manufacturers of the United States, that relief which may appear proper.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEE.—The articles proposed for objects of imposts again recur. I wish, therefore, that the committee proceed to consider each separately; by this means we shall get through the business with expedition and facility.

Mr. GOODHUE.—I think when the original motion was introduced, it was only intended as a temporary expedient; but, from what has fallen from the gentlemen on this subject, I am led to believe that idea is abandoned, and a permanent system is to be substituted in its place. I do not know that this is the best mode of the two, but perhaps it may take no more time than the other, if we apply ourselves with assiduity to the task. As it does not appear that all the articles proper to bear an additional tax are yet selected, and as I wish the list to be as complete as possible, that the committee may have, in one view, all that is intended on the occasion, I shall beg to add—upon anchors for every 112 lb.; upon every dozen wool cards; upon wrought tin ware; upon every box of lemons; upon every barrel of limes.

The committee agreed to add these articles to the list.

Mr. CLYMER submitted it to the consideration of the committee, how far it was best to bring propositions forward in this way. Not that he objected to this mode of encouraging manufactures and obtaining revenue, by combining the two objects in one bill. He was satisfied that a political necessity existed for both the one and the other, and it would not be amiss to do it in this way, but perhaps the business would be more speedily accomplished by entering upon it systematically. It would be better to appoint a subcommittee to collate the materials, and bring them before the House better digested than they came now. He threw out these sentiments for the consideration of the committee, without any great degree of confidence that they were right, or founded in strict order.

The CHAIRMAN was of opinion that a motion of the kind just mentioned would be out of order, because a committee could not appoint another committee; the House appoints all committees.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. Boudinot.—I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to hear it suggested by any gentleman, that the position for a temporary system of revenue is abandoned; it is not my sentiment that it should be so. When I rise on a question of this magnitude, and which, particularly from my local circumstances, I may be considered inadequate to the discussion of, nothing ought to be supposed to accustom me but a desire of obtaining information and performing my duty; and when my sentiments differ from those of well informed gentlemen, they will attribute it to the true cause—the want of better information, and not a wish to oppose; but the better any measure is digested and understood, the more likely we are to avoid partial ideas and attend to what is most beneficial to the general good. The subject in debate was originally brought forward as a temporary expedient to obtain revenue to support the exigencies of the Union. It has been changed by successive motions for amendment; and the idea of a permanent system, to embrace every object connected with commerce, manufactures, and revenue, is now held up in its stead. I admit that the accomplishment of what gentlemen have in view is very desirable, and if we had time for the necessary discussion, it ought immediately to engage the attention of the committee; but I feel such a want of information and ability to judge of the propriety of many articles already enumerated, at the same time I think I discover similar embarrassments in other gentlemen, that makes me think the present moment is, in some degree, improper for deliberating, when we have so little time to spare. It appears to me that this business of raising revenue, points out two questions of great importance, demanding much information. The first is, what articles are proper objects of taxation, and the probable amount of revenue from each. The second is, the proper mode of collecting the money arising from this fund, when the object and its amount are ascertained. There are three sources from which we may gain information on the first question: namely, from the revenue laws of the different States, for I believe a partial revenue has been raised almost in every State by an impost. The second source of information, and a very natural one, is the great body of merchants spread throughout the United States; this is a very respectable and well informed body of our fellow-citizens, and great deference ought to be paid to their communications—they are in a peculiar situation under the present Constitution, to which they are generally esteemed sincere friends—they are also more immediately interested in the event of the proposed measure, than any other class of men. To this Government they look for protection and support, and for such regulations as are beneficial to commerce; for these reasons I think they deserve our confidence, and we ought to obtain from them such information as will enable the Congress to proceed to a general permanent system on more solid principles. The last source from which we are to derive information is the Executives of the States, stating the operation and production of the different revenue laws in the States respectively, by which we can judge of the effect likely to be produced by the system we establish, as well as the aggregate produce of a general impost. This will also tend to prevent our burthening the people at large with unreasonable duties, and cramping trade without an adequate reason.

With regard to the second question, the mode of collecting duty, I own I do not see any information so satisfactory as I could wish. When I recollect the numerous volumes of laws made to secure and regulate this point, the inefficacy of them all, though accompanied with the most terrible denunciations and penalties, and the careful observing eye of long experienced officers—I say, when I recollect all this, and consider it may be necessary for the United States to adopt a similar plan, I own that I almost shrink from the task as an extraordinary work, requiring the most superior abilities.

Though there may be some circumstances which may render the business more easy, such as the virtue of the people and the inflexibility of the officers, yet there are also difficulties of a superior magnitude to those encountered by other nations. When we look at the boundaries of the United States; when we contemplate the proximity of the eastern territory and the British provinces; when we turn to the northwest, and observe Vermont leagued with Canada in pouring in upon the interior country the manufactures of Britain; when we consider the natural and political situation of Rhode Island, and judge from the nefarious principles which they have lately held, and the vicinity of their coast to the extensive shores of Connecticut and Long Island, we shall have reason to apprehend that she is ready to take every advantage of the United States that lies in her power. When I observe the shores of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware; the wide stretched-out shores of Maryland and Virginia, with the waters of the Chesapeake flowing between a winding course of three hundred miles, penetrating in this distance, six or seven times the borders of different States; the coast of North Carolina, not yet in the Union; the borders of South Carolina and Georgia upon the Atlantic, with their numerous inlets, altogether present such a group of difficulties and embarrassments, as we cannot remove in the little time we have, nor regulate upon the information now before us. The inference I would draw from this is, that we should not precipitate a business which some of us think the committee at this time incompetent to; but it is not for me to desire that such delay should take place—the State I have the honor to represent being altogether agricultural, at best it partakes but little of the commerce of the Union, therefore we shall not be so materially injured by an improper regulation of this subject, as those which derive greater advantages from commercial transactions.

There are gentlemen on this floor well calculated to represent the mercantile interests of this country, and in whose integrity and abilities I have the highest confidence; but it is the duty of the members of this body to see that the principles upon which we act, are those calculated to promote the general good, and not confined to the local interests of a few individuals, or even individual States, so that they will decline trusting alone to this species of information, when another is attainable.

I am aware of an objection to this mode of reasoning; it will be alleged that the pressing necessities of the United States for revenue require immediate relief, and permit no delay. This I admit, and it is this which makes me prefer a temporary system for the present to a permanent one. Let us take, then, the resolution of Congress, in 1783, as presented by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Madison,) and make it the basis of our system, adding only such protecting duties as are necessary to support the manufactures established by the Legislatures of the manufacturing States. Thus far, we can go with safety, if we do not descend into a minute enumeration; such articles as are readily admitted to duty, serve legislative encouragement, we may take into the list.

With regard to the collection of the revenue, I would recommend that until a general plan can be devised, officers should be appointed to collect the impost and protecting duties, in the manner, and under the penalties, directed by the laws of the proper State. It may be said that there are some States which have no revenue laws of this kind, and, consequently, no officers to execute them; I would, in every such case, subject them to the laws of the next adjoining State. By adopting a plan upon these principles, we shall gain time sufficient to obtain full information in the manner I have pointed out, and also reap the harvest of the Spring importations; the latter of these objects, I apprehend, will be totally lost by any other system that has yet been suggested.

Whatever permanent system we may devise ought to be calculated to give efficacy to trade, while it gives supplies to our treasury. This cannot be done well, if done speedily; while, on the other hand, we might get a temporary one framed against the arrival of the President, without injury to commerce or manufactures, and greatly to the interest of the Union.

If any gentleman thinks as I do, he will second me in moving, that the committee rise and report as their opinion, the appointment of a committee for the purpose of framing such a temporary law.

Mr. Bland hoped the committee would not rise, but as it has become a question whether the impost system should be permanent or temporary, he was inclined to favor any motion that should be made to ascertain that point, and was of opinion with the worthy member who spoke last, that the committee had not sufficient materials to enable them to erect a permanent one at this time. He, however, wished the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the present, until this point was ascertained; and he conceived this moreover to be necessary, because many gentlemen would be guided in voting the quantum of duty upon each article, by knowing whether the system was intended to be continued for a longer or a shorter period.

Mr. Lee was of opinion with Mr. Bland, and seconded his motion for taking the sense of the House on the question proposed.

Mr. Fitzsimons thought it best to make the system as perfect as possible before the committee determined its duration.

A desultory conversation took place on the rising of the committee and on Mr. Bland's motion, during which it was remarked by

Mr. Madison, that the subject which was under consideration divided itself, as had been observed by the honorable gentleman from Jersey, into two parts; and hence he concluded that they might very properly be provided for by two separate bills; and while the Committee of the Whole are selecting articles and taxing them, another committee can be employed in devising the mode of collection. This method he thought more likely to reconcile the opinions of the committee than any he had heard suggested.

At length the question was taken on Mr. Boudinot's motion for the committee to rise, and determined in the negative.

The committee proceeded to Mr. Bland's motion, which being withdrawn,

Mr. Madison observed, that it was impossible, from the peculiar situation of Congress, that the subject of revenue could be entered upon methodically, otherwise he should expect gentlemen prepared with documents stating the national wants, and national resources, and by the one prove the necessity of the other; but though the probable amount of a tax on enumerated articles and tonnage could not now be come at, he trusted in future that it would, and in the interim he recommended gentlemen to exert themselves in giving and procuring information, in order to get some system formed as speedily as possible. With a view to this, he moved, when the committee rose, they should report as the opinion of the Committee of the Whole that a committee be appointed for the purpose of preparing a bill to regulate the mode of collecting duties on imports and tonnage. Then the committee could be ready with a bill on this part of the subject, by the time the Committee of the Whole had gone through the article.

This motion was adopted by the committee. Mr. Fitzsimons agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, that the leading considerations in the business were the necessities and wants of the Union, and the best means of relieving them. No gentleman objected to the mode of impost; he therefore was led to believe that it was an eligible mode. The necessities of the State, including the instalments and interest of the foreign and domestic debt, and the current expenses of the Government, he thought might require annually (to use a round sum) about three millions of dollars. This sum he then looked upon as necessary to be raised in the present session. As gentlemen seemed to agree a large sum should be obtained by impost, they would consequently be ready to vote for as high duties as could be collected, without sacrificing the commercial or agricultural interests of the country. This consideration he hoped would be settled in the minds of the members before they proceeded to fill up the blanks annexed to the particular articles. It will no doubt be observed, that a duty on some articles will press unequally upon particular States; now all that can be done to equalize them is, to burden others again which enter into the consumption of the other States, with a duty which shall make them sustain a uniform proportion of the whole system.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. SHERMAN gave it as his opinion, that in fixing the duties on particular articles, if they could not ascertain the exact quantum, it would be better to run the risk of erring in setting low duties than high ones, because it was less injurious to commerce to raise them than to lower them; but, nevertheless, he was for laying on duties which some gentlemen might think high, as he thought it better to derive revenue from impost than from direct taxation, or any other method in their power. He moved that the article of rum should be charged with fifteen cents per gallon—he used the term cents because it was a denomination of the national coin, fixed by the late Congress, ten of which make a dime, and ten dimes one dollar.

Mr. SMITH was apprehensive fifteen cents would be too high, and therefore moved ten cents, which he thought would raise more revenue than the other.

Mr. MADISON advised and moved for the rising of the committee, in order to give gentlemen time to make up their minds respecting the quantum of impost to be laid on each article.

The question on rising was put and carried, whereupon the committee rose, and reported the resolution offered by Mr. MADISON, and a committee was appointed in conformity thereto. Adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, April 13.

WILLIAM FLOYD, from New York; THOMAS SWINCKSON, from New Jersey; JOSHUA SENEY, from Maryland; EDWARDS BURKE, DANIEL HUGER, and WILLIAM SMITH, from South Carolina, appeared and took their seats.

On motion.
Ordered, That Mr. BENSON, Mr. PETER MULLENBERG, and Mr. GRIFFIN, be a committee to consider of and report to the House respecting the ceremonial of receiving the PRESIDENT, and that they be authorized to confer with a committee of the Senate for the purpose.

The House proceeded to consider the report from the committee appointed to prepare such further rules and orders of proceeding as may be proper to be observed in this House, which lay on the table; and the said report was read, and is as followeth:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the rules and orders following ought to be established as additional standing rules and orders of this House, to wit:

1. That any member may excuse himself from serving on any committee, at the time of his appointment, if he is then a member of two other committees.

2. That no member absent himself from the service of the House, unless he have leave, or be sick and unable to attend.

3. Upon a call of the House, for which at least one day's notice shall be requisite, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted, after which the names of the absentees shall be again called over; the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuses, or insufficient excuses, are made, may, by order of the House, be taken into custody.

4. It shall be the office and duty of a Sergeant-at-Arms to attend the House during its sitting, to execute the commands of the House, from time to time, and all such process, issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker, and either by himself, or special messengers appointed by him, to take and detain in his custody members or other persons ordered by the House to be taken or committed.

5. A proper symbol of office shall be provided for the Sergeant-at-Arms, of such form and device as the Speaker shall direct, which shall be placed on the Clerk's table during the sitting of the House; but when the House is in committee, shall be placed under the table. The Sergeant-at-Arms shall, moreover, always bear the said symbol when executing the immediate commands of the House, during its sitting, returning the same to the Clerk's table when the service is performed.

6. Every member, or other person, ordered into custody, shall pay to the Sergeant-at-Arms — for every arrest, and — for each day's custody and release; also, — per mile, for travelling expenses, going and returning, unless the payment thereof shall be remitted by the House.

7. A standing Committee of Elections shall be appointed, to consist of seven members; it shall be the duty of the said committee to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such matters as shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, touching returns and elections, and to report their proceedings, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

8. The Clerk of the House shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and abilities.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that joint rules ought to be established between the two Houses, to provide for the mode of communicating messages, of holding and conducting conferences, and all other cases of proceeding requiring previous mutual agreement.

The first resolution being read a second time, and debated by paragraphs, the first, second, third, seventh, and eighth clauses, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by this House.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth clauses were severally read a second time, and ordered to be recommitted to the same committee.

The second resolution was read a second time, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, the House proceeded to ballot for a standing Committee of Elections.

The members elected, Messrs. CLYMER, AMES,

[H. or R.]

BENSON, CARROLL, WHITE, HUNTINGTON, and GILMAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Hon. JOHN LANGDON, a member of the Senate, communicating an instruction to a committee of that House, to report if any, and what, arrangements are necessary for the reception of the Vice President, which was read.

Ordered, That the said letter be referred to the committee appointed to consider of, and report to the House, respecting the ceremonial of receiving the President; and that it be an instruction to the said committee to report upon the said letter also.

A petition of the shipwrights of the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, stating the distress they are in from the decline of that branch of business, and the present situation of the trade of the United States, and praying that the wisdom and policy of the National Legislature may be directed to such measures, in a general regulation of trade, and the establishment of a proper navigation act, as will tend to relieve the particular distresses of the petitioners, and, in common with them, those of their fellow-shipwrights throughout the United States.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

TUESDAY, April 14.

Mr. WHITE presented, according to order, a bill to regulate the taking the oath of affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution; which was received and read the first time.

Mr. BOUNDNOT reported, from the committee to whom was recommended certain clauses of the report for establishing additional rules and orders of proceeding to be observed in this House, that the committee had, according to order, reconsidered the same, and agreed to a report thereupon, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, the blanks therein filled up, and, on a question put thereupon, agreed to by the House as followeth:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that the rules and orders following ought to be established, as additional standing rules and orders of this House, to wit:

A Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed, to hold his office during the pleasure of the House, whose duty it shall be to attend the House during its sittings, to execute the commands of the House from time to time, and all such process, issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the SPEAKER.

A proper symbol of office shall be provided for the Sergeant-at-Arms, of such form and device as the SPEAKER shall direct, which shall be borne by the Sergeant when in the execution of his office.

The fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be, for every arrest the sum of two dollars; for each day's custody and release, one dollar; and for travelling expenses, going and returning, one-tenth of a dollar per mile.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

Mr. BLAND, from Virginia, thought the committee not prepared to enter on the business of impost in the accurate manner which the form of the propositions seemed to imply. No gentleman on the floor could be more desirous than he was to go into the measure of a permanent system; but he could not agree to proceed at this time, for want of information. When he looked at the list of articles, he saw some calculated to give encouragement to home manufactures. This might be in some degree proper; but it was a well known fact, that the manufacturing arts in America were only in their infancy, and far from being able to answer the demands of the country; then certainly you lay a tax upon the whole community, in order to put the money in the pockets of a few, whenever you burden the importation with a heavy impost. He was likewise apprehensive that the federal treasury would lose a considerable supply, if the necessary time was taken to perfect a permanent system; he therefore wished a temporary one, and made a motion to obtain the sense of the committee on this point, as well as on the mode of collection.

He adverted to the subject of tonnage, observing that it was well known that America did not furnish a number of ships sufficient for the transportation of its products; therefore any high duty on this article would embarrass the agriculture, which, as his colleague had before observed, was the staple of the country.

Mr. SCOTT.—The subject before us naturally divides itself into two heads. First, what articles shall be the subject of a particular tax, and what shall remain in the common mass liable to an impost ad valorem? The second, what the sum is that is proper for the article we select? For both these points will be necessary, because it can hardly be supposed that all articles can be enumerated, while some certainly ought. This being the case, it leads us to inquire what rule or principle shall be laid down in order to make a proper discrimination; for surely some reason should be assigned for this distinction. I presume the particular article which is to be subjected to an extraordinary duty must either come at so cheap a rate, according to its intrinsic value, as to bear a greater impost without being unreasonably expensive, or it must be one which we do not stand in need of at all, and only used for the purposes of luxury. If an article does not come within one of these descriptions, I see no reason why it should be taxed in an extraordinary manner.

My present design, therefore, is, that the committee should, in the management of this business, conduct their motions in this way. By treating it so, the work may be expedited much more than it can by the vague and indeterminate manner of our procedure hitherto. I would, therefore, recommend that each article be taken up separately, and considered whether it is a proper one for the committee to select or not. There may be some articles which ought not to be selected; and I think

[H. or R.]

Duties on Imports.

[APRIL, 1789.]

I discover one enumerated in the list before us, which, so far from meriting a high duty, ought not to be taxed at all; for these reasons, I hope the committee will proceed in the manner I have described, and fairly give their sense on the propriety of each article as it occurs.

Mr. MADISON.—I apprehend, sir, that the motion made by my colleague (Mr. BLAND) is out of order; not only because the committee have determined to proceed in the business and fill up the blanks, but because it would be one committee giving instruction to another; for, although we are a committee of the whole House, we cannot exercise the powers belonging to the House, among which is that of instructing committees. It surely is in the recollection of every member, that a committee is appointed upon the subject, which is in the view of the gentleman's motion, namely, that for regulating and ascertaining the mode of collecting the impost. I presume, therefore, that if any instructions are necessary to be given respecting the discharge of the duty of the committee appointed to this business, they ought to come from the House. The motion, therefore, if it is proper at all, is proper only before the House.

Mr. BLAND did not wish to take up the time of the committee in debating a question of order; but he would just observe, that he looked upon the committee alluded to by the gentleman last up, as appointed on a different subject from that he proposed to the consideration of the committee. They were appointed to devise and digest a mode of collection adapted to a permanent system of revenue, which the House, at a time of more leisure, might complete; but the object he had in contemplation was, for the committee to agree to use a less perfect one in the interim, in order to embrace two or three hundred thousand dollars arising from the Spring importations, which he dreaded the loss of, if the business was not soon completed. However, as the motion was objected to as put of order, he would withdraw it for the present, and offer it to the House when the committee rose.

On motion of Mr. GALE, the word rum was changed into distilled spirits of Jamaica proof.

Mr. LAWRENCE proposed to lay twelve cents on this article, saying, I believe, Mr. Chairman, it will be necessary to consider, when we are about to lay a duty on any article, how far it is likely to be collected, especially if our main object is to obtain revenue by our impost. I trust it does not require much illustration to prove to the satisfaction of the committee, that if you lay your duties too high, it will be a temptation to smuggling; for, in the proportion which that sum bears to the value of the article, will be the risk run in every attempt to introduce it in a clandestine manner, and, if this temptation is made too strong, the article will furnish no revenue. I believe, if the committee shall impose a duty of fifteen cents, as proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. SHERMAN), it will be so strong a temptation for smuggling, that we shall lose our revenue altogether, or be compelled to use a mode of colthe law to enforce the collection of, I shall vote for it.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I shall observe further, sir, that in Pennsylvania this article is charged with an impost amounting to near three-ninths of a dollar, and an excise in addition of eight-ninths. This is collected from about eight hundred thousand gallons, without any great difficulty. The highest sum proposed to the committee very little exceeds that collected in Pennsylvania, and I suppose that any mode which will ensure the one, will enable us with an equal degree of certainty to obtain the other.

Mr. BOURNOR.—I am in favor of taxing this article as high as there is a probability of collecting the duty. I think our doing so will answer two or three good purposes. The present object of the committee is to raise a revenue, and no article on the list before you is more likely to be productive than this one; but a high duty may also discourage the use of ardent spirits, if not, it may discourage the West Indies from turning their molasses into rum. This being the case, they have no other market for molasses than this country, and our own distilleries, with the advantages arising therefrom, will be able to rival them in the manufacture of that article; so far it may tend to the benefit of the country. I conceive it might be proper, on these accounts, to lay a much higher duty than has been proposed, were it not for the considerations mentioned by the gentleman from New York, that we run a risk of losing all by grasping at too much.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The sum proposed is higher than the duty collected in this State, which is about eight cents; I fear, therefore, that it cannot be collected. If we are to reason and act as moralists on this point, I am certain it is the wish of every member to prevent the use of ardent spirits altogether, for their influence on the morals of the people is of the most pernicious kind. Nor does the mischief terminate here, as I apprehend it is equally destructive to the health; but we are not to deliberate and determine on this subject as moralists, but as politicians, and endeavor to draw (if I may use the expression) from the views of mankind that revenue which our citizens must, in one form or other, contribute. The question is, what shall be the duty on any particular article? To accomplish this purpose, we must determine by the circumstances of that article.

Now, if we lay a high duty on Jamaica rum, it is supposed it will prevent the consumption; but then the purpose we have in view is frustrated, either because we cannot collect the tax, or the object of it is no longer imported. The consequence in this latter case would be, that the morals of our citizens are not impaired; yet it does not appear to me that this consequence would certainly flow from a system of high duties. I rather fear it would lead no further than to set men on schemes to evade the duty; and none of us are ignorant of the ingenuity and invention which can be exercised, when interests prompts mankind to an evasion of the law. We know the situation of the different States; the coast disposed by its prodigious extent to favor every means of illicit trade. A cargo of rum could be landed in Jersey, and the whole, reshipped in small vessels, might soon be brought into this city. If this should be the effect of our law, we have no other way to correct the operation, but by adopting a mode of collection odious to all, on account of the numerous train of officers it would require in its execution. But there would also be a danger of vessels running into creeks and small inlets, for the purpose of landing their cargoes, as well as on the sea-shore. Hence, a necessity would arise of employing a number of vessels to check and correct such abuses, and the probable event would be, that all the impost collected would go to defray the expense of getting it into the treasury.

Rum is an article of great consumption throughout the Union. The State I have the honor to represent has imported, from April, 1786, to April, 1787, a quantity exceeding eight hundred and fifty thousand gallons, of which only sixty-seven thousand were exported; consequently, the remainder has been consumed among ourselves, and the people of that part of New Jersey which draws its supplies from this city. Now, it appears to me not improbable that we shall lose a great deal of the revenue, if we lay the duty so much higher than heretofore. Being impressed with these sentiments, I must vote against the motion for fifteen cents.

Mr. BOURNOR inquired of the gentleman from New York, if rum was not also subject to an excise in that State.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—There is no other duty than what I have mentioned, which is permitted to be drawn back on exportation.

Mr. MADISON did not see how the importing States could be injured by a high duty more than the others, as all duties came into the federal treasury. He observed, that if Pennsylvania had been able to collect with certainty a duty amounting to about twelve cents, when the two neighboring States not only declined to co-operate, but pursued a counter interest, there could be no doubt but so small an addition as three cents, laid to affect generally the whole Union, might with equal certainty be collected.

The committee now agreed to tax ardent spirits, of Jamaica proof, fifteen cents; and all other spirituous liquors twelve cents.

On filling up the blank on molasses:

Mr. MADISON.—It is agreed, I presume, that spirits of every kind are proper objects of taxation, but whether we shall tax spirits in the case before us, or whether we shall tax the article from which it comes, is a question worthy of the consideration of the committee for several reasons. I believe it will be best to lay our hands on the duty, by charging this article on its importation, to avoid a more disagreeable measure. I would, therefore, lay such a duty on molasses, as is proportioned to what we have affixed upon rum, making an allowance in favor of our own manufacture. I think eight cents per gallon will allow a sufficient advantage to them, but of this I am not positive, and, therefore, shall not pertinaciously insist.

ciously adhere to that sum, if it be thought too high; but I presume I am right in the principle upon which I contend, that we ought to collect the duty on the importation of molasses, in preference to any other way.

Mr. PARKER observed, that the distilleries made a very great profit on the manufacture of this article, and it would be increased by the difference which was made in duty between it and West India rum. He was an advocate for laying it on molasses, because he did not think this a proper time to enter upon an excise law; if the duty operated to discourage the consumption of New England rum, he thought it would have very happy consequences; he therefore seconded the motion for eight cents.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—Shall we, Mr. Chairman, tax articles which are necessities of life equally as if they were luxuries? I apprehend not. In some parts of the United States, this article is used as a necessary among the poorer class of citizens; consequently, if you tax it high, you unequally burden that part of the community who are least able to bear it. When the Congress of 1783 had it in contemplation to tax this article, I believe they did not propose more than one penny. Perhaps the change that has taken place since that time would warrant us to double that sum. For my part, I should be willing to allow it, but the honorable gentleman from Virginia proposes four times as much as I judge to be proper. If it could be collected, it would amount to a very large sum; but let us examine the probability there is of being able to do it. When you compare the tax with the price of the commodity, leaving out the consideration of its being a necessary of life, you find it is one to three. I ask gentlemen to tell me candidly, will not the payment of the duty be evaded? And shall we not deceive ourselves in calculating upon a revenue which we can never collect?

I believe, if I am well informed on this subject, the tax which I propose will amount to about forty thousand dollars, so great is the importation of this article. By the tax the honorable gentleman proposes, it would amount to one hundred and sixty thousand, which, I fear, is more than can or ought to be collected.

This article, as was before observed, is a raw material for manufacture, and which, when distilled, is exported in considerable quantities. If a heavy duty is laid, will it not prevent the exportation? But, should we even allow a drawback on what is exported, it will, nevertheless, considerably encumber the trade by obliging the merchant to advance much of his capital in duties, and will still remain an oppression to the poor, who consume it in substance.

Mr. MADISON viewed the present question in two points of light. First, as it respected the use of the article in the substance; and second, as it related to a manufacture of considerable importance. If it was possible to make a discrimination between them, he was ready to agree to one in favor of the first class; but, conceiving this to be impracticable, he thought the question was reducible to this, whether our revenue should be lessened as much as distilled spirits confessedly ought to pay, and our country, consequently, filled with a baser liquor, or whether we shall tax an article which will indirectly tax the rum manufactured from it in due proportion to what is brought from the islands.

I do not conceive (continued Mr. MADISON) that the quantity of this article manufactured and exported to foreign countries, is any wise considerable. I find by an account of the exports of Massachusetts, (which appears to be authentic,) and it is a State that manufactures in full proportion to any other State in the Union, that there have been shipped off to different parts of this country, 40,943 gallons of rum manufactured there; to Nova Scotia, 801 gallons; to Europe, 1,206; and to Africa and the East Indies, 897 gallons.

So that the great exportation which the gentleman from New York mentions, is made to the different parts of the United States, and not to foreign countries; the duty, therefore, will be principally paid by our own citizens, who are the consumers. The gentleman has mentioned a drawback as a relief to the manufacturers. He does not, perhaps, consider the advantage which a general regulation of trade gives to the State manufacturing rum. The admission of that commodity into every State is perfectly free under the new Constitution, and unencumbered with the duties heretofore laid by the State Legislatures; from which, it is manifest that a drawback, so far as relates to the coasting trade, is unnecessary. I think, also, that the small quantity exported to Europe and Africa is too incon- siderable to justify the Legislature in allowing drawbacks, under which system great frauds can easily be committed upon your revenue: to what purpose shall we collect revenue, if it is put in the power of every individual clandestinely to reclaim it, without a possibility of our discovering the injustice?

If a discrimination can be suggested, I shall readily agree to it; but I think it cannot be done unless we substitute an excise, or a tax on stills, neither of which would be equally convenient or productive, and therefore neither would be proper for the House to agree to. The proportion between the duty on country rum at eight cents, and West India at twelve cents, is a considerable difference in favor of home-made spirits, and sufficient to answer the purpose of protecting the manufacture.

Mr. FRIZZMONS.—I think the duty on this article depends, in a great measure, upon what has been already agreed to. If the tax on West India and country rum is not well proportioned, it may be destructive of the end we have in contemplation. If agreeably to the idea of the gentleman from New York, we affix a low duty, a great deal more rum will, in all probability, be distilled and used than heretofore; of course, it will effectually rival the Jamaica rum, and the Union will lose the revenue which we calculate upon. Eight cents, I apprehend, is as well proportioned to the other taxes as can be devised. Country rum is worth two shillings and three pence, which is more than half the price of Jamaica spirits, so that rum of the former quality can be used so much cheaper, as to establish itself a greater consumption than heretofore. It has been mentioned as a necessary of life; the fact is admitted; but shall it be inferred from thence that no duty ought to be collected from molasses, while you impose one on sugar, which is equally a necessary of life among the Middle and Southern States? Although the remark has been made already, I must repeat it, and beg the committee to bear in mind, that whenever a tax on a particular article seems to bear harder on one State than another, we must endeavor to equalize it by laying some other to restore an equilibrium to the system.

Mr. GOODHUE considered molasses as a raw material, essentially requisite for the well being of a very extensive and valuable manufacture. It ought likewise to be considered (as was truly stated) a necessary of life. In the Eastern States it entered into the diet of the poorer class of people, who were, from the decay of trade and other adventitious circumstances, totally unable to sustain such a weight as a tax of eight cents would be upon them. Moreover, the tax was upon particular States as well as individuals, for it was a fact of public notoriety, that Massachusetts imported more molasses than all the other States together. She imports from 30,000 to 40,000 hogsheads annually. He would make one observation more. It had been the policy of Great Britain, as he well remembered, to encumber and depress the distillation of molasses. To do this, at one time they laid a duty of three pence sterling per gallon. It was conceived to be an oppressive measure, but it had little other effect than to cause heart-burnings and enmity. It produced no revenue, and the Parliament were forced to reduce the duty to a penny. From experience, therefore, as well as from the arguments before urged, he was inclined to believe that the committee would be satisfied with fixing a lower sum. He could not consent to allow more than two cents.

Mr. MADISON had heard an observation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which he thought lessened the force of the objection taken against taxing molasses as a necessary of life. Those who used it in substance escaped the tax on sugar, at least so much of it as the one was a substitute for the other. He feared that there was no other way of coming at the duty on country rum, but laying one on the material from which it was extracted, and he did not think eight cents out of the way.

Mr. GOODHUE replied, that eight cents was nearly half the first cost, and consequently disproportionate to the tax on foreign rum. He also observed, that the gentleman from Virginia, when he was stating the rum exported abroad, must surely have read wrong, for to his certain knowledge, several vessels were principally loaded with this article every year.

• This article, in the exports from Massachusetts,

Mr. THATCHER.—It appears to me, that for the want of a certain and fixed principle to act upon, there is a great danger of making some improper establishments. It is for this reason that I wish not to hurry on the business with so much precipitation. Did gentlemen consider, when they agreed to a high duty on ardent spirits, that it would be a pretext for increasing the duties on a necessary of life? I presume a principal reason why a high tax on spirits was admitted, was in order to discourage the use of it among ourselves. If this was the intention of the committee, I have no objection to the burden; but, even here, I fear difficulties will arise. Did we judiciously examine whether the spirit of the law accords with the habits and manners of the people? and did we assure ourselves of the full execution of the law? If we did not, the act becomes impolitic; because a law which cannot be executed, tends to make the Government less respectable.

Consider molasses as a raw material, and, on this account, you cannot agree to burden it with an unequal tax; consider it as a necessary of life, entering daily into the consumption of the lower class of people, and the duty on it ought to be extremely low. I do not see how we are to get clear of this embarrassment, unless we rescind what we have already done; because, if the principle for taxing ardent spirits be to lessen the consumption, in order to preserve the health and morals of the people, it will apply as forcibly to tax country rum eight cents, as is now proposed, as it did to tax Jamaica rum fifteen cents. I am not an enemy to making the impost the principal instrument of revenue, yet I fear we have not proceeded with due deliberation. It was my wish to take up the subject, as has been frequently mentioned, and form a law on the most simple principles, leaving time, information, and reflection, to form a system of impost, on more extensive and particular principles, fitted equally to affect the whole and every part of the Union.

For these reasons, I shall move, if I am in order, to take up the resolution of Congress, of 1783, and lay on duties as nearly similar as can well be and those recommended at that period; and then move for a committee to go on to review and consider of certain regulations necessary to form a permanent system at some future period.

Mr. CLYMER.—The advocates for a low duty repeatedly mention this article as a raw material necessary to support a considerable manufacture; but do they consider that the consumption of country rum is attended with an injury to a much more valuable manufacture, the raw material for which is furnished by our own agriculture, and which is divested of the pernicious qualities attached to ardent spirits—I mean the manufacture of malt liquors?

Mr. ABER.—I have not had the advantage of stands thus: "Country rum—hogsheads shipped to the several parts of the United States, 5,377, value $49,943; to Nova Scotia, 89 hogsheads, value $901; to Europe, 134 hogsheads, value $1,206; and to Africa and the East Indies, 897 hogsheads, value $8,073."

[H. or R.]

Duties on Imports.

hearing all the arguments in support of the eight cents proposed; but those I have heard I am not satisfied with. The principles on which this tax is founded, I understand to be that it is an article of luxury, and of pretty general consumption, so that the duty is expected to fall equally upon all; but that it will not operate in this manner, I think is easily demonstrable. Can a duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem, paid, as it were, in an exclusive manner, by the State of Massachusetts, be equal? No, sir. But taking it as a part of the general system, can it be equal unless a proportionable duty, equal to fifty per cent. is laid upon articles consumed in other parts of the Union? No, sir; and is it in the contemplation of gentlemen to lay duties so high as to produce this equality? I trust it is not; because such duties could never be collected. Is not, therefore, eight cents disproportioned to the rates fixed, or intended to be imposed on other articles? I think it is; and, if to these considerations we add what has been said before, relative to its being a raw material important to a considerable manufacture, we cannot hesitate to reject it.

The people will indubitably continue to use ardent spirits, until the slow operation of the law shall produce other habits; and while they continue to use them, it is better for this country that they use the kind which is wished to be indirectly taxed. It must be better, because it is manufactured within ourselves, and gives useful employment to a considerable number of our fellow citizens. It must be better because the goods which we export for the raw materials are drugs upon our hands. Certainly the trade is mutually beneficial to the parties concerned; but it is so in a greater degree to us than to them. We exchange for molasses, those fish that it is impossible to dispose of anywhere else; we have no market within our reach, but the islands from whence we get molasses in return, which again we manufacture into rum. These circumstances form a material link in our chain of navigation, and upon our success in navigation the most important interests of the United States depend. It is scarcely possible to maintain our fisheries with advantage, if the commerce for summer fish is injured, which I conceive it would be very materially, if a high duty is imposed on this article; nay it would carry devastation throughout all the New England States, it would ultimately affect all throughout the Union. Will gentlemen who declare themselves the friends of manufactures support the opinion, that a raw material ought to be saddled with an excessive duty, that the imposition should be at a higher rate than what is laid upon manufactured articles; at a time too when the price is such that the home manufacture cannot support a successful competition with the other, even in our own markets? No, gentlemen will not be so inconsistent: they know and advocate the policy of supporting the manufactures of our country, by giving them such advantages as are consistent with the general good.

I shall proceed to show the importance of the present subject, in another point of light. The taking of fish on the Banks is a very momentous concern, it forms a nursery for seamen, and this will be the source from which we are to derive maritime importance. It is the policy of some nations to drive us from this prolific source of wealth and strength; but what their detestable efforts have in vain endeavored to do, you will accomplish by a high duty on this article. Our situation with respect to the fishing banks, and our vicinity to the West India Islands, are natural advantages, which all the machinations of jealousy cannot prevent us the enjoyment of. The habits of our fishermen are well calculated to improve these advantages to perfection, and no nation can carry on the business at so small an expense; it is these circumstances that render our fish cheap, while this cheapness insures us a sale, and enables us to be successful competitors in every port that will receive us. Our best fish will find its way to the best markets, while the slaves in the West Indies will consume the refuse. If we can exchange that part, therefore, which would be otherwise thrown away, it is so much clear gain to the community. Hence, this country by increasing the demand of our fish increases the navigation; gentlemen will therefore be cautious how they adopt a measure that affects, or only seems to affect, one of the most important interests of the United States.

However gentlemen may think the use of this article dangerous to the health and morals of our fellow-citizens, I would also beg them to consider, that it is no more so than every other kind of spirituous liquors; that it will grow into an article for exportation; and although I admit we could export it even encumbered with the duty proposed, yet by it we run the risk of having the manufacture totally ruined, for it can hardly now stand a competition at home with the West India rum, much less can it do so abroad. If the manufacturers of country rum are to be devoted to certain ruin, to mend the morals of others, let them be admonished, that they prepare themselves for the event; but in the way we are about to take, destruction comes on a sudden, they have not time to seek refuge in any other employment whatsoever. If their situation will not operate to restrain the hand of iron policy, consider how immediately they are connected with the most essential interests of the Union, and then let me ask if it is wise, if it is reconcilable to national prudence, to take measures subversive of your very existence? For I do contend, that the very existence of the eastern States depends upon the encouragement of their navigation and fishery, which receive a deadly wound by an excessive impost on the article before us.

I would concur in any measure calculated to exterminate the poison covered under the form of ardent spirits, from our country; but it should be without violence. I approve as much as any gentleman the introduction of malt liquors, believing them not so pernicious as the one in common use; but before we restrain ourselves to the use of them, we ought to be certain that we have malt and hops, as well as brew-houses for the manufacture. Now I deny that we have these in sufficient abundance to the eastward; but if we had, they are not taxed. Then why should the poor of Massachusetts be taxed for the beverage they use of spruce, molasses, and water? It surely is unreasonable. I hope gentlemen will not adopt the motion for eight cents until they are furnished with some better evidence of its propriety and policy than any that has yet been given, or as I suspect that can be given.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was pleased that gentlemen went so fully into the discussion of a subject which they conceived of great importance, but he begged them not to lose sight of an observation that had already been made, that whenever a particular duty was supposed to bear hard on any one member of the Union, it ought to be regarded as part only of a system bearing equally upon all. He was a friend to commerce, it was his particular profession, and what he had principally devoted his attention to; and therefore it might justly be imagined he was unwilling to fetter it with restraints; but as a member of this body, he considered it proper to forego a pertinacious adhesion to that system, when its interest came in competition with the general welfare.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. AMES) has represented the proposed regulation as tending eventually to the ruin of the commerce, fisheries, and manufactures of that State. I do not believe (added he) such a consequence would result from a duty of eight cents on a gallon of molasses; if I did, I would be one of the last to advocate the measure; but to understand this circumstance more fully, let us proceed to an inquiry of the ground on which we stand. The State of Massachusetts imports a greater proportion of this article than any other in the Union; she will have therefore (say the opponents of the measure) to pay exclusively all the impost upon it. Let us examine this. Some part of the molasses is consumed in the substance, but all the remainder is distilled: this must either be consumed in the State, or exported from it; in the latter case, I propose that all the rum shipped to foreign nations, should draw back the duties it had paid as molasses. This would obviate all that was said relative to the competition between this State and other nations at a foreign market. As to what is exported but consumed in some parts of the United States, it is but proper that a duty should be paid; and although it may be advanced in the first instance by the people of Massachusetts, yet it will be ultimately paid by the consumers in other parts.

What is consumed within the State itself, gentlemen surely do not mean to have excluded from a duty. If they consume more country rum than West India, they pay a less duty than those States which consume a greater proportion of the latter. As to what is used in its raw unmanufactured state, it will be sufficient to observe, that it is generally a substitute for sugar, the consumers will therefore avoid the tax on that article, and pay it on the other. In Pennsylvania they mostly use sugar; now, if the people there pay a tax on that article, it is but distributive justice that the people of Massachusetts pay one on the article they use for the same purpose.

I do contend, that if a less, or much less duty on this article is laid, it will rival foreign rum so far as to prevent its importation in a considerable degree, whereby the United States will lose the revenue expected from it, or the operation of the tax will be unequal upon the consumer of sugar and molasses, which cannot certainly be the wish of any member, if I may judge from the conciliating disposition which is prevalent in the committee.

Mr. AMES stated the difference in the price of country rum and West India—the former was worth two shillings and three pence, the latter twice as much, so that there was not observed a proper ratio in taxing the one eight cents and the other twelve cents. He stated the difficulty of collecting so high a duty, and expressed an apprehension that the committee would deceive themselves in calculating upon it for any great production. He was satisfied it would hereafter become necessary to lower the duty from eight cents, if the committee should now agree to lay it, and appealed to their wisdom, if it was not better, and less injurious to the fair trader at any time, to increase than diminish the duties. This circumstance demanded the attention of the committee, though he would not press it further, being satisfied that gentlemen's candor would induce them to acknowledge the propriety of such policy.

He had mentioned before the devastation which he conceived likely to take place, if a high duty was laid on this article. The observation was thought by the gentleman who spoke last, to be altogether without foundation; he hoped it was. But here his reason and wishes were at variance. He was convinced that the fishery had for some years past been very unproductive; not but that the fish were to be had in plenty, and the fishermen's abilities were equal to any other in the world; but because they could not find a market to dispose of the product of his labor. He was pretty certain the trade would have been abandoned by many who have carried on a losing trade, had it not been for the hope that a more energetic government would be framed, which would give them that support which the importance of the subject required.

All he wished on the present occasion, was to lay such a duty as should protect the manufacture. He feared no loss to the revenue; because if the duty was low, all molasses would be entered and paid for, whereas, if it was high, it would induce an illicit trade, as injurious to the morals of the people as the consumption of our country rum. In addition, he considered it a necessary of life, and would never consent to tax it fifty per cent. upon its value, nor did he believe any other gentleman would, if considered that the tax would operate more against the poor than the rich, because the poor were the principal consumers of the article.

Mr. GOODPASTER.—Fifteen cents, the sum laid on

Jamaica spirits, is about one-third part of its value; now eight cents on molasses is considerably more; the former is an article of luxury, as was observed when it was under consideration, therefore that duty might not be improper; but the latter cannot be said to partake of that quality in the substance, and when manufactured into rum it is no more a luxury than Jamaica spirits. I cannot see, therefore, why molasses ought to be taxed forty or fifty per cent. when the other pays but thirty-three. Surely the substance ought not to pay at this rate—then what good reason can be offered for the measure?

Mr. LAWRENCE adverted to the price of the molasses, which at the place of importation was worth one shilling and nine pence. West India rum he stated to be worth three shillings and four pence or three shillings and sixpence—the duties were not in the same proportion. He thought the labor of distillation ought not to be taxed—a gallon of molasses gave a gallon of rum; but it ought not to be charged even upon the principles of the advocates for high duties, at more than six cents.

Mr. BOURNOR had attended to the arguments of the gentlemen on both sides of the question, and was led to believe the proportion was not properly observed. By the resolution of Congress, in 1783, the molasses was fixed upon due consideration at one penny, and West India rum at four pence. The proposed proportion was two-thirds of what is charged on West India rum. He thought this too high, as it would be an encouragement on a considerable manufacture; six cents were therefore a more equitable rate than eight cents were; he believed also, that it was as much as the article would bear, especially if it was considered that the whole of the article was not manufactured into rum, but a large proportion consumed in substance. This might also be near what is intended to be charged on sugar; by fixing it at this rate, the necessity of lowering the duty at some future day would be avoided, which he thought an object worthy of the committee's consideration.

Mr. GOODHUE observed that even six cents bore no kind of proportion to the tax laid in Massachusetts upon this article; it was much too high, and could not fail of giving great dissatisfaction among the people.

Mr. AMES.—If the committee pass a resolution that shall have a tendency to injure the sale of country rum, the fact is, that being unable any longer to export it, we shall have such a quantity on hand as to occasion the ruin of those concerned in the manufacture; for unless it is exported, they have no means of disposing of it. The quantity annually exported is very considerable, and it gives employ to several thousand tons of shipping; if therefore the trade is stopped by our restrictions, it will have a fatal effect upon our navigation, the encouragement of which is admitted to be of high importance to every part of the Union.

Mr. MADISON stated, that the rum exported in one year since the peace, amounted to six hundrd and eighty-three thousand and some odd gallons, the principal part of which was sent to different parts of the United States; now, if a considerable difference was made in the duties between West India rum and that of our own manufacture, the consequence would be, that an inferior liquor would overspread the country, and the revenue become unproductive; but he did not wish, objectionable as the manufacture of this article was, that it should have no encouragement. If gentlemen would be satisfied with a small reduction, he would withdraw his motion for eight cents; but he believed six cents would be too low, he therefore moved to tax it with seven cents.

Mr. BOURNOR wished the gentleman to consider the difference in the price; if he did that, he would allow it to be reduced to six cents; if this principle could now be fixed, it would carry them through the whole.

Mr. PATRICK allowed, if all the molasses was distilled into rum, that a small duty might be proper; but when it was considered as an article of sustenance to the poor, and as a requisite to the support of the fisheries and navigation, he hoped the committee would allow but a very small one, indeed. He wished it was possible to discriminate between what was manufactured into rum, and what was consumed in the raw state, because a higher duty might be collected in the former case than in the latter.

Mr. FITZSIMONS stated, that there were 327,000 gallons of rum imported into Pennsylvania in 1785, which would tend to show how great a part was consumed by the citizens of the Union; a demand in one State so great as this, proved how likely it was for New England rum to rival the West India. He thought the prices of the two articles gave the country rum a very considerable advantage, and therefore, a duty of seven cents could not be very injurious to the manufacture.

The question was put on seven cents and lost. And it was agreed to fill the blank with six cents.

On filling up the blank on Madeira wine, Mr. SHERMAN moved fifteen cents.

Mr. GILMAN moved twenty cents, and Mr. HARTLEY moved thirty cents, in order (as he observed) to make it correspond with the rate per cent. on the value; as the principle of proportion seemed to be admitted by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN said, it appeared to him to be pretty well proportioned; because those who accustomed themselves to drink wine, consumed two or three times as much as those who used spirits, and consequently paid a due proportion.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I shall move you, sir, that the blank be filled with fifty cents. I observed some gentlemen, in their arguments on the last article, laid great stress upon the impropriety of taxing the necessities of life that were principally consumed by the poorer class of citizens. I do not think any of the members of this committee consider the article of Madeira wine a necessary of life, at least to those whose incomes are only sufficient for a temperate subsistence; therefore no objection of this kind can be made on the present occasion. The propriety of a high tax on wines, I apprehend, is self-evident, whether we consider the price of the article, or the ability of the people to pay who consume it. The value of a pipe of Madeira wine, I believe, is about two hundred dollars; a hogshead of rum is worth about forty dollars. The ability of those who consume the one and the other are, I suppose, in nearly the same ratio. I do not pretend to know what are the intentions of gentlemen on this subject, but my wish is, to raise so considerable a revenue from imports as to render it unnecessary to apply to any other mode. If this be the wish of the committee also, they will be inclined to raise a great part of it from the consumption of those people who are best able to pay, among whom we may, with great propriety, reckon the consumers of Madeira wine.

Mr. P. MÜHLENBERG thought his colleague's observations were very judicious, and said they met exactly his ideas; he therefore seconded the motion for fifty cents.

Mr. BLAND.—I am not against laying any sum on this article which there is a probability of collecting; but I am afraid we are running wild in the business, and although we appear to be in search of revenue, we are pursuing a track that will lead us wide of our mark. I am really suspicious, if we lay a duty of fifty cents upon Madeira wine, we shall not have a single gallon entered in any port of the United States, and we shall fully verify to the world the truth of an old maxim, that two and two, in finance, do not make four. I would therefore suggest to the committee, the propriety of considering well, whether they can or cannot collect the high duty proposed. If they are well convinced that it can be done, and will satisfy me only that there is a probability of its being the case, I shall cheerfully concur in the motion; but at present I am of opinion we shall not be able to obtain any revenue whatsoever if the tax is laid so high.

Mr. LAWRENCE apprehended the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FITZSIMONS) was mistaken in the price of Madeira wine; he had stated it to be worth two hundred dollars a pipe; it might be so when sold for consumption, but it was not worth more than half that sum at the time of importation; wherefore, on the principle of proportioning the impost to the value, he would propose twenty cents.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I mentioned two hundred dollars as the value of a pipe of Madeira wine when sold for consumption, and so far as my experience goes, I believe it to be the case. Madeira wine is not only regulated by the first cost and charges on transportation, but also by the time it is kept to prepare it for consumption; and I know, sir, there are Madeira wines at a less price imported, which are not consumed; but I believe what is actually consumed sells for little less than the sum I mentioned. No wine can be bought in the island of Madeira for less than twenty-four pounds sterling the pipe. This, with the expense and charges of shipping, freight, &c., will bring the lowest kind of wine far beyond what the gentleman from New York estimates it at. Comparing, therefore, the duty with the value of the article, I believe it will be found that fifty cents is not much too high; if therefore the committee will not grant that sum, they certainly will be for something near it.

Mr. BOURNOR.—I agree entirely with the principle of laying duties according to their relative value, and hope the committee will keep up the line of proportion as near as possible. It is only in the application of this principle on the present occasion, that I differ with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, for whose opinions I have the highest respect. I confess, too, that he is much better able to ascertain the price of foreign articles than I am; but I believe, with regard to this one of Madeira wine, I have it in my power to ascertain it pretty well. I take it, that a pipe of wine usually costs at Madeira from twenty-five to thirty pounds sterling; but then I would wish the committee to take into consideration that this wine is paid for there in our own produce at a very advantageous rate, which reduces the nominal sterling sum down in value to a like sum of our currency. I therefore look upon it, that we may calculate the cost of a gallon of Madeira wine at one dollar; for I cannot conceive that any gentleman entertains an idea of taking the risk the merchants runs in importing the wine, or the increased value it obtains during the time it takes to ripen for sale. In laying our duties we ought to apportion it to the value of the article at the time and place of importation, without taking advantage of such adventitious circumstances. Besides, a considerable loss attends in keeping Madeira. The storage is no inconsiderable expense, and the evaporation is an actual loss in quantity, which the merchant is obliged to replace by filling up the cask. Under these considerations, I think it may be admitted, that twenty or twenty-five cents per gallon is a sufficient tax. Moreover, it may be easily demonstrated, that such a duty would be more productive than fifty cents, because it would be with greater certainty collected. There is another reason that induces me to think twenty cents more proper; fifty cents for a gallon of wine is a large sum for a merchant to lay down in duties; it must abridge his mercantile operations, and consequently tend to discourage the Madeira trade, which, in my humble opinion, is one of the most advantageous America has left to her, from the selfish policy that actuates some foreign Powers; therefore we ought not to burden it to so great a degree as the proposed duty seems to have in contemplation.

Mr. LAWRENCE thought that a pipe of Madeira was not worth more than he had before intimated at the time it was imported. It was true, that as the wine increased in age it became more valuable, and, on an average, might be valued at the time of consumption at about two hundred dollars; now, if he was right, and from the observations that were already made, he concluded that laying a duty of fifty cents would be fifty per cent. on the value, or rather more, because a pipe of Madeira generally held more than one hundred gallons, and its value seldom on exceeded one hundred dollars. He thought it would operate as a premium to encourage smuggling, and therefore was not inclined to vote for more than twenty cents.

Mr. FITZSIMONS withdrew his motion for fifty cents, and moved thirty-three and one-third cents. The question was put upon thirty-three and one-third cents as the highest sum, and agreed to, being twenty-one votes for it, and nineteen against it.

The next article, "on all other wines," presented itself in order for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. HENRY observed there was a great variety of wines included in that general expression, the prices of which were very different; some worth even more than Madeira, and others less; he submitted, therefore, to the committee the propriety of discriminating and taxing them according to their value.

Mr. BONDINOT acquiesced in the remark. Mr. FITZSIMONS did not think it worth while, at this time, to engage the committee in making such a discrimination. The rich wines were imported in no very considerable quantities, and if the duty was laid pretty high, it would tend to exclude the most inferior and low wines from being introduced.

It was thereupon agreed to lay twenty cents on all other wines.

The next article on the list was "bohea tea," on which

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed that he meant this article not only as a revenue, but as a regulation of a commerce highly advantageous to the United States. The merchants of this country have, from a variety of circumstances, and finding their trade restrained and embarrassed, been under the necessity of exploring channels to which they were heretofore unaccustomed. At length they have succeeded in discovering one that bids fair to increase our national importance and prosperity, while at the same time it is lucrative to the persons engaged in its prosecution. I mean, sir, the trade to China and the East Indies. I have no doubt but what it will receive the encouragement of the Federal Government for some time to come. There is scarcely any direct intercourse of this nature, but what requires some assistance in the beginning; it is peculiarly necessary in our case, from the jealousy subsisting in Europe of this infant branch of commerce. It has been thought proper, under some of the State Governments, to foster and protect a direct communication with India. I hope the Government of the United States has an equal disposition to give this trade their encouragement.

I wish, therefore, the committee would pass over the article for the present, and permit it to come in at another place in the list, where I mean to move a discrimination in the duty on teas, according as they are imported, directly from China in our own ships, or in any ships from Europe. Mr. MANISON expressed an apprehension that if the two objects of revenue and commerce were he had also prepared, and purposes shortly to publish, another book under the title of the "History of the American Revolution," and praying that a law may pass for securing to the petitioner, his heirs and assigns, for a certain term of years, the sole and exclusive right of vending and disposing of the said books within the United States.

Also, a petition of John Churchman, setting forth that, by several years' labor, close application, and at great expense, he hath invented several different methods by which the principles of magnetic variation are so explained, that the latitude of a place being given, its longitude may be easily determined; and praying that a law may pass for vesting in the petitioner, his heirs and assigns, an exclusive right of vending spheres, hemispheres, maps, charts, and tables, on his principles of magnetism, throughout the United States; as, also, that he may receive the patronage of Congress to enable him to perform a voyage to Baffin's Bay, for the purpose of making magnetical experiments to ascertain the causes of the variation of the needle, and how near the longitude may be thereby ascertained.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to a committee of three, and that Messrs. TUCKER, WHITE, and HURTINGTON, be the said committee. A petition of David Ramsay, of the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that Mr. William Smith, a member returned to serve in this House as one of the representatives for the State of South Carolina, was, at the time of his election, ineligible thereto, and came within the disqualification of the third paragraph of the Constitution, which declares "that no person shall be a representative who shall not have been seven years a citizen of the United States," and praying that these allegations may be inquired into by the House.

Referred to the Committee on Elections. Mr. BENSON, from the committee to whom it was referred to consider of and report to the House respecting the ceremonial of receiving the PRESIDENT, and to whom was also referred a letter from the Chairman of a Committee of the Senate to the SPEAKER, communicating an instruction from that House to a committee thereof, to report if any, and what, arrangements are necessary for the reception of the PRESIDENT, made the following report:

"That Mr. Osgood, the proprietor of the house lately occupied by the President of Congress, be requested to put the same, and the furniture therein, in proper condition for the residence and use of the President of the United States, to provide for his temporary accommodation."

"That it will be most eligible, in the first instance, that a committee of three members from the Senate, and five from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Houses respectively, to attend to receive the President at such place as he shall embark from New Jersey for this city, and conduct him without form to the house lately occupied by the President of Congress, and that at such time thereafter, as the President shall signify it will be convenient for him, he be formally received by both Houses."

"That a committee of two members from the Senate, and three members from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Houses respectively, wait on the President of the United States, as soon as he shall come to this city; and, in the name of the Congress of the United States, congratulate him on his arrival."

And a committee of five was balloted for and chosen accordingly, for the purpose of waiting on the President.

Another committee of three was appointed to wait on the Vice President.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PACE in the Chair; the question being on inserting, in the list of dutiable articles, beer, ale, and porter—

Mr. FITZSIMONS meant to make an alteration in this article, by distinguishing beer, ale, and porter, imported in casks, from what was imported in bottles. He thought this manufacture one highly deserving of encouragement. If the morals of the people were to be improved by what entered into their diet, it would be prudent in the National Legislature to encourage the manufacture of malt liquors. The small protecting duties laid in Pennsylvania had a great effect towards the establishment of breweries; they no longer imported this article, but, on the contrary, exported considerable quantities, and, in two or three years, with the fostering aid of Government, would be able to furnish enough for the whole consumption of the United States. He moved nine cents per gallon.

Mr. LAWRENCE seconded the motion. He would have this duty 30¢ high as to give a decided preference to American beer; it would tend also to encourage agriculture, because the malt and hops consumed in the manufacture were the produce of our own grounds.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was opposed to such high duties as seemed to be in the contemplation of some members of the committee. He thought enough might be raised if the tax was lowered. He formed this opinion from some calculations he had made with respect to the imports at Baltimore. He stated them to amount for the last year, at the rate now proposed, to £238,163; to this, if he added five other districts in Maryland, the probable amount of which, on the same principle, would be £185,537; then, these two sums multiplied by twelve, the supposed proportion that Maryland ought to bear of the national debt, would produce £5,324,400, a sum exceeding very considerably what the wants of the Union required.

Mr. GALE thought a duty of nine cents would operate as a prohibition upon the importation of beer and porter. He remarked the advantages which America possessed in growing malt and hops for the manufacture of these articles. In addition to this, the risk and expense of bringing it from Europe was to be considered. Upon the whole, he concluded so high a duty as nine cents would give the brewers here a monopoly, defeat the purposes of obtaining revenue, enhance the price of the consumer, and thereby establish the use of spirituous liquors. For these considerations he was against that sum.

[H. or R.]

Mr. SINKINS declared himself a friend to this manufacture, and thought if the duty was laid high enough to effect a prohibition, the manufacture would increase, and, of consequence, the price be lessened. He considered it of importance, inasmuch as the materials were produced in the country, and tended to advance the agricultural interest.

Mr. MADISON moved to lay an impost of eight cents on all beer imported. He did not think this sum would give a monopoly, but hoped it would be such encouragement as to induce the manufacture to take deep root in every State in the Union; in this case it would produce the collateral good hinted at by the gentleman from New Jersey, which, in his opinion, was an object well worthy of being attended to. He observed that, in the State of New York, the article paid a duty equal to six cents on importation, and if brought in foreign vessels, it amounted to eight cents; and yet quantities of it were still imported, which proved that eight cents would not amount to a prohibition.

The committee agreed hereupon to charge it at eight cents.

On all beer, ale, or porter, imported in bottles, per dozen, twenty-five cents. Agreed to without debate.

On every barrel of beef it was moved to lay a duty of a dollar per barrel.

Mr. BLAND thought that very little revenue was likely to be collected on this article, let the duty be more or less; and as it was to be had in sufficient quantities within the United States, perhaps a tax amounting to a prohibition would be proper.

Mr. THATCHER admitted that there was beef enough to be got in every part of the country, but it was fresh beef. Some States, from local circumstances, were unable to sell and preserve it, therefore a tax on this article would operate as a partial tax upon those States. If there is a sufficient quantity in the other States to answer their own consumption, they will feel no part of the burden; but it appeared unnecessary to him to lay this restriction, because he found some States capable of exporting beef on terms as reasonably low as any other country could, and it could not, therefore, be contended for as a requisite encouragement to this branch of the agricultural interest.

Mr. GOODRUE did not contend that it was necessary to lay a particular duty on beef, although it was among the enumerated articles admitted by the committee. He was satisfied of the fact, that meat could be put up here cheaper than in Europe, and afforded at a less price, so there was little to apprehend from rivalry.

Mr. MADISON thought that almost every State in the Union had more of this article than was necessary for its own consumption, and consequently there was no danger of its being imported, unless the quality of the foreign beef was superior. He would not object to gentlemen gratifying themselves with this meat, especially as the consumption was neither so great nor general as to affect the revenue, and therefore he judged it might be struck out.

Mr. TUCKER thought with the gentleman from Virginia, that the regulation was unnecessary, and that it would be better to throw it into the common mass, taxable at a certain rate per cent. He therefore moved to have it struck out.

Upon these considerations, the articles of beef, pork, and butter, were all struck out.

Mr. FITZSIMONS moved to lay a duty of two cents on all candles of tallow per pound.

Mr. TUCKER observed that some States were under the necessity of importing considerable quantities of this article also, while others had enough, and more than enough, for their own consumption; therefore the burden would be partially borne by such States. As the committee had just rejected some articles upon this principle, he would move that this be struck out likewise.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I am not for striking out, sir. Every article imported into the State that gentleman represents, from which revenue is to be raised, he moves to have struck out; but I wish the committee to consider a moment before they join in sentiment with him. The manufacture of candles is an important manufacture, and far advanced towards perfection. I have no doubt but in a few years we shall be able to furnish sufficient to supply the consumption of every part of the Continent. In Pennsylvania we have a duty of two pence per pound, and under the operation of this small encouragement the manufacture has gained considerable strength. We no longer import candles from Ireland or England, of whom a few years ago we took considerable quantities; the necessity of continuing those encouragements which the State Legislatures have deemed proper, exist in a considerable degree; therefore it will be politic in the Government of the United States to continue such duties till their object is accomplished.

Mr. TUCKER would be glad to know what article it was that South Carolina would not contribute her full proportion of tax upon? he saw none; on the contrary, so far as the enumeration went, the impost would bear unequally upon her, and he feared many others in the list would increase the imposition. He thought it the duty of the committee to guard against an unequal distribution of the public burden in every case, and therefore wished the duty on this article to be a moderate one; not because it affected the State he represented, for it did not do this to any degree—as wax candles were there principally consumed, the material for which was the production of the Southern States—but because other States, not having this advantage, might be oppressed.

Mr. BORDINOT apprehended most States imported considerable quantities of this article from Russia and Ireland; he expected they would be made cheaper than they could be imported, if a small encouragement was held out by the Government, as the materials were to be had in abundance in our country.

[H. or R.]

Mr. LAWRENCE thought that if candles were an object of considerable importation, they ought to be taxed for the sake of obtaining revenue, and if they were not imported in considerable quantities, the burden upon the consumer would be small, while it tended to cherish a valuable manufacture. He seconded Mr. FITZSIMONS's motion for two cents; which was carried in the affirmative upon the question being put.

On all candles of wax or spermaceti, per pound, six cents; cheese, four cents; soap, two cents; boots, per pair, fifty cents; on all shoes, slippers, or goloshes made of leather, ten cents; on all shoes or slippers made of silk or stuff, ten cents; on all steel unwrought, per 112 pounds, —.

Mr. LEE moved to strike out this last article, observing that the consumption of steel was very great, and essentially necessary to agricultural improvements. He did not believe any gentleman would contend that enough of this article to answer consumption could be fabricated in any part of the Union; hence it would operate as an oppressive, though indirect tax upon agriculture, and any tax, whether direct or indirect, upon this interest, at this juncture, would be unwise and impolitic.

Mr. TUCKER joined the gentleman in his opinion, observing that it was impossible for some States to get it but by importation from foreign countries. He conceived it more deserving a bounty to increase the quantity, than an impost which would lessen the consumption and make it dearer also.

Mr. CLYMER replied, that the manufacture of steel in America was rather in its infancy; but as all the materials necessary to make it were the produce of almost every State in the Union, and as the manufacture was already established, and attended with considerable success, he deemed it prudent to emancipate our country from the manacles in which she was held by foreign manufactures. A furnace in Philadelphia, with a very small aid from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, made three hundred tons in two years, and now makes at the rate of two hundred and thirty tons annually, and with a little further encouragement would supply enough for the consumption of the Union. He hoped, therefore, gentlemen would be disposed, under these considerations, to extend a degree of patronage to a manufacture which a moment's reflection would convince them was highly deserving protection.

Mr. FITZSIMONS judged that the gentlemen who were against the article had taken for granted what was not founded in fact. It was said that it would operate as an oppressive tax upon agriculture, and could not be obtained otherwise than from foreign countries. The first objection depended upon the sum with which the blank should be filled up; for his part, he had not an idea of increasing it beyond five shillings per hundred weight; this would affect the agricultural interest very little, even suppose it was to be paid upon all that was used; but he hoped to prove that sufficient quantities could be made in America for her consumption. My colleague has staged, and I believe very justly, that in Philadelphia they made, in less than two years, three hundred tons, and if the demand was increased, they could manufacture as many thousands, with a small encouragement from the General Government. Suppose five shillings per hundred weight was imposed, it might be, as stated, a partial duty; but would not the evil be soon overbalanced by the establishment of such an important manufacture? a great and principal manufacture for every agricultural country, but particularly useful in the United States. When viewed in this light, he had no doubt but every member of the committee would readily assent to a small duty.

Mr. MADISON thought the object of selecting this article to be solely the encouragement of the manufacture, and not revenue, for on any other consideration it would be more proper, as observed by the gentleman from Carolina, (Mr. TUCKER,) to give a bounty on the importation. It was so materially connected with the improvement of agriculture and other manufactures, that he questioned its propriety even on that score. A duty would tend to depress many mechanic arts in the proportion that it protected this; he thought it best to reserve this article to the non-enumerated ones, where it would be subject to a five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. TUCKER considered the smallest tax on this article to be a burden on agriculture, which ought to be considered an interest most deserving protection and encouragement; on this is our principal reliance, on it also our safety and happiness depend. When he considered the state of it in that part of the country which he represented on this floor, and in some other parts of the Union, he was really at a loss to imagine with what propriety any gentleman could propose a measure big with oppression, and tending to burden particular States. The situation of South Carolina was melancholy; while the inhabitants were deeply in debt, the produce of the State was daily falling in price. Rice and indigo were become so low as to be considered by many not objects worthy of cultivation; and gentlemen will consider that it is not an easy thing for a planter to change his whole system of husbandry in a moment; but accumulated burdens will drive to this, and add to their embarrassments. He thought an impost of five per cent. as great an encouragement as ought to be granted, and would not oppose that being laid. He called upon gentlemen to exercise liberality and moderation in what they proposed, if they wished to give satisfaction and do justice to their constituents.

Mr. FITZSIMONS thought, if gentlemen did not get rid of local considerations, the committee would make little progress. Every State will feel itself oppressed by a duty on particular articles, but when the whole system is perfected, the burden will be equal on all. He did not desire, for his part, to obtain exclusive advantages for Pennsylvania; he would contend, and undertake to prove, that by the duties already agreed to, that State sacrificed as much as any other. Indeed, if he had said more, he believed himself capable of proving the position. Being of this opinion, he hoped the committee would agree to grant her an advantage which would revert back upon the other parts of the Union, without operating, even for the present, to the material disadvantage of any. Some States were, from local circumstances, better situated to carry on the manufacture than others, and would derive some little advantage on this account in the commencement of the business. The Eastern States were so situated, perhaps some of the Middle ones also; but will it therefore be insisted upon, that the Southern States pay more of the impost on foreign goods than these? For his part, he never could conceive that the consumption of those articles by the negroes of South Carolina would contribute to the revenue as much as that of the white inhabitants of the Eastern States. But laying aside local distinctions, what operates to the benefit of one part in establishing useful institutions, will eventually operate to the advantage of the whole. With these considerations, he cheerfully submitted the article to the discretion of the committee, moving to fill the blank with sixty-six cents.

Mr. BLAND considered a tax of sixty-six cents a very heavy duty on agriculture and the mechanic arts, and was averse to granting it.

Mr. BOURNOR moved fifty-six cents, which motion was agreed to.

On nails and spikes, it was agreed to lay one cent per pound; on tanned cordage, fifty cents per 112 pounds; on untanned cordage, sixty cents per 112 pounds; on twine or pack-thread, one hundred cents per 112 pounds.

Mr. MADISON said, that he was not clear as to the policy of taxing cordage. He thought ship-building an object worthy of legislative attention, and questioned the propriety of raising the price of any article that entered so materially into the structure of vessels. But if it was politic to lay an impost on cordage, would it not be the same with regard to hemp? He thought it would, and therefore moved it.

Mr. BOURNOR.—Hemp is a raw material, necessary for an important manufacture, and therefore ought not to be subject to a heavy duty. If it was the product of the country in general, a duty might be proper, but this he believed was not the case.

Mr. MADISON.—I said before that I very much doubted the propriety of laying a duty on such articles as entered into ship-building; but if it is necessary to lay a duty on cordage for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture, and making us independent of the world as to that article, it is also politic to endeavor to make us alike independent for the raw material; a great proportion of the land in the Western country is peculiarly adapted to the growth of hemp, and it might be there cultivated to advantage, if the labors of the husbandman were protected by the Government.

Mr. BOURNOR thought the soil of this country ill adapted to the cultivation of hemp; even the strong low lands which are fit for it, soon became exhausted; it impoverished the lands wherever it grew, and destroyed the agricultural stamina. If he was not mistaken in this opinion, he thought the committee would, with him, disagree to the motion.

Mr. PARRINOR thought a duty on hemp would tend to discourage the American navigation, the trade, and fisheries, without any good resulting to warrant such an injury. It was not ascertained whether hemp could be furnished in any tolerable quantities to answer the demand, and if, upon experience, it should be found that the quantity was insufficient, what a stab this would prove to all concerned in ship-building.

Mr. AMES expressed a doubt of the policy of taxing either cordage or hemp, because while it tended to encourage the agriculture or manufacture, it discouraged the maritime interest, and therefore the discouragement, in the event, would reflect back upon those interests it was intended to cherish.

Mr. MOORE declared the Southern States well calculated for the cultivation of hemp, and, from certain circumstances, well inclined thereto. He conceived it the duty of the committee to pay as much respect to the encouragement and protection of husbandry (the most important of all interests in the United States) as they did to manufactures.

Mr. FITZSIMONS thought there was a clear distinction between taxing manufactures and raw materials, well known to every enlightened country. He had no doubt but hemp enough could be raised for the home consumption, nay for exportation also, and why it was not done he could not say. He recollected that, before the Revolution, very little was imported; now considerable quantities are brought from England. When such a bulky article is capable of paying double freight, first from Russia and then from England, besides its first cost, he conceived that what was produced in America had a very considerable advantage. It could not be urged that the people are unacquainted with the cultivation, because it had been carried to a very great perfection in former years. If eight dollars a hundred is not a sufficient inducement to farmers to raise hemp, it is a proof that they direct their labors to more profitable productions, and why should legislative authority be exercised to divide their attention? Or, for this purpose, why should navigation and ship-building be necessarily burdened? He concluded with declaring, that no duty which the Congress would agree to lay, could give encouragement to the cultivation of hemp, if the present price of that article was insufficient.

Mr. SCOTT stated a fact or two, being perhaps as well acquainted with the Western country as any member of the committee. The lands along the frontiers, he could assure the committee, were well calculated for the cultivation of this plant; it is a production that will bear carriage by land better than any other, tobacco not excepted. He believed an encouragement of the kind now moved for would bring, in a year or two, vast quantities from that country, at little expense, to Philadelphia, even from the waters of the Ohio; the inhabitants expect some encouragement, and will be grateful for it. Although a gentleman has called it a bulky article, yet as much can be packed upon a horse as a horse can carry, or in a wagon as four horses can draw; so that its bulk will not prevent our countrymen from seeking a market on the waters of the Atlantic. The committee rose and reported, and The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 18.

A bill to regulate the taking the oath of affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a committee of five, to attend, with a committee from the Senate, to receive the President of the United States at such place as he shall embark at from New Jersey for this city.

The members elected were Messrs. BOURNOR, BLAND, TUCKER, BENSON, and LAWRENCE.

On motion, That Messrs. GILMAN, AMES, and GALE, be a committee, in conjunction with a committee from the Senate, to wait upon the Vice President of the United States upon his arrival in this city, and to congratulate him thereupon in the name of the Congress of the United States.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAES in the Chair.

Mr. HARTLEY.—Notwithstanding what gentlemen had said yesterday to enforce the propriety of laying a duty on hemp, it was in the knowledge of every gentleman, that America did not furnish this article in quantities sufficient for its consumption; any restraint, therefore, on the importation of the raw material would strike at the root of the manufacture. A contrary policy was pursued by England in all cases where a raw material was necessarily imported. He conceived that the sense of the committee was already expressed to countenance the making of cordage, which is a most necessary and valuable branch of ship-building, therefore he doubted the policy of the proposed measure, but for the sake of conciliation he would agree to a very small duty.

Mr. MOORE thought it good policy to encourage the manufacture of cordage, but was not convinced that it was bad policy to encourage likewise the growth of the raw material in America, so that we might become as independent of all the world for this article, as we are already for every other used in the structure of vessels. He believed it would be difficult to persuade the farmer that his interest ought to be neglected to encourage particular artisans; he therefore begged the committee to do as much for them as was in their power, believing that the event of such policy would mutually benefit the manufacturer and agriculturist.

Mr. HENRIS remarked that a heavy duty on hemp would not encourage the raising of it this year, because the time was elapsed for commencing the cultivation; but a duty, to take place at some future time, would no doubt be beneficial. He assured the committee of the ability of the land in America to grow hemp, equal to any part of the world; and, therefore, joined heartily in giving it legislative encouragement, in order to induce the people to turn their attention more particularly to the subject, but would recommend the duty to be laid so as to commence its operation at a distant day.

Mr. WHITS remarked, what was good policy in England might be the contrary in America. England was a maritime nation, and therefore she gave a bounty on such articles as were requisite to support her maritime importance. America was an agricultural country, and therefore ought to attend to the encouragement of that interest. If the Legislature take no notice of this article, the people will be led to believe it is not an object worthy of encouragement, and the spirit of cultivation will be damped; whereas, if a small duty only was laid, it might point out to them that it was desirable, and would induce an increase of the quantity. Our lands are capable of bearing this plant many years without being exhausted. He could not say exactly what sum would be proper to fill the blank with, but mentioned seventy-five cents for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. PARRINOR admitted the propriety of encouraging agriculture, but it ought not to be done at the expense of the ship-builders, especially as the good would not balance the evil. He told the committee that hemp had risen, within three or four years, forty per cent in Russia, owing, perhaps, to the increased demand which the present Northern war occasioned. This naturally operated to encourage the cultivation in America, and perhaps was sufficient, without the aid now intended to be given. If gentlemen were desirous of having it stand among the selected articles, he should not object, but hoped the duty would not exceed five per cent. Forty cents were about equal to that rate, and he moved to fill the blank with that sum.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—A high duty would prevent the importation of hemp, and encourage that of cordage; so that the raw material would be lessened for the manufacture, and the quantity of foreign ready-made cordage increased. The effect of this would be the annihilation of the manufacture, without any advantage to the husbandman; for when sufficient quantities could be raised, there would be no person to work it up; or, if gentlemen persisted in laying a duty on hemp, they must agree to reconsider that on cordage, for the purpose of raising it, in order to make the two bear such a proportion as that the home manufacture might have a preference over the foreign.

Mr. GOODHUE was disposed to lay a duty on

[H. or R.]

Duties on Imports.

[APRIL, 1789.]

hemp for the purpose of encouraging the cultivation, but he did not think that the duty on cordage was proportioned to what the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WARR) had proposed on hemp. He therefore insisted on the propriety of raising the former.

Mr. PARSONS informed the committee, that the State of Massachusetts imposed only a duty of one per cent. on the importation of hemp, which was applied to form a bounty of a dollar per hundred weight on that raised within the State.

Mr. BOURNOR took it for granted that hemp would be subjected to a duty, and accorded with the gentleman from Massachusetts in making it forty cents. He thought this would combine the two interests in such a manner as to do the most good and least evil. He confessed that he was against taxing this article, because of the uncertainty which he conceived there was of raising it in America; but as that point was determined against him by the testimony of gentlemen well qualified to judge, he would acquiesce in laying a small duty.

Mr. HARTLEY preferred giving a bounty on hemp of American growth, to taxing the foreign, because the existence of the manufacture, and of ship-building also, was involved in the price of the raw material. He hoped America would soon become in reality what nature had destined her to be—a maritime nation. He therefore could not think it good policy to pursue measures which must cramp the growth of a fleet.

Gentlemen had made some remarks upon a country well qualified for the cultivation of hemp. He believed what had been advanced was fact. He should say nothing at this time to ascertain how far it would be proper to endeavor to settle the Western country. Though he had a real friendship for that new world, yet the policy of taxing the navigation of the Atlantic States for the purpose of encouraging their agriculture, was a question worthy of some consideration. He would add no more, but a wish that the committee would lay the duty low.

Mr. MOORE made some observations on the propriety of encouraging the home manufactures. It had already been mentioned as incongruous to blend the subject in the present bill, therefore he would say nothing on that point; but it was undoubtedly the interest of the husbandman to get what he wanted, at the cheapest rate. By the encouragement given to manufactures you raise them in price, while a competition is destroyed which tended to the advantage of agriculture. He thought the manufacturing interest ought not to stand in the way of the other; but as the committee had agreed to give it encouragement, he hoped the other would receive its share of legislative support. Seventy-five cents on hemp will not more than equal what was laid on cordage, and therefore he should vote for it.

Mr. WARR thought, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the United States would furnish this article in sufficient abundance, not only for home consumption, but for exportation. The maritime Powers of Europe do not raise the article, but obtain it principally from Russia; these Powers are as well disposed to take it from us as from Russia. Our back lands are extremely well adapted to its cultivation; a road to bring it to market is opening; the Potomac extends her navigable waters into the interior country, and a communication will be established with the river Ohio and the western waters. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HARTLEY) had hinted at the propriety of settling the Western territory; it was his opinion that every encouragement ought to be given, them to engage their affection; that the administration of the Government ought to be such as to give satisfaction to all parts of the Union, but it is peculiarly our interest to render that country advantageous; her fertile lands, and streams easy of descent, would pour into the Atlantic States, through the channels he had mentioned, a profusion of wealth, and hemp in abundance. The Shenandoah river disembogues into the Potomac, the South Branch communicates with it also, and a number of other rivers whose lands will produce immense quantities. He considered that this, in a short time, would do more towards encouraging ship-building than a bounty, as had been mentioned by some gentlemen.

Mr. SCOTT thought he had as perfect a sense of the relation between agriculture and commerce, as any man; in a word, he knew the one could not exist without the other. I think, added he, that if the landed interest is ruined by our regulations, the ruin of the manufacturing interest must be a necessary consequence. Our country furnishes none of the precious metals or jewels; we have nothing to depend upon but the productions of the soil, and the overplus of these productions is of little value, unless a market takes it off. We have no market but what our merchants procure; hence the necessity of both interests going hand in hand—they must stand or fall together. Agriculture is entitled to its proportion of encouragement, so also are manufactures and commerce, and for no more than that proportion do I contend. Manufactures are useful establishments; we found their convenience in the last war; but our circumstances do not admit us to become an extensive manufacturing country. We cannot contemplate the exportation of our manufactures to foreign nations; we cannot, by reason of the demand for labor, vie with Europe; her inhabitants are numerous, and their industry would be lost unless employed in the arts; the compensation made to them is comparatively small. But our country, from its extent, is like a world within itself, and its inhabitants will find a readier support from cultivating the land than from manufacturing; the latter interest is limited from its very nature; so that I take it for granted it is not intended to sacrifice the one interest to the other. I said yesterday, that a small duty on imported hemp would produce a great quantity from a country now useless to us in a considerable degree. Hemp will bear the expense of carriage, which no kind of grain can; and, consequently, increase the value of our vacant territory; but if there was no convenience by the route of the Potomac, or across the mountains, to bring to your seaports the hemp which you want, yet the Mississippi would furnish the means; and, with the encouragement, nay, but small encouragement, of the General Government, more of this article would issue out of the mouth of that river alone than the whole of the United States could consume. We who live there are no strangers to its navigation, nor do we find it difficult to construct boats of great dimensions, capable of floating down many tons; but large quantities will be furnished also from the strong and vigorous lands in the back parts of Pennsylvania and other States. I know very well both the nature of the plant and its cultivation. It will exhaust lands, as said by the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. BOURNOR,) but it is not to be apprehended as doing injury to those I have described. Considering this business of great importance to the whole Union, I shall be in favor of it, knowing that if the people on the other side of the mountains only hear of the encouragement being proposed by Congress, they will lay hold of it as a hope, and be encouraged to draw forth the bounties of nature from a rich and fertile soil.

Mr. BURKE thought it proper to suggest to the committee what might be the probable effect of the proposed measure in the State he represented, (South Carolina,) and the adjoining one, (Georgia.) The staple products of that part of the Union were hardly worth cultivation, on account of their fall in price; the planters are, therefore, disposed to pursue some other. The lands are certainly well adapted to the growth of hemp, and he had no doubt but its culture would be practised with attention. Cotton is likewise in contemplation among them, and if good seed could be procured, he hoped it might succeed. But the low, strong rice lands, would produce hemp in abundance—many thousand tons even this year, if it was not so late in the season. He liked the idea of laying a low duty now, and encouraging it against the time when a supply might be had from our own cultivation.

Mr. MADISON feared seventy-five cents was too high; he was doubtful whether it would not have been as well to have left out cordage; for if a duty on hemp was impolitic because it burdened navigation, so also was that on cordage. He by no means approved of measures injurious to ship-building, which he considered in a three-fold view: first, as it related to vessels employed in the coasting trade; second, as it respected those employed in those channels of trade, the stream of which depends upon the policy of foreign nations; and third, as it was connected with vessels built for sale. With respect to the first, no doubt but we can prevent any discouragement from the operation of the duty, because we can make such discrimination as will prevent a rivalry; but, in relation to the two other points, and particularly the last, he was sensible that every penny laid upon cordage would enter into the price of the vessel, and, by raising the price, drive the purchasers to seek a better bargain at other hands. Fearful, therefore, of injuring this interest, he should vote for a small duty at present, in hopes of being able to see, in a little time, sufficient quantities of hemp brought to market, as predicted, at even a less price than is given now for the imported.

Mr. SMITH agreed to forty cents, provided the committee would make it one dollar at the end of two years.

Mr. MADISON could not judge of the alteration in the circumstances of this country two years hence, and therefore did not like the kind of provision mentioned. He preferred making it a positive sum, and moved fifty cents; which was agreed to.

On malt.

Mr. SHERMAN thought this might be struck out, on the same principle that beef and pork had been, there was none imported.

Mr. FLETCHER replied, that there had been considerable and recent importations of this article into the United States—30,000 bushels in one year; certainly this interferes with the products of the country. He moved ten cents per bushel, and it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. AMES, barley was taxed six cents, and lime one hundred cents. He just stated that these articles were imported in considerable quantities from a neighboring State that had not yet adopted the Constitution; and, perhaps, said he, our political situation is such as to make some regulation on this head necessary.

On nails, spikes, tacks, and brads.

Mr. LEE did not think we were ripe for such extensive manufactures as some gentlemen seemed desirous of encouraging; but this was particularly objectionable, because it was a tax upon the improvement of estates, unless the articles could be furnished as cheap and abundantly at home as they were by foreign nations. He moved to strike it out.

Mr. MADISON conceived this, like a tax on hemp, would increase the price of ship-building; spikes and nails were necessary for the construction of vessels.

Mr. BLAND thought a duty on nails an unequal tax, burdening the Southern States, but not felt by the Northern, who made only enough for their own consumption; he opposed it also on account of its being an article of indispensable necessity.

Mr. GOODhue informed the gentlemen who were opposed to a duty on nails, that great quantities of them were manufactured for exportation in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, and he believed some other States; and, in a little time, enough might be made to supply all North America.

Mr. AMES thought this a useful and accommodating manufacture, which yielded a clear gain of all it sold for, but the cost of the material; the labor employed in it would be thrown away, probably, in many instances. It could not be said that it required a large capital, or extraordinary abilities, to acquire a knowledge of the art. It has grown up, with little encouragement, to an astonishing degree of perfection; it has become usual for the country people in this State to erect small forges in their chimney corners, and in winter, and on evenings when little other work could be done, great quantities of nails were made even by children; perhaps enough might be manufactured in this way to supply the continent. These people take the rod iron of the merchant, and return him nails; in consequence of this easy mode of barter, the manufacture is prodigiously great. But these advantages are not exclusively in the hands of the people of Massachusetts; the business can be prosecuted in a similar manner in every State exerting equal industry. He hoped the article would remain in the hill.

Mr. SHEPARD.—The gentlemen object to these articles because they are necessary; and cannot be furnished in quantities equal to the demand; but I am of opinion, if they cannot now be had in such plenty as is wished for, they may in a very short time. Every State can manufacture them, although they cannot make nail rods. Connecticut has excellent iron ore, of which bars are made, but she gets nail rods from this city; others can do the like, and until all the States can supply themselves by their own industry, for which purpose they have everything at their hands, it may not be amiss for the Government to get some revenue from the consumption of foreign nails.

Mr. TUCKER judged, from what was said of the little expense and great facility of manufacturing nails, that it stood in no need of legislative assistance. Why lay a duty on foreign nails, when they cannot rival you if you make them as good and as cheap? Will not the five per cent. duty, with freight and shipping charges, be sufficient encouragement? He thought it would, and therefore was averse to any other duty. He observed also, that it would burden ship-building, and was, consequently, against those employed in that business.

Mr. PARSONS observed that, to the eastward, no spikes at all were imported, and few or no nails, except of some particular kinds. If spikes were not imported to the southward, he would join gentlemen in striking them out.

Mr. AMES thought it proper to add a few more observations. The committee were already informed of the flourishing condition of the manufacture, but they ought not to join the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TUCKER) in concluding that it did not therefore deserve legislative protection. The commerce of America, particularly the southern parts, had, by the force of habit and English connexions, been setting strong upon the British coasts; it required the aid of the General Government to divert it to a more natural course. Good policy and sound wisdom demonstrated the propriety of an interchange between the different States in the Union: to procure this political good some force was necessary. Laying a small duty on foreign manufactures might induce, from motives of interest as well as inclination, one fellow-citizen to barter with, or buy of another, what he had long been accustomed to make from strangers. Allowing this remark its due weight, he had no doubt but that the committee would concur in laying a small protecting duty in favor of this manufacture. Again: from the situation of the manufacturer in Europe, and the one in America, he concluded this encouragement was necessary. In Europe, the artisan is driven to labor for his bread; stern necessity, with her rod of iron, compels his exertions; but in America invitation and encouragement are necessary; without them the infant manufacture droops, and its patron seeks, with success, a competency from our cheap and fertile soil.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was not very solicitous about the duty. He thought the manufacturers would have but little to apprehend if the Legislature should decide against them; for the fact was that nails were at this moment made cheaper, and, in the opinion of some judges, better than those coming from England. Before the Revolution, the people in America were not permitted to erect slitting mills. Now they have several, and are independent of all the world for the materials necessary for carrying on the business in the most extensive manner. So far as the duty respected the manufacture in Pennsylvania, it was his opinion that refusing it would do no material injury, and he believed it would draw but little money into the treasury; yet, nevertheless, he was willing to allow a small one, because it conformed to the policy of the States, who thought it proper, in this manner, to protect their manufactures. He believed neither spikes nor nails for ship-building were imported; they were generally large and heavy, and were made in the country, according to the builder's orders.

On the motion, nails and tacks and brads were one cent per pound, but tacks and brads were struck out.

On salt, per bushel.—Mr. BRIDGE.—I need not observe to the committee that this article is a necessary of life, nor that black cattle, sheep, and horses, do not thrive without it; but I know likewise that it is a tax particularly odious to the inhabitants of South Carolina and Georgia, to whom the price is already oppressively great. The back parts of that State are obliged to haul all they consume two, three, or four hundred miles in wagons, for which they pay about seven shillings sterling. Add to this the first cost, which is about one shilling, though sometimes more, and you will find the burden sustained by those who live remote from the sea-shore sufficiently unequal. I hope, therefore, the committee will not agree to it.

Mr. LAWRENCE hoped a duty would be laid on the article; it was in general use, and the consumption so regular, that it was much to be depended upon as a source of revenue; but the duty ought not to be so high as to make it oppressive. The additional burden to those who live remote from the coast will not be unreasonable; they will pay no greater impost than every other class of consumers, and the tax mixing with the price will be less sensibly felt. The remote settler does not pay on other articles equal to the inhabitant who resides near the Atlantic. He does not consume the linen and cloth of Europe, the tea of the East, the sugar and spirits of the West Indies, in any thing like such proportion. Can he be said then to be oppressed with a small and equal tax upon salt, an article which is consumed equally in the interior and exterior country? He certainly cannot. But there is one observation which may be urged as an objection; being aware of this, he would propose, at a proper time, the allowance of a drawback upon all salted fish and provision exported. He moved to impose a duty of six cents per bushel.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. TUCKER felt an aversion to laying a duty on salt, from several motives. It would bear harder upon the poor than upon the rich. The true principle of taxation is, that every man contribute to the public burdens in proportion to the value of his property. But a poor man consumes as much salt as a rich man. In this point of view, it operates as a poll-tax, the most odious of all taxes; it does not operate simply as a poll-tax, but is heavier on the poor than on the rich, because the poor consume greater quantities of salted provision than the rich. Nor does it bear equally upon every part of the country; for it is consumed in a greater proportion by cattle at a distance than by those near the sea-shores. Moreover, the duty collected on the importation will enter into the price of the article, and the countryman will pay the retailer a profit on the tax, perhaps of four times its amount. For which reasons, he was more averse to this article being taxed than any other whatsoever.

Mr. SCOTT declared himself decisively against the duty, although he admitted a most certain revenue could be drawn from it, on account of its universal demand and utility. But he did not think these considerations alone amounted to a sufficient reason why this necessary article should be taxed; if they did, the arguments would prove too much, it would extend to the use of water and common air. He presumed the old arguments often urged by gentlemen in favor of manufactures did not apply, because no encouragement would be sufficient to establish it.

From the nearest part of the Atlantic coast, where salt can be obtained, to the next nearest in the Western territory, is a distance of eight hundred or one thousand miles: all the intermediate space must be supplied from one for the other; over the mountains it must be carried on pack-horses. This of itself is a sufficient tax upon the consumer; how oppressive then must it be to increase the burden.

It has been mentioned that this tax will be an odious one. I have no pretension to the gift of prophecy; but I am willing to let my name go to posterity in giving it as my opinion, that if you lay a high duty on such an indispensable necessary of life, it will be bad policy, and go high to shipwreck the Government. I have reasons of a political nature to support my opinion; but I do not think I should be justified in mentioning them at present; but I will venture to say this much, that I fear it will have a tendency to shake the foundation of your system, which I look upon as the only anchor of your political salvation. Will it not be wise, therefore, to let the administration of your power slide gently along inoffensive to so great a body? Let them become reconciled to your views before you stretch out the hand of oppression. Throw salt, if it must be taxed, into the mass of articles, and lay your per cent. a little higher to make up the deficiency. This will be less odious, and, on the score of revenue, amount to the same thing. I consider taxes, in this point of view: the exigencies of the Union call for a sum of money annually; it must be raised in some way by a tax on the community. It is no matter to the individual whether he pays his proportion by a tax on salt, or any other article he consumes, but the wisdom of Government will direct which. The money must be had from some source; and may be taken from any; yet prudence will dictate to obtain it by means the least odious, the least unpopular, and most pleasing. All taxes, I admit, are odious; but they are comparatively so. Let, therefore, this article be left out of the enumeration, and do not apply to it until other means have failed, because it would be a very partial and most odious tax.

Mr. MOORE observed upon the inequality, as it respected the consumption of the article by cattle; some States raised more than others, consequently they consumed more; some parts of the same State were in a like situation. The people on the sea-coast pursued merchandise; those in the back parts raised cattle, which he was bold to say consumed five times as much salt as the lower country, and would pay the tax in the same proportion. It has been said, that if they pay more on salt, they pay less on other articles—agreed. But there are a number more which may perhaps unequally affect them; yet it is an argument of small weight to say, because we in large commercial cities are regulated in a sumptuary manner for indulging in luxuries, you who are obliged to retrench them shall pay a tax upon the necessities of life. In short, the tax appeared to him not only unpopular, but unjust likewise, and he would not agree to it.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina).—If any further arguments were necessary to convince the committee of the impropriety of the present measure, more might be urged, though what has been said is sufficient to demonstrate that it will be attended with a great deal of dissatisfaction, and in proportion to that dissatisfaction will be the danger of having your laws contemned, opposed, or neglected in the execution. It is well known, that however small the duty, it will furnish a pretext to the seller to extort a much greater sum from the consumer. Another observation. It is believed that the inhabitants of the interior part of South Carolina are opposed to the new Government; it will be a melancholy circumstance to entangle ourselves, at this time, among the shoals of discontent; yet no stronger impulse could be given for opposition than the proposed tax: conceiving it in this light he was against the measure.

Mr. SCOTT added that the price of salt where he lived was four dollars a bushel; the country was settled three or four hundred miles beyond him, and he supposed the price there to be greater.

Mr. LAWRENCE thought it would be better for the committee to take time to examine what had been urged against the tax, and as it was the usual time for adjourning, the committee might rise and defer their decision till to-morrow.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 17.

BENJAMIN CONTESS, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAGE in the Chair; the question of laying a duty on salt recurred.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I had the honor yesterday of delivering my sentiments in favor of this duty; but observations were made by gentlemen from different parts of the House against the measure.

The principal objection was, that the tax was an odious one. It was admitted by a worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) that all taxes are odious; this is certainly true, for the people are not pleased with paying them; nothing but necessity will induce a Government to have recourse to them. It is also true, that some are more odious than others. From what has been said, it may be seen that a tax on salt is not so in general, but only in particular parts of the Union; the remote inhabitants, it is said, will be dissatisfied, because it increases the price of the commodity, and they use more of it than others. It is mentioned as partaking of the nature of a capitation tax, but this kind of tax is odious, more from its manner of operation than its nature. We find in some States where it is in use, the people live easy under it; for example, it is not complained of in some of the Eastern States. We have not much to apprehend from a tax on salt in this State; the people are satisfied with it; at least the complaints are neither so loud nor so general, as to make us apprehensive for the existence of the Government we live under. Its operations, though the contrary was predicted, go on with as much ease since an impost has been laid, as they did before. I believe, likewise, we have only to try the experiment, to be convinced it would have a similar effect throughout the Continent; for I cannot persuade myself that it is generally looked upon in so odious a light as some gentlemen imagine. It was also said, that the tax would be unequal, and the objects of inequality were two. The poor man would pay as much as the rich; but this is not the case; the rich are generally more profuse in their consumption than the poor; they have more servants and dependents also to consume it; consequently the whole amount of their consumption must be in a proportionable ratio. The other inequality was its different operation in different States, and even in different parts of the same State. On examination, this objection also may be obviated. Gentlemen tell you the high price of this article at three or four hundred miles distance; is it not hence presumable that there they consume as little as possible, while along the sea-coasts they use it with a liberal hand? But whether it be consumed on the sea-coast, or on the western waters, the tax is the same, or but inconsiderably augmented; for I take it the great addition which is made is in consequence of the charge of carriage. I cannot, therefore, see by what magic gentlemen will prove to you that it is increased four or fivefold. We must also take into contemplation the number of persons who consume it; here it will appear, that the weight of population is much greater on the sea-coast than in the western parts of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Carolina, consequently the consumption must be greater. It is said the argument I urged was not a good one; because it proved too much, that an article of general consumption was not the best article for taxation; now, I believe the maxim is just, and when examined will be found so. Taxes, to be just, should affect all, and equally affect them, and not be left to fall partially upon a few. This is more the case with salt than any other article which has yet been taxed, and I believe is the only tax which will get at the pockets of those to whom it is said to be obnoxious. But how comes it, if the other articles are equally consumed in the back countries, that gentlemen did not urge the argument of expense on transportation, and the pretext that a tax would furnish the service to extort from the consumer?

I believe gentlemen will find it difficult to point out any kind of support which they give to Government, if this duty shall be refused; yet it was hinted that the Government would be endangered if they were called upon for this. We are now entering on a subject of a delicate nature, and I wish to treat it as such; but I will not suppose the Government hazarded by making a revenue law that is right and justifiable on general principles; if it is, upright men may be willing to risk the consequences. The inhabitants of every part may find in this law some articles more burdensome on them than that particular article is on every other part; but yet the aggregate paid by them toward the exigencies of Government is equalled by a disproportion in some other article.

If I did not think the object before the committee of great importance, I would not consume their time in contending for it; but, relying on it as an equitable and very productive fund, I must trespass a few words further. This article is of general consumption; perhaps it may be averaged at three bushels to a family annually; the tax on this will be light, none can be oppressed, and yet it will bring into the treasury a very large sum. If any family consumes more and expends it upon their cattle, it ought to be considered that it enters into the price of the cattle when brought to market, and ultimately falls upon the consumer. Mr. MOORE had said yesterday, that the duty would operate unequally; he thought so then, and had not yet altered his opinion, because the back inhabitants consumed five times as much as those on the sea-coast; he had expressed no apprehension that the duty would endanger the Government.

Mr. MADISON.—From the nature of the arguments made use of on this occasion, it is necessary to proceed with some circumspection, though not to depart from that policy which can be justified by reason and experience. I am willing to trust a great deal to the good sense, justice, and penetration of our fellow-citizens for support; and though I think it might be just to lay a considerable duty generally upon imported articles, yet it would not be prudent or politic, at this time, to do so. Let us now proceed to consider the subject before us, on the principles of justice and principles of policy. In the first point of view we may consider the effect it will have on the different descriptions of people throughout the United States; I mean different descriptions, as they relate to property. I readily agree that, in itself, a tax would be unjust and oppressive that did not fall on the citizens according to their degree of property and ability to pay it; were it, therefore, this single article which we were about to tax, I should think it indispensable that it should operate equally, agreeably to the principle I have just mentioned. But in order to determine whether a tax on salt is just or unjust, we must consider it as part of a system, and judge of the operation of this system as if it were but a single article; if this is found to be unequal, it is also unjust. Now, examine the preceding articles, and consider how they affect the rich, and it will be found that they bear more than a just proportion according to their ability to pay; by adding this article, we shall rather equalize the disproportion than increase it, if it be true, as has been often mentioned, that the poor will contribute more of this tax than the rich. When we consider the tax as it operates on the different parts of the United States, dividing the whole into the northern, middle, and southern districts, it will be found that they contribute also in proportion to their numbers and ability to pay. If there be any distinction in this respect, it will be perceived to be in favor of the southern division, because the species of property there consists of mouths that consume salt in the same proportion as the whites, but they have not this property in the middle and northern districts to pay taxes for. The most important objection is, that the western part of our country uses more salt than any other; this makes it unequal; but, considered as part of a system, the equilibrium is restored, when you find this almost the only tax they will have to pay. Will they contribute any thing by consuming imported spirits? Very little. Yet this is a principal source of revenue; they will submit upon what they procure at home; and will they submit to a direct tax, if they murmur at so light a one on salt? Will they submit to an excise? If they would, I trust it is not in the contemplation of gentlemen to propose it. Certainly it requires but time for reflection to discover, in every point of view, the justness of the measure now proposed. If then, there be no particular objection on the footing of justice, it must be an argument in favor of the policy; for it cannot be presumed that good policy deviates from the principles of justice. There may exist prejudices against measures founded in the strictest justice and soundest policy; but certainly they will flee before reason and conviction. While in search of revenue, for such essential and important purposes as urge us at present, we cannot discriminate, and spare one part of the community. This would be unjust, and excite those complaints which some gentlemen seem to fear.

It has been said, by the enemies of this Government, that its administration would immediately betray the features of tyranny and oppression. It was likewise said, that its operations would be gentle and insinuating at first, in order to obtain the confidence of the people to enable it to supplant the State Governments. Would not a discriminating policy seem to make good these charges? Let us then avoid it with caution, and endeavor to distribute the public burden with a just and equal hand. In short, under whatever point of view you consider this tax, I think it will be seen to be improper to expunge it. I would make it moderate, and, in so doing, it cannot be unjust, nor can the popular clamor be excited.

Mr. HUNTINGTON had no apprehension of danger arising from the odiousness of the tax in the State he came from; his constituents would inquire the reasons why it was imposed, and when they found it was from principles of justice, and to promote the public good, they would pay it without reluctance. From the nature of the article, he looked upon it as the means of a certain and sure revenue, and if it was not now used as such, it would be done on some future occasion with considerable advantage. In France, a duty was paid equal to two shillings and six-pence per bushel, which is more than the value of the article; in England the duty was considerable, but cannot say how much. A duty of six cents per bushel here would yield a great revenue, and no man would feel the oppression. If it is alleged that it will affect the husbandman or grazier with large herds of cattle, are they not rich—at least rich enough to pay six cents on a bushel of salt? Certainly such a tax is too trifling to be much complained of, even if it was unequal; but I think it has been clearly demonstrated to be otherwise.

Mr. WHITE, after some doubts, had made up his mind against the article being taxed. We ought to pass no law that is unjust or oppressive in its nature, or which the people may consider as unjust or oppressive; a duty on salt would be considered in that light by a great number. Our constituents expect some ease and relief, particularly the poorer sort of people. It seems to be granted, from all that has been said, that it will affect them in a manner which no other tax can, though, it is said, they will not be affected beyond their proportion, as they pay nothing for the consumption of wine, spirits, &c., because they use none. One reason which influenced the committee to tax those articles, was to abolish the use of them altogether, or prevent the excesses they occasioned. Now will you urge in argument for taxing the poor, that they already practise that temperance which you desire to bring universally about? All taxes, it is admitted, are odious, and some merely from opinion; but if they are odious from opinion, they ought to be carefully guarded against, especially if the Government depends upon opinion for support. The present Constitution was adopted by a small majority in some States, and in the opinion of many is not so favorable to the rights of the citizens as could be desired; wisdom and prudence will, therefore, teach us not to exercise powers under it which opinion may judge oppressive. Considering the political state of Kentucky and the Western country, we ought to be careful how we give them umbrage; means at this moment are using to detach them from the Union, and place them in a different situation. This may be promoted in some degree by the slightest tax; for there are those who would gladly seize any advantage arising from a discontent among our citizens. It cannot be thought that this duty would be so productive as to warrant the risk we run in opposing the public opinion.

Mr. SCOTT.—I grant that the policy of this measure is mere matter of opinion; as its advocates have stated; it cannot be otherwise, because we have had no experience of it, and every gentleman will form that opinion from facts that have fallen under his knowledge. Now, from the facts known to me, I doubt its policy exceedingly. I would, therefore, be clear for passing it over for the present. Perhaps my local situation gives me an opportunity to know these facts better than most members on this floor, and this knowledge has prevailed with me to be of opinion, that the present measure would have very destructive consequences. I mean to give this opinion to the committee; they will make such use of it as they please; but before I proceed further, I will just remark, that I do not think the reasons on the point of justice well founded. I think they have taken for granted facts that do not exist. It was supposed that the inhabitants of the back country did not use their proportion of the other articles which were taxed. Are we to believe that a bottle of Madeira, or of rum, never crossed the Alleghany mountains, or went more than fifty or one hundred miles from the seacoast? Sir, on the banks of the Ohio, I must say, though I am sorry to say it, there exists as great a rage for every species of luxury which the people can lay their hands on, as there does even in the city of New York; and how should it be otherwise? Have they not the example from yourselves? If a countryman comes among you for a time, is he not initiated and accustomed to your manners? Will he not too often carry home your fashions and your vices? Certainly he will. Then why should gentlemen suppose that these people do not contribute their proportion on other articles? I can sit at a door in a country village, five hun-ded miles from this place, and see nine out of ten of its inhabitants dress in European clothes. I can there procure wines, both in quality and quantity, equal to those on the seacoast. If the people do not consume as much there, it arises merely from their inability to buy and pay for it; but they consume in proportion to their property and wealth. Now, if the position, that people ought to pay taxes in proportion to their property be true, and I believe it is, and the inhabitants of the Western country contribute equally their part on all which has been laid, it remains only to inquire how the duty proposed will operate. I need not repeat the arguments already used to show its inequality. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) has conceded the point. He has said, that if we were laying this particular tax, it would be an improper one because of its inequality. Now, then, I think it does come before us upon its own bottom; and as it is an unequal one, so is it an improper one. What is unjust is impolitic. On the principles of justice and policy, then, the measure ought to be rejected. I hope the opposition, which is apprehended, may not take place against your Government, as the wisdom and patriotism of this body will never, I am satisfied, furnish their enemies with weapons of destruction.

Mr. FITZSIMONS felt hurt by some of the arguments he had heard; whilst the Congress of the United States continue to act upon principles of justice, they have little to apprehend from their enemies. He hoped never to see any other principle govern them; it was paying their constituents a bad compliment to say, that they would oppose measures founded on such a basis; for his part, he did not think so little of their good sense and discernment. If gentlemen had proved that the proposed measure was founded in injustice, they would have some pretext for exciting alarms, but he did not think they had done this; he thought the contrary position was better established. At first view, it must be discernable that this article is of such a nature as to insure the collection of the duty; it is too bulky for smuggling; the average quantity which a family would consume could not exceed five bushels annually; this, at six cents per bushel, is less than one-third of a dollar; and are gentlemen serious when they talk of this sum being so oppressive as to endanger the Government? He knew very well that this ground had been trodden by almost every State Legislature on the Continent, and address enough had been used to make some think it an unpopular measure, but he could never see a reason for this opinion. It had been urged that we had better defer the subject under discussion for the present, and take it up hereafter. One reason why he was in favor of high and general duties, in the first instance, was to avoid the imputation which had been laid against the administration of this Government by its opponents; he would not attempt to deceive the people as to its powers; if a tax on salt will be right some time hence, it is right now.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, they collected

eight cents in his State, and it caused no complaint that he knew of.

The question on imposing six cents on salt was put and carried, as was a motion for a drawback on salted provisions and fish.

On manufacture tobacco, Mr. SHERMAN moved six cents, as he thought the duty ought to amount to a prohibition. This was agreed to.

On snuff, ten cents per pound. Mr. CARROLL moved to insert window and other glass. A manufacture of this article was begun in Maryland, and attended with considerable success; if the Legislature were to grant a small encouragement, it would be permanently established; the materials were to be found in the country in sufficient quantities to answer the most extensive demand.

A desultory conversation arose in the committee respecting the propriety of receiving the motion at this time, when it was agreed to add on all window and other glass, except black quart bottles, ten per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CLYMER informed the House of the state of the paper mills in Pennsylvania; they were so numerous as to be able to supply a very extensive demand in that and the neighboring States; they annually produce about 70,000 reams of various kinds, which is sold as cheap as it can be imported. This manufacture certainly is an important one; and having grown up under legislative encouragement, it will be wise to continue it. Thereupon it was agreed to lay an impost of seven and a half per cent. ad valorem on blank books, writing, printing, and wrapping paper, and paste-board; the same, without debate, was laid upon canes, walking-sticks, whips, clothing ready made, on gold, silver, and plated ware, and on jewellery and paste work; upon cabinet ware, buttons of metal, saddles, gloves of leather, all hats of beaver, fur, wool, or mixture of either, all millinery, castings of iron, or slit or rolled iron, all leather tanned or tawed, or manufactures thereof, except such as are otherwise rated.

On every coach, chariot, or other four wheel carriage, and on every chaise, solo, or other two wheel carriage, or parts thereof, fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

CHAPLAINS; &c.

The committee rose; and the SPEAKER having taken the Chair, a letter was received from the Senate, communicating a report of a joint committee, agreed to by the Senate, respecting the appointment of Chaplains, and the mode of conducting conference; also, an appointment of a committee to confer with a committee of the House on an eligible mode of conveying bills, papers, and messages. The House concurred in the report of the joint committee, and appointed a committee to confer on the subject proposed.

SATURDAY, April 18.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee of Elections, reported that the committee had examined the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and found them entitled to take their seats; which report was concurred with.

A petition of the mechanics and manufacturers of the city of New York, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that, in the present deplorable state of trade and manufactures, they look with confidence to the operations of the new Government for a restoration of both, and that relief which they have so long and anxiously desired; that they have both subjoined a list of such articles as can be manufactured in the State of New York, and humbly pray the countenance and attention of the National Legislature thereto.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLYMER reported, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to report a proper mode of investigating and deciding on the petition of David Ramsay, of South Carolina, suggesting that William Smith, returned a member of this House, as elected within that State, was, at the time of his being elected, ineligible; that the committee had agreed to the Clerk's table, upon which he delivered at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

On motion of Mr. GOODRICH, anchors at seven and a half per cent. ad valorem, was added.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, nutmegs, cinnamon, raisins, figs, currants, and almonds, were struck out.

Mr. AMES introduced wool cards, with observing that they were manufactured to the eastward as good and as cheap as the imported ones.

Mr. CLYMER mentioned, that in the State of Pennsylvania, the manufacture was carried to great perfection, and enough could be furnished to supply the demand. A duty of fifty cents per dozen was imposed on wool cards.

On wrought tin ware, seven and a half per centum ad valorem; on every quintal of fish, seventy-five cents.

Mr. FITZSIMONS moved the following: "On all teas imported from China or India, in ships built in the United States, and belonging wholly to a citizen of citizens thereof, as follows: on bohea tea, per pound, six cents; on all souchong teas, twenty cents; on all other teas, ten cents.

On all teas imported from any other country, or from China or India, in ships which are not the property of the United States, as follows: on bohea tea, per pound, ten cents; souchong, and other black teas, fifteen cents; on superior green teas, thirty cents; on all other green teas, eighteen cents per pound.

Mr. FITZSIMONS supported the motion, by observing that one effect of the late glorious Revolution was, to deprive the merchants of America of most of the channels of commerce which they had before pursued. This circumstance obliged them to search for other sources to employ their vessels in. It had been discovered that a pretty lucrative trade could be carried on with the countries in the East; the merchants have gone largely into it, and it at present gives employment to some thousand tons of American shipping, and seamen; our success has been so great, as to excite the jealousy of Europe, and nothing is left undone to cramp or prevent our commercial operations in that quarter. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, impressed with the importance of the subject, had granted it aid by discriminating in the manner he proposed to the committee; and with the like aid from the Government of the United States, the merchants may no longer fear the machinations of the opulent companies in Europe, who are unwilling to let us partake of a trade they so long have had a monopoly of. Already the trade to India has had a very happy effect in favor of our inhabitants, by reducing commodities brought from thence to one-half of their former price, and yet a sufficient profit is left to enable those concerned to carry it on with advantage.

Mr. MADISON felt a reluctance in being obliged to state his reasons why he doubted the policy of the proposed measure. What, said he, is its object? It is not to add to the revenue, for it will in fact tend to diminish it, in that proportion which the importation from China lessens that from other parts; it is not to increase our commerce, for long voyages are unfriendly to it; it is not to increase the importation of necessary articles, for India goods are mostly articles of luxury; it is not to carry off our superfluities, for these articles are paid for principally, if not altogether, in solid coin. If the trade is beneficial at all to the United States, it must be in this single point of view, that the articles can be imported cheaper through that channel than any other; and, if so, that it is the interest of the people to be supplied as cheap as possible. There are no collateral good purposes to claim our attention in this case. It is not in the nature of things that we should derive any other advantage than the one I have mentioned, without it is that of raising our India commerce from its weak and infant state to strength and vigor; to enable it to continue supplies at a cheaper rate than they could otherwise be obtained.

Mr. GOODHUE replied to Mr. MADISON's observations, respecting the mode of paying for India goods, by informing the committee that very considerable quantities of ginseng, naval stores, lumber, and provisions, were shipped; other articles were sent also, and disposed of at ports on this side of China, in order to procure the most suitable cargo; so that we do not pay principally for their commodities in solid coin, but send off superfluities to a considerable amount, much more than if we were to procure our teas and nankeens from any part of Europe.

Mr. MADISON had not made the objection merely because the specie was exported, but to show that it did not bring in an equivalent, as the goods were mostly of that kind which are termed luxuries.

Mr. BOURNOR declared himself a friend to the Indian commerce. He thought it encouraged the employment of shipping, and increased our seamen; he knew its advantages to agriculture. The gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) supposed that little of our productions were sent in exchange for India goods; but our beef, pork, flour, and wheat, were shipped for this purpose, not to China, yet to ports where proper cargoes were taken in to answer the trade. Encouragement and protection were necessary to prevent the large companies in Europe from underselling our merchants, which they would readily do, at considerable loss, if they could, in consequence, put a stop to our trade. He hoped, therefore, the committee would not hesitate in adopting the motion. The motion was adopted accordingly.

On coal per bushel — cents.
Mr. BLANN informed the committee, that there were mines opened in Virginia capable of supplying the whole of the United States, and, if some restraint was laid on the importation of foreign coal, those mines might be worked to advantage. He thought it needless to insist upon the advantages resulting from a colliery, as a supply for culinary and mechanical purposes, and as a nursery to train up seamen for a navy. He moved three cents a bushel.

Mr. HARTLEY was willing to admit a moderate duty, but thought three cents would be a great discouragement to those manufactures which necessarily consume large quantities of fuel. He moved one cent.

Mr. PARKER said, that a less sum than three cents would not answer the purpose intended. Coal came from England as ballast, and was sold so low, as almost to prevent the working of their mines in Virginia. He hoped, if the committee were disposed to encourage them, they would portion the means to the end; a duty of one cent would be void; nothing under what was moved by his colleague (Mr. BLAND) could answer the purpose. He hoped, therefore, the committee would agree to three cents.

On the question, there appeared a majority in favor of three cents. After which the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 20.

ABRAHAM BALDWIN, and JAMES JACKSON, from Georgia, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. TUCKER, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of John Churchman and David Ramsay, reported that the committee had, according to order, had the said petitions under their consideration, and agreed to a report thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and debated by clauses.

The first clause, in the words following, to wit: "That the committee have conferred with Mr.

Churchman, and find that he has made many calculations which tend to establish his position, that there are two magnetic points which give direction to the needle; that upon this doctrine he has endeavored to ascertain from a given latitude, and a given variation, what must be the longitude of the place; and having applied his principles to many instances in Cook's voyages, has found the result to correspond with considerable accuracy with the real facts, as far as they could be determined by the reckoning of the ship: That the object to which Mr. Churchman's labors are directed is confessedly of very high importance, and his ideas on the subject appear to be ingenious: That, with a view of applying them to practice, he has contrived a map and a globe, whereby to show the angles which are made by the intersection of the real and the magnetic meridians in different parts of the earth: That he is also engaged in constructing tables for determining the longitude at sea upon magnetic principles: That the committee are of opinion, that such efforts deserve encouragement, and that a law should pass to secure to Mr. Churchman, for a term of years, the exclusive pecuniary emoluments to be derived from the publication of these several inventions; was again read, and, on the question put thereon, agreed to by the House.

The second clause, in the words following, to wit:

"With respect to the voyage proposed by Mr. Churchman to Baffin's Bay, the committee are cautious of recommending, in the present deranged state of our finances, a precipitate adoption of a measure which would be attended with considerable expense; but they are of opinion, that at a future day, if Mr. Churchman's principles should be found to succeed in practice, it would be proper to give further encouragement to his ingenuity; was again read, and, on a motion made, was ordered to lie on the table.

The third clause, in the words following, to wit: "On the subject of the petition of Doctor David Ramsay, your committee report it as their opinion, that a law should pass to secure to him the exclusive right of publishing and vending, for a term of years, the two works mentioned in the petition;" was read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

On these clauses, the following debate took place:

Mr. MADISON.—I wish that the committee had stated the expenses attending a voyage to Baffin's Bay, for the purpose of discovering the cause of the magnetic variation, as proposed by Mr. Churchman, that the House might be better able to judge of its propriety. Well aware as I am that public bodies are liable to be assailed by visionary projectors, I nevertheless wish to ascertain the probability of the magnetic theory. If there is any considerable probability that the projected voyage would be successful, or throw any valuable light on the discovery of longitude, it certainly comports with the honor and dignity of Government to give it their countenance and support. Gentlemen will recollect, that some of the most important discoveries, both in arts and sciences, have come forward under very unpromising and suspicious appearances.

I am also well aware that the deranged situation of our treasury would not warrant us in spending considerable sums in visionary pursuits; but if an inconsiderable sum will answer on this occasion, and there is a probability of improving the science of navigation, I see no reason against it. Gentlemen who have been on the committee understand the subject best, and they will please give the House their sentiments.

Mr. WATTS said that the proposed voyage had nothing to do with the principle of magnetic variation; it was intended to ascertain the cause, if the principle was true, it could be applied to practice without knowing the cause which produced it; therefore, the committee had reported in the manner before them.

Mr. BRACE understood from Mr. Churchman that it would take a small vessel about four months, in the summer time, to be in the high northern latitudes, attending him in his researches into the cause of the magnetic variation. He thought Mr. Churchman's theory ingenious and deserving patronage; but the voyage to Baffin's Bay was rather premature.

Mr. PAGE wished the committee to state the expense, because he thought the Legislature ought to assist Mr. Churchman in the voyage, if it would not cost too great a sum. It is true that the theory can be carried into practice whether the cause is discovered or not; but as the theory depends upon the cause, a knowledge of this would demonstrate the truth of the other. Mr. Churchman's system consists in applying the magnetic variation to the discovery of longitude. He lays down two magnetic points, to which the needle is attracted, and a magnetic equator, defining the nature of the curves formed by the magnetic meridians, the periods of revolution of the magnetic points, their courses, latitudes and longitudes, their diurnal, monthly, and annual situation, for any time past, present, or to come, with rules to apply these principles and materials to use. Mr. Churchman establishes the truth of this theory from calculations, compared with the actual observations made by Captain Cook and others. Having examined some of the calculations he was astonished at the surprising agreement he found—they generally agreed within a few miles, and only one case where they differed more than a degree. If the use of this discovery was as extensive as he imagined, and he had every reason to believe it would be so, it was certainly a discovery that would do honor to the American name. He thought some advantage might be derived from the projected voyage; and if the expense did not exceed five or eight hundred dollars, it might be prosecuted. If Government did not lend their aid, he expected individuals would patronize it, and furnish the means by subscription. He expressed a willingness on his part to join in such a measure, if the application to the Legislature was unsuccessful.

Mr. HUNTINGTON delineated the system also, and approved of it; but thought the voyage would be unsuccessful, if for nothing else, for the want of proper instruments. The use of Mr. Churchman's theory depended, in a great measure, upon obtaining the magnetic variation with accuracy; but if an inconsiderable sum will answer on this occasion, and there is a probability of improving the science of navigation, I see no reason against it. Gentlemen who have been on the committee understand the subject best, and they will please give the House their sentiments.

Duties on Imports.

for which purpose Mr. Churchman contemplated some improvement on the compass; if he was successful in this, the discovery would no doubt answer the object in view.

Mr. SHAWMAN did not think the voyage would be of any help to the gentleman, and therefore should agree to the report.

Mr. TUCKER expressed a doubt whether the Legislature has power, by the Constitution, to go further in rewarding the inventors of useful machines, or discoveries in sciences, than merely to secure to them for a time the right of making, publishing, and vending them: in the case of a doubt, he thought it best to err on the safe side.

The House now decided upon the propositions of the committee, as before stated, and ordered bills to be brought in, securing the right of publishing, &c., of their respective works, to John Churchman and David Ramsay.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

The following clause of the bill was agreed to, viz: "On all other articles, five per cent. on their value at the time and place of importation, except tin in pigs, tin plates, lead, old pewter, brass, iron or brass wire, copper in plates, wool, dyeing woods and dyeing drugs, (other than indigo,) raw hides, beaver, and all other furs, and deer skins."

Mr. FITZSIMONS proposed a drawback of six cents per gallon on all rum distilled in the United States, exported without the limits of the same. Mr. MADISON asked if the quantity of rum so exported was very considerable? He believed it was not; and he would not, for the sake of encouraging that branch of trade, open a door by which frauds on the revenue could be committed equal to the whole duty collected.

Mr. FITZSIMONS could not say what quantity of rum was exported in that way; but he feared, unless a drawback was allowed, it would be a great injury to the manufacture. At the time, the duty of six cents on molasses was laid, he thought it was understood, the committee would allow a drawback on the rum exported. There seems to be an apprehension that the system of drawbacks will operate to the disadvantage of the revenue; but he believed a mode could be devised to prevent frauds in this case, fully as effectually as on the importation. If this was not done, it would be time enough for gentlemen to oppose it; they would have this opportunity, because a bill, regulating the manner of collection, he presumed, would pass at the same time with the one for levying the duties. If drawbacks were not allowed, it would be a very considerable restraint on commerce, particularly on the India trade, which he believed was likely to be considerably extended. He was sorry the gentlemen from Massachusetts were not there in their places,* to give information to the committee respecting the quantity exported from that State; from Pennsylvania the quantity was but small. Mr. LAWRENCE could give no exact information relative to the quantity of New York rum exported, but, from what he understood, supposed it to be about one thousand hogsheads annually; it was entitled to a drawback, and there was no reason to believe this had been the occasion of frauds on the revenue: he should agree to the measure.

Mr. MADISON was sorry the gentlemen from Massachusetts were absent, because they could give authentic information with respect to the quantity. He had in his hands a statement of the exports from Massachusetts, which he believed to be pretty accurate, from January 1st to December 31st, 1787. From this it appeared, that there were exported during that period to Nova Scotia, eighty-nine hogsheads; to Europe, one hundred and thirty-four hogsheads, and eight hundred and ninety-seven to Africa and the East Indies. Now he submitted to the committee how far it was proper to adopt a measure for such a trifling consideration, which would become a most dangerous cover to the clandestine trade that must necessarily follow. Rum will, no doubt, be exported in the day and brought back in the night, for the sake of drawing back the duty, as has been done already in similar cases.

Mr. FITZSIMONS contended for drawbacks generally, but on this article it was particular injustice to omit it. The manufacture of rum was of considerable importance in the Eastern States, but it would not be able to stand a successful competition with West India rum in foreign countries, while loaded with a duty of six cents per gallon. The tax on molasses was that sum and he looked upon it to be the same thing as if it had been paid on the rum at distillation: one gallon of the former yielding but one of the latter.

Mr. MADISON thought there were very few cases in which drawbacks ought to be allowed, perhaps none but what related to the East India trade. The small proportion of distilled rum exported did not justify so great a risk; but of the small proportion which went abroad, the greatest part went to the coast of Africa. He feared this trade was inconsistent with the good of mankind, and ought to be reprobated instead of encouraged. If gentlemen were to consider the great advantages derived to the distillers from the present Government, they would perhaps think them sufficient for their encouragement without allowing drawbacks. The annual exportation from Massachusetts to the several ports of the United States is five thousand three hundred and twenty-seven hogsheads. This quantity was formerly subjected to an equal duty with the West India rum. If, under these circumstances, country rum could command this great sale, what will it do now when the communication is free, and many parts of the United States laid open to this trade, that were shut before? This consideration alone ought to do away all complaints for want of a drawback.

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

Mr. BLAND said the committee had spent several days in encouraging manufactures, by selecting articles for revenue, and were now extending their views to the encouragement of commerce. He thought there was some impropriety in combining the clause proposed in this part of the bill, and even doubted if it was in order; therefore would vote against it.

The question was put on the motion for a drawback on country rum, and lost.

Mr. FITZSIMONS had another clause upon the same subject, only on more general principles; he hoped gentlemen would consider well before they doomed it to share the fate of the former. It was to this purpose: that all the duties paid, or secured to be paid, upon goods imported, shall be returned or discharged upon such of the said goods, as shall within — months be exported to any country without the limits of the United States, except so much as shall be necessary to defray the expense that may have accrued by the entry and safe keeping thereof. The subjects of duties and drawbacks are so connected by their nature, that he did not see how they were to be separated. Gentlemen did not imagine that what had been done tended to favor commerce; it certainly did not. Every impost which is paid is a disadvantage to the person concerned in trade, and nothing but necessity could induce a submission to it. The interest of the landholder is undoubtedly blended with the commercial interest; if the latter receive an injury, the former will have to sustain his proportion of it: if drawbacks are not allowed, the operations of trade will be considerably shackled; merchants will be obliged, in the first instance, to send their cargoes to the place of consumption, and lose the advantage of a circuitous freight, which alone is a profit of no small magnitude.

Mr. HARTLEY expressed his sorrow for the last decision of the committee; he wished the question had not been put in the absence of the gentlemen from Massachusetts, who were on a business in some degree of a public nature. The present motion was only just brought in; he submitted, therefore, to the committee, if it were not best to pass it over for the present, in order to give time for consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE was for expediting business, but thought, nevertheless, that deciding questions at this time, when several members were absent, did not tend to that point, because the question would be agitated again in the House.

Mr. BOWDITCH endeavored to evince the propriety of drawbacks, by facts within his knowledge. A large quantity of Madeira wine was imported for the express purpose of exporting it again; now, not to allow a drawback of the duty in this and similar cases, would encumber trade exceedingly.

On motion of Mr. CLYMER, the committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the Chair.

MANNER OF TAKING OATHS.

The bill regulating the manner of taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution, was committed ted to the Committee of the Whole; after proceeding some time in considering it, the committee rose and reported progress: And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 21.

Mr. HARTLEY asked and obtained leave of absence.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union, Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

The motion respecting drawbacks, proposed yesterday by Mr. FITZSIMONS, was adopted without debate.

A motion being under consideration for laying a duty of six cents per ton on all vessels built in the United States, and owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, and all vessels foreign built, but now owned by such citizens:

Mr. MADISON observed, that some small provision of this kind was necessary for the support of light-houses, hospitals for disabled seamen, and other establishments incident to commerce. The motion was agreed to.

The next motion proposed was—"on all vessels belonging wholly to subjects of Powers in alliance with the United States, or partly to the subjects of those Powers, and partly to the citizens of the United States, — cents per ton."

Mr. GOODHUE laid it down as a maxim, that the tonnage duty ought to bear a certain ratio to the freight; for which reason he had made some calculations to determine what proportion any given sum would bear to the average of the freights both to Europe and the West Indies. A vessel of two hundred tons carried three or four hundred barrels, the freight of which to the West Indies might be estimated at five shillings, to Europe at one dollar. Now calculate this at the average, and five per cent. on the freight would be about seventy-two cents; whether the duty should be rated at four, five, or six per cent. on the freight, he submitted to the committee; but as this motion was confined to those nations in alliance with us, he would move but sixty cents.

Mr. BOWDITCH, on the principle last mentioned, proposed thirty cents.

Mr. GOODHUE.—There would be no occasion to lay additional duties on ships owned by foreigners, if our own vessels were not subjected to charges in foreign ports over and above what the natives pay. It is the operation of this unequal burden that renders it necessary for us to discriminate. It becomes us, therefore, to ascertain what these extraordinary impositions are, in order to regulate our conduct. I am very well satisfied, in my own mind, that thirty cents will be very inadequate to the object. Those who are acquainted with the disadvantages under which our commerce labors, will readily see that sixty cents are not fully equal to the extra duties imposed on American vessels in foreign ports, and consequently, not sufficient to establish that preference which we ought to give our own navigation.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The subject before us requires the most particular consideration, for several important reasons. I shall, therefore, without apology, proceed to state some observations. In a former debate it was remarked, that the duty on tonnage must eventually fall upon the productions of our country. If this is a just observation, we ought to consider whether the prices that those productions bear at foreign markets are such as to bear this extra imposition. If we have not shipping enough of our own, (and that point, I imagine, will be conceded me,) we shall be under the necessity of employing foreign vessels in the transportation of such articles as we have to dispose of; the owners, knowing our necessity, will take advantage of the duty to raise their freight; and thus the duty will inevitably fall upon ourselves.

It is well known to this committee, that in the different ports of the United States we have a variety of articles peculiarly calculated for exportation, and which we are obliged to export, such as rice, lumber, tobacco, potash, flaxseed, and a great many others; besides, it is also well known, that we have not that quantity of American shipping, which is required in the transportation of these articles; it is necessary, therefore, that we either employ foreigners, or suffer our commodities to perish on our hands. If this be true, you will have, as I said before, to consider whether the articles we thus export are capable of bearing this additional burden upon the prices they bring in foreign markets: I think they are not. Gentlemen from the Southern States mentioned the other day, that the planters had begun to turn their attention to other productions than those they were accustomed to the cultivation of, because their staple commodities could no longer be exported to advantage. If difficulties of this kind exist now, without the operation of a tonnage act, what will they be when so considerable a burden is laid upon them? But what advantage will accrue from the regulation, when the duty we impose upon foreigners must revert back, in its operation, upon us? Besides, as the duty must be paid out of the price of the articles exported, it will, in effect, be the same as a tax upon such articles, which is expressly forbidden by the Constitution. If foreigners enhance their freight in proportion to the duty, and our commodities are unable to bear the additional expense, gentlemen will have reason to depreciate the consequences; it must unavoidably check domestic industry, the sole foundation of national welfare and importance. For what stimulus will the farmer have to raise more produce than is necessary for his own support? Will he toil in cultivating the fruits of his labor, when his granaries? Once destroy this spring of industry, and your country totters to ruin. Will the proposed high duty have such effect? I fear it may; and therefore shall be for a much lower sum. Thirty cents will be a sufficient duty.

Mr. HARTLEY, thinking sixty cents too high, proposed one-third of a dollar, or thirty-three and one-third cents.

Mr. GOODHUE was fully of opinion that the duty ought not to be laid so high as to prevent foreign shipping from coming amongst us, while they were useful or necessary to our navigation nor yet so high as to injure the sale of our own productions in foreign markets. But can it be said, that a duty of less than five per cent. on the tonnage of foreign vessels can be attended with such ill consequences? He apprehended it could not, and was very well satisfied that sixty cents was as little as could be mentioned, to give encouragement to our own vessels.

Mr. FITZSIMONS admitted the importance of the subject as stated by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE,) and thought it the duty of the committee to consider well its effects before they came to a decision. There could be no doubt entertained of the policy of meeting the commercial regulations of foreign Powers with commercial regulations of our own. In these regulations, the policy is for each to obtain for its own vessels an advantage over those belonging to foreign nations. We certainly ought not to be less attentive to our interest than others are to theirs; every advantage, therefore, which can be justly given to our own shipping is due them. Happy effects may no doubt be derived from the present policy; but, on this head, I am not altogether so sanguine as some gentlemen seem to be with the encouragement proposed. The merchant may be induced to vest more considerable sums in property of this kind than heretofore, and at some future period we may become at least the carriers of our own commerce. In this case, too, we have every reason to believe the freight will be less than it is at the present time in foreign vessels.

A calculation of what may be the proper duty, made from the freight of a ship, is but an indefinite way of coming at the object. He understood the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GOODHUE) to have calculated the freight of a voyage, at five per cent. on the value of the vessel; but surely the gentleman was mistaken. He believed no ship paid a clear profit of five per cent. to the owner, at this time; such was the embarrassed state of American commerce.

The tonnage employed in the transportation of the productions of America, he estimated at about 600,000 tons; of this two-thirds are owned by citizens, the other one-third by foreigners. From this view of our navigation, he very much doubted if any restrictions which could be laid on foreign vessels would produce immediately, or at a very short period, the additional tonnage necessary to supply the whole American trade. We are limited, said he, in this particular, by not possessing capital sufficient to do it. If a merchant vests his capital in shipping, he will want it in the operations in which it is now employed; yet, nevertheless, he was firmly of opinion, that good policy required a discrimination between our own and foreign vessels, in order to give the former encouragement. America must, from her natural situation, participate considerably in the commerce of the world, and ought to have the means of protecting it; but while this is gradually growing up into strength, it would be impolitic to deprive ourselves of the convenience which foreign shipping affords. Then we will not adopt such a duty as must deter foreigners from coming amongst us until we are in better circumstances. If we lay a duty at two-thirds of a dollar per ton on the vessels of nations in alliance, we cannot propose to lay less than a dollar on those with whom we have not treaties. A ship of two hundred tons will then have to pay two hundred dollars; a very considerable expense, perhaps much more than our trade can bear. If we are to discriminate between nations in treaty and those not in treaty, I should prefer the lowest sum proposed on the first, and the highest on the other.

There was an observation made by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE,) which though it does not apply strictly to the subject under consideration, it may not be amiss to remark upon. It is said, that the duty on tonnage must inevitably fall upon the produce of the country, and be a reduction of so much of the planter's profits; this assertion is probably founded on a presumption that foreigners can draw their supplies conveniently from other parts of the world. But these articles are not conveniently to be had from any other quarter; consequently, if they are necessary to the people of those nations which we supply, the duty will fall upon them. Lumber and flour are necessary to the West Indies; but the truth is, they cannot be obtained anywhere else than from America. As our shipping are restrained from carrying these articles to the place of consumption, it may certainly be thought good policy to draw a revenue from those vessels that carry them for us. Rice is not raised in any other country sufficient to supply the European market; it is so with tobacco; of consequence, the consumer must pay what we demand. But it would not be prudent to lay our restraints too heavy, lest we deprive ourselves of the use of foreign shipping; thirty cents is probably enough to answer every good purpose.

Mr. TUCKER.—I am willing to give every proper encouragement to ship-building in the United States, but I cannot consent that it should bear heavily on certain States, while part of their burden is received by others as a bounty. I mean to move, therefore, for a small duty, although I am sensible that it will be exclusively borne by a few of the Southern members of the Union. Some States, it is well known, have more tonnage than is sufficient to carry all their small productions to a market; of course, a duty on foreign ships will not affect them. Other States, which have considerable quantities of more bulky articles to export, require a greater number of ships, having few or none of their own, must consequently be subjected to the whole of the additional duty; for, whether the vessels be foreign or American, the freight will be the same. Much of the produce of South Carolina is carried off by foreigners, and in American shipping a considerable quantity is exported. The duty will be paid equally, in either case, by the shipper, for the freight of American vessels will be raised to an equality with the other; and of all this money so paid, there comes into the Treasury that part only collected from foreigners; the rest, as I said before, goes as bounty to benefit the owners of American ships. I trust it cannot be said by the advocates for high tonnage, that the States most likely to be affected by such a measure do not bear a proportion to the other taxes, because it is flagrant that they bear more than their proportion. Where, then, let me ask, is the justice of extending it?

So far as I can make a calculation in my own mind, I conclude that the duty on tonnage proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GOODHUE) would amount, on what is employed at the port of Charleston alone, to forty or fifty thousand dollars annually—one-third of the whole tonnage is foreign, the other two-thirds American. The first is all that could come into your Treasury; the latter goes, need I repeat it, into the pockets of individuals, as an extra reward for serving us. I think a bounty of thirty thousand dollars to our Eastern brethren would be no inconsiderable one from the port of Charleston alone; but I fear that it is more than it is able to afford. But besides drawing this to themselves, you are to consider they are exempt from contributing any part of the duty on foreign tonnage.

I wish gentlemen also to consider, that there remains another addition to be made to the duty on tonnage—I mean that of nations with whom the United States have formed no treaty. If we lay sixty cents now, and contemplate a still higher sum on the other, it will certainly be insupportable to those States which have no shipping; I think the lowest sum that has been mentioned is as much as can be required by any State; I am sure it is more than some are able to bear. Being convinced in my own judgment of this, I will move twenty cents, and think it fully sufficient to effect what gentlemen have in contemplation; it will be a liberal encouragement to an interest which I wish success to; and though it is at the expense of a few States, I shall be satisfied with the measure, under a hope that it may eventually promote the general welfare.

Mr. BENSON wished a previous question, to ascertain whether there should be a discrimination in the manner proposed or not? For his part, he did not discover, from any thing that had been said, the principle of policy or interest which was to guide us on this occasion. He supposed it was intended that the Dutch and French ships should be preferred to English. Now, if this policy was for the interest of America, he was content; but he saw nothing that pointed out the necessity. Are we bound by treaty or compact to make this discrimination? If we are, it is certainly proper to make it. But he did not know of any treaty which directed our conduct in this affair. He knew our treaties mentioned that they should be entitled to the same advantages as the most faavored nations, but this does not, even by construction, mean that we should prefer them to every other. If it is for the advantage of our country to give this preference, although we are not bound to do it, he would be content it should be so; but he wished gentlemen would decide this point before a question was taken on filling up the blank.

Mr. BRIDGE thought sixty cents a very extravagant impost upon the tonnage of foreign shipping. Did gentlemen see the extent of the mischief, or were they unacquainted with the present state of the staple productions of Virginia, Carolina, and Georgia, which, if carried to market, are so fallen in price as not to reward the planter's toil; whilst great part of our tobacco and rice, for want of vessels to carry them, are now decaying in our warehouses? Will not restrictions therefore tend to hurt those productions? If they will, he trusted gentlemen would be moderate in laying them; he was satisfied that the citizens of the State he came from considered a high tonnage duty as a great evil; he saw it in the same light also, and was therefore opposed to it.

Mr. SHERMAN would trouble the committee no further than just to remark, that the policy of laying a high tonnage on foreign vessels, whether in treaty or not in treaty, was at best but a doubtful point. The regulation is certainly intended as an encouragement to our own shipping; but if this is not to be the consequence of the measure, it must be an improper one. If a large duty is laid on foreigners coming into our ports, they will be induced to counteract us, by increasing the restraints which our vessels already labor under in theirs. But sixty cents will surely be too high in the present case, if it is proposed to lay more on foreigners not in treaty. Not seeing, therefore, any advantage resulting from high duties on tonnage, he should vote against the sixty cents.

Mr. MADISON.—Some gentlemen have seemed to call in question the policy of discriminating between nations in commercial alliance with the United States, and those with whom no treaties exist. For my own part, I am well satisfied that there are good and substantial reasons for making it. In the first place, it may not be unworthy of consideration, that the public sentiments of America will be favorable to such discrimination. I am sure, with respect to that part from which I come, it will not be a pleasing ingredient in your laws, if they find foreigners of every nation put on a footing with those in alliance with us. There is another reason, which, perhaps, is more applicable to some parts of the Union than others; one of the few nations with which America has formed commercial connexions has relaxed considerably in that rigid policy it before pursued—not so far, to be sure, as America could wish, with respect to opening her ports to our trade; but she has permitted our ready built ships a sale, and entitled them to the same advantage, when owned by her own citizens, as if they had been built in France, subjecting the sale to a duty of five per cent. The British market receives none; the disabilities of our ships to trade with their colonies continue, even if they are purchased by the subjects of Great Britain; of consequence, they cannot be sold without a considerable loss. Nay, so cautious are they to prevent the advantages we naturally possess, that they will not suffer a British ship to be repaired in America, beyond a certain proportion of her value; they even will not permit our vessels to be repaired in their ports.

Another consideration has some weight with me in deciding the question of discrimination. The policy of our ally, from the views of the minister employed, has frequently been adverse to the interest of this country. The person who has had the charge of our affairs at that Court has long been soliciting a relaxation in our favor, and although it cannot be declared that he has succeeded, yet there is reason to believe he has made some impressions, which our conduct ought to avoid effacing; they are such as merit national attention, and might justify a discrimination at this time, although it may be proper to hold ourselves at liberty to pursue that policy which a change may make necessary. There are also other considerations which ought to be taken into view. From artificial or adventitious causes, the commerce between America and Great Britain exceeds what may be considered its natural boundary. I find from an examination of the accounts of tonnage for the three large States of Massachusetts, Virginia, and South Carolina, that the tonnage of nations in alliance with us holds no proportion with that of Great Britain, or of the United States. This is a proof that a very small direct commerce takes place between those countries and this; that there is less of direct intercourse than there would naturally be if those extraneous and adventitious causes did not prevent it; such as the long possession of our trade, their commercial regulations calculated to retain it, their similarity of language and manners, their conformity of laws and other circumstances—all these concurring have made their commerce with us more extensive than their natural situation would require it to be. I would wish, therefore, to give such political advantages to those nations, as might enable them to gain their proportion of our direct trade from the nation who has acquired more than it is naturally her due. From this view of the subject, I am led to believe it would be good policy to make the proposed discrimination between them. Is it not also of some importance, that we should enable nations in treaty with us to draw some advantage from our alliance, and thereby impress those Powers that have hitherto neglected to treat with us, with the idea that advantages are to be gained by a reciprocity of friendship? If we give every thing equally to those who have or have not formed treaties, surely we do not furnish to them any motive for courting our connexion.

It has been objected, that the price of our produce at foreign markets would not bear this additional burden, and that the freight must be paid by the planters. It will be unnecessary, after what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FITZSIMMONS,) to take up the time of the committee in observing that foreigners must receive our tobacco, rice, &c., in American shipping, if they cannot be otherwise got. There may be a discrimination made in other respects besides in tonnage, so that a very high impost on this article need not be insisted upon. But will any gentleman say, British vessels ought to enjoy in American ports greater advantages than are enjoyed by Americans in British ports? Yet, were the duties laid equal in both cases, the British merchant would have a very great superiority. In the first place, some of the most valuable ports which she possesses, and most conducive to our interest, are absolutely closed, while every port in the United States is open to her without restriction or limitation. Again, even in those which it is permitted America to enter her vessels, she must bring nothing but the produce of her own soil, whilst the British ship makes circuitous voyages, and brings with her the produce of every quarter of the globe. These are material advantages; and take the whole of these observations together, I think they furnish substantial reasons for making the proposed discrimination.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The question in this case, I take it, will be the policy of giving a preference to one nation above another. I would ask the gentleman over the way, (Mr. MADISON,) if we have experienced advantages from the Powers with whom we have treaties, sufficient to entitle them to this preference? If we have, and are under obligations to them for such advantages, I shall be the last man to say any thing to prevent a grateful discharge of those obligations; if we are under no such, we are left to act from what we may consider our best interest; for nations, as well as individuals, are guided by the principle of interest. If, then, it will operate against the interest of the United States, it will be bad policy to give this preference; if it is congenial to and consistent with that interest, then it becomes our duty to give it. The gentleman last up has stated several considerations why a preference should be given to the vessels of foreigners in treaty. He tells you, the public sentiment is in favor of the measure. I would ask him how is the public sentiment, in this case, to be collected? Is it to be collected from the conversation of individuals, or from the acts of public bodies? If from the conversation of individuals, I am not so well informed as he is, because I never heard it mentioned; if from the acts of public bodies, we may be on a footing, because they are to be come at with a little inquiry and application. Now, if my memory serves me right, I believe no discrimination has been made but by one State. I know the State I have the honor to represent on this floor has made none; we consider all foreigners upon an equal footing, and that it is not our interest to give a preference to any, and therefore we do not do it. The gentleman says, there has been a relaxation in the policy of one Power in alliance with us, and in France we may now sell ships built in America under certain regulations; but, probably, this privilege may be no benefit to us. I believe we have not sold more than two vessels in that country since the alteration has been made, and these, perhaps, without advantage; if I am mistaken, let me be set right, and let the gentleman make it appear that we can draw a benefit from this relaxation sufficient to justify the present measure. He mentioned also an expectation of some further alterations in our favor. I admit we may have such expectation, but probably it may not be realized. Some time ago, we had some privilege respecting the importation of oil into France; but an alteration has taken place on this subject, and our privilege, together with the benefit, is gone. The gentleman mentioned, that the commerce of Britain with this country was too great in proportion to that of other nations; but this is a point not for the Government to settle. I maintain, that the merchants of America are well able to understand and pursue their own interests, and the advantages which they obtain tend to the wealth and prosperity of the Union. If they find it their interest or convenience to form connexions with the subjects of one nation in preference to another, why should the Government interfere to dissolve it? They should be left to themselves, like the industrious bee, to gather from the choicest flower the greatest abundance of commercial sweets.

I believe there is a propriety in discriminating between our own citizens and foreigners; but as to the latter, there is no good reason for establishing a preference among them. It is not contended that we are bound by treaty to do any such thing; if we are not bound by treaty, then we are left at liberty to pursue our particular interest. And here I would ask gentlemen, if it can be our interest, not having vessels enough of our own, to discourage the competition among foreigners for our carrying trade? If we give a preference, we destroy the competition. The Dutch, I am informed, navigate the cheapest of any nation; they have a treaty with the United States: of course, they will carry our produce in the first instance; but as they will not furnish enough, we must look further, to France. This nation does not accommodate us with enough either. We then go to nations not in treaty, and subject ourselves to this additional burden, and must give them what they exact. We are told that American vessels have not the same advantage in British ports that British ships have in America. This may be true; but it must be considered, that our vessels are on an equal footing with their own in carrying the produce of our country, while articles of the same nature, imported from other parts of the world, pay an additional duty. It may be well on this occasion to observe, that the nation against which this regulation is directed, may be disposed to meet you with a similar regulation, and destroy that part of our carrying trade which remains to us. At present we can export potash, lumber, iron, and other articles to England, and we pay no higher duty than British vessels, but a small alien duty to which all nations are subjected. Upon the whole, it is good policy, I believe, to let commerce take its own course, and not to attempt discrimination, which may eventually prove more injurious to us than we at present conceive. We ought to contemplate our own interest as a nation, and pursue what appears to be the best calculated to promote that end, as we are under no obligations to the contrary, from either the principles or practice of those Powers with whom subsist commercial treaties.

Mr. MADISON.—I am a friend to free commerce, and, at the same time, a friend to such regulations as are calculated to promote our own interest, and this on national principles. The great principle of interest is a leading one with me, and yet my combination of ideas on this head leads me to a very different conclusion from that made by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE.) I wish we were under less necessity than I find we are to shackle our commerce with duties, restrictions, and preferences; but there are cases in which it is impossible to avoid following the example of other nations in the great diversity of our trade. Some reasons for this were mentioned on a former occasion; they have been frequently illustrated in the progress of this business, and the decision of the committee has proved them to be necessary.

I beg leave to remark in answer to a train of ideas which the gentleman last up has brought into view, that although interest will, in general, operate effectually to produce political good, yet there are causes in which certain factitious circumstances may divert it from its natural channel, or throw or retain it in an artificial one. Have we not been exercised on this topic for a long time past? Or why has it been necessary to give encouragement to particular species of industry, but to turn the stream in favor of an interest that would not otherwise succeed? But laying aside the illustration of these causes, so well known to all nations, where cities, companies, or opulent individuals engross the business from others, by having had an uninterrupted possession of it, or by the extent of their capitals being able to destroy a competition, let us proceed to examine what ought to be our conduct on this principle, upon the present occasion. Suppose two commercial cities, one possessed of enormous capitals and long habits of business, whilst the other is possessed of superior natural advantages, but without that course of business and chain of connexions which the other has: is it possible, in the nature of things, that the latter city should carry on a successful competition with the former? Thus it is with nations; and when we consider the vast quantities of our produce sent to the different parts of Europe, and the great importations from the same places; that almost all of this commerce is transacted through the medium of British ships and British merchants, I cannot help conceiving that, from the force of habit and other consoling causes, that nation is in possession of a much greater proportion of our trade than she is naturally entitled to. Trade, then, being restrained to an artificial channel, is not so advantageous to America as a direct intercourse would be; it becomes therefore the duty of those to whose care the public interest and welfare are committed, to turn the tide to a more favorable direction.

In the trade of South Carolina is employed annually about 56,977 tons of shipping. The proportion of French and Dutch is about 2,100 tons, while that of Great Britain is about 19,000. In Massachusetts the quantity is about 85,551 tons; it is stated, that there are belonging to the State, 76,857, the remainder is foreign, and mostly British. In Virginia we have 56,272 tons; 26,903 British, and only 2,664 of the French and Dutch. I cannot, from this view of the subject, be persuaded to believe that every part of our trade flows in those channels which would be most natural and profitable to us, or those which reason would dictate to us, if we were unincumbered of old habits and other accidental circumstances that hurry us along.

It has been asked by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE,) what evidence we had that the public sentiments of America were in favor of discrimination? Perhaps it would be improper on this occasion to adduce any other proof of the fact, than from the transactions of public bodies; and here, I think, is abundant proof to be found. The State of Virginia, if I am not mistaken, lays a double duty on tonnage; French and Dutch vessels pay half a dollar per ton, while the vessels of Great Britain are subjected to one dollar. There are other distinctions in our revenue laws manifesting the same principle; some of them establish a preference to French wines and brandy. In Maryland, a similar policy has prevailed. I believe the difference there is about one-third in favor of our allies, (if I err, the gentlemen from that State can set me right;) in Pennsylvania, there is a discrimination of about a fourth. I do not certainly recollect, but I believe the like policy exists in other States; but I have not had an opportunity of searching their laws on this point, but what I have enumerated are facts affording substantial proof that the public sentiment does favor the discrimination.

Mr. BALDWIN observed, that the question immediately before the committee was of less importance than the one which had been argued by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAWRENCE.) He was glad to have this question discussed, and thought the gentleman had very properly called in the public sentiment as an argument in favor of his motion for discrimination; but the gentleman over the way wants evidence of what the public sentiment is. I think, said he, we have a strong proof of what the public sentiment is in the very existence of the House. This sentiment he believed to be the cause of the revolution under which we are about to act. The commercial restrictions Great Britain placed upon our commerce in pursuing her selfish policy, gave rise to an unavailing clamor, and excited the feeble attempt which several of the State Legislatures made to counteract the detestable regulations of a commercial enemy; but these proving altogether ineffectual to ward off the effects of the blow, or revenge their cause, the convention at Annapolis was formed for the express purpose of counteracting them on general principles. This convention found the completion of the business impossible to be effected in their hands; it terminated, as is well known, in calling the convention who framed the present Constitution, which has perfected a happy revolution in politics and commerce.

The general expectation of the country is, that there shall be a discrimination; that those nations who have not yet explained the terms on which an intercourse shall be carried on, or who have by establishing regulations bearing hard upon such intercourse, may know our ability and disposition to withhold, or bestow advantages, according as we find a principle of reciprocity prevailing. Thinking a discrimination necessary, and knowing that the voice of the people calls for it, we shall not answer the end for which we came here, by neglecting or refusing to make it.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was well aware from the beginning that the debate would turn in the manner it had done. The question which was now brought forward was well worthy of consideration and discussion, but he would add no more to the latter than barely to state to the committee such facts as would tend to point out the difference of the policy of the two principal nations in their regulations as they affected the commerce of America, leaving it to the judgment of the committee to draw such conclusions from them as are proper. He believed it true, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, that of all the foreign shipping employed in our trade, three-fourths at least belong to the British; nor did he think it difficult to account for this being the case. The citizens of America, previous to the Revolution, were possessed of shipping nearly enough to carry on their whole commerce; but during the war they were not only deprived of the shipping they before possessed, but the means of acquiring others availed themselves of the opportunity of establishing among us merchants, agents, and factors of that nation. It is by means of these men, and the capitals of Britain, that we are furnished with vessels for the transportation of our productions; it is by this means that almost the whole of our trade is carried on in some States. These observations, added to what had been offered before, would show clearly the circumstances by which that nation had got such a large proportion of our trade.

Let us proceed now to ascertain what is the difference between the regulations of France and England relative to the commerce of this country. Into the ports of Great Britain an American vessel can bring the produce of the United States, but nothing else. He believed our ships paid no more duties on such articles than if imported in British bottoms, except what was for the support of lights; but this in some cases falls pretty heavy, but it is no more than all other nations have to pay. In the ports of France, an American vessel is admitted nearly on an equal footing with the vessels of their own subjects. There was a distinction made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) which he conceived had not been fully attended to. The ships of this country sold in France are entitled to all the privileges of French built ships, in her colonial trade as well as any other. Our ships may be sold in England also, but they cannot be employed in her colonial trade, consequently the price must be lessened by the restriction of their use. In the West India islands the American vessels are not permitted to enter, but ships belonging to the subjects of Great Britain may carry any of our produce to those places; there is no prohibition in this respect. In the French West India islands American shipping is admitted indiscriminately with their own, but then the articles which are allowed to be carried there are few and of little value; they are lumber, live stock, and fish; the latter subject to a heavy duty. To some States it is highly beneficial that their productions should be carried off to the West Indies, although in British bottoms; but then it ought to be remembered that the articles calculated for the consumption of the islands are of such a nature that they cannot be obtained elsewhere; so that it may be fairly inferred the admission of them is not intended as a favor to America.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHARMAN) apprehended, if we laid restrictions on the foreign trade, we might be met with equal restrictions on the part of foreigners; but there is no danger of that. Every thing which Great Britain takes from us, is taken because she cannot get it any where else; or if it is to be had at any other market, it is not at a price so cheap as ours. Rice for that market cannot be got in sufficient quantities, tobacco the same. Lumber for her islands she has attempted unsuccessfully to procure from another quarter. Being thus circumstanced, we do not run any risk of losing that commerce by any regulation we may enter into. But, for our own sake, we ought not to carry them so far as to deprive ourselves of the convenience they afford, whilst we are unsupplied with shipping of our own. But certainly we can draw a revenue from their consumption by a tonnage duty, as it must unavoidably be paid by the consumer and not the planter.

The question of policy has been well explained, and therefore nothing more need be added; but submitting the decision to the sense of the committee, he would rest the facts and conclusions here.

Mr. GOODHUE withdrew his motion for sixty cents.

Mr. HARTLEY's motion for thirty-three and one-third cents was put and lost, but the question on thirty cents was put and carried.

The next question, "on all vessels belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of other Powers, at the rate of — cents per ton."

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to fill up the blank with the same sum as they had just agreed to.

Mr. MADISON supposed the gentleman, by this motion, intended to equalize the restrictions about to be laid on foreign nations, as he was opposed to a discrimination; if so, he acted consistently with his principles. But, said he, I am actuated by a different sense of interest; and therefore shall be in favor of a larger sum than that proposed. The more the subject has been examined, the greater necessity there appears for discrimination. If it is expedient for America to have vessels employed in commerce at all, it will be proper that she have enough to answer all the purposes intended; to form a school for seamen, to lay the foundation of a navy, and to be able to support itself against the interference of foreigners. I do not think there is much weight in what has been observed relative to the duty we are about to lay in favor of American vessels, being a burden on the community, and particularly oppressive to some parts; but if there were, it may be a burden of that kind which will ultimately save us from one that is greater.

I consider that an acquisition of maritime strength is essential to this country; if ever we are so unfortunate as to be engaged in war, what but this can defend our towns and cities upon the sea-coast? Or what but this can enable us to repel an invading enemy? Those parts which are said to bear an undue proportion of the burden of the additional duty on foreign shipping, are those which will be the most exposed to the operations of a predatory war, and require the greatest exertions of the Union in their defence; if, therefore, some little sacrifice is made by them to obtain this important object, they will be peculiarly rewarded for it in the hour of danger. Granting a preference to our own navigation will insensibly bring it forward to that perfection so essential to American safety; and though it may produce some little inequality at first, it will soon ascertain its level, and become uniform throughout the Union, a higher duty will become necessary on these principles, as well as on those of discrimination. The preference we give to foreign nations in alliance over those not in treaty will tend to increase the trade of our allies; but it will also enable our own shipping to carry on lower terms than that nation who is in possession of such an unnatural proportion of commerce.

Mr. FITZSIMONS moved to fill the blank with sixty cents, and was seconded by Mr. GOODHUE.

Mr. TUCKER expressed himself in favor of some discrimination; he thought it ought to be made on the principles mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON;) but he feared he should not be able to vote with gentlemen on the present question, because he conceived the rate proposed was too high. If the committee would agree to fix the duty on this article at thirty cents, and reconsider their last vote, and reduce that to twenty, he should concur with them; but, as he thought thirty cents enough for the highest, he was inclined to vote for that sum, only he feared it would seem to infer that he was not in favor of discrimination if he did so; but to avoid if possible the difficulty to which he was exposed, he would move thirty-five cents, with an intention hereafter to reduce the first article to twenty.

Mr. MADISON begged leave to express an idea which he thought would reconcile gentlemen to a more considerable duty than seemed to be contemplated. It was admitted on all hands that America did not furnish shipping sufficient for the transportation of her own produce, and the apparent quantity would decrease from what it was now represented to be, if gentlemen considered that the American vessels, mentioned in the custom-house reports, may clear three, four, five, or six times a year, and consequently multiply the gross amount without its being substantially true. Another circumstance that decreases this apparent quantity is that foreigners have, in some instances, in order to obtain the privileges of our ships, masked their property under the American name. This reduction of our shipping service only to show the indispensable necessity of applying means to raise it up to what it ought to be. But in doing this we ought to be careful in avoiding any sudden or violent effect upon our commerce by the rise of freight. Let, then, the operation of the present discrimination continue for such a length of time as it is likely will procure us a sufficient quantity of tonnage of our own, and then let the duty be increased to a greater degree. This may be done by a small addition to the clause, saying that the duty shall be a certain sum, but that, after another day, it shall be increased to a larger sum. Thus will both the objects of gentlemen be effected. Ship-building will be encouraged, and the freight will not be raised. He made a motion similar to what he had expressed.

Mr. TUCKER felt himself sorry to be obliged to make local observations on the question before the committee, but the duty he owed his constituents, as well as his duty to the whole community, called upon him to repeat what he had said on former occasions respecting the burden which a heavy tonnage duty would be upon the State of South Carolina. He hoped gentlemen would forbear adding to their oppression; if a high duty must be laid, let it be determinate, that the people may know what they are to bear; do not introduce an idea that their burdens are in future to be increased. He hoped gentlemen who wished for national encouragement to their ship-building would be moderate, as they plainly saw that it must be done at the expense of their neighbors.

Mr. FITZSIMONS remarked, that the sum now proposed was not so high as to prevent foreigners from continuing our trade. As a proof of this he instanced Virginia. The tonnage duty was one dollar in that State, and yet he believed they found no difficulty in getting British ships to carry their produce; besides, he did not think sixty cents exceeded much, if any thing, the average of the tonnage duties laid by the State Government. Even in the State which the gentleman complains is so likely to suffer, they have a tonnage duty, perhaps not quite so high as the one proposed. If a high tonnage duty will raise the freight, even then the conclusion which that gentleman drew does not follow; for the price of freight will equalize itself. A vessel will readily remove to where the best freight is to be got, and by their numbers soon reduce the price, or raise it elsewhere to an equality. They would readily go from Massachusetts to Carolina, and all the expense would be the sending of a vessel from one port to another: besides, foreign tonnage is more or less employed by every part of the Union.

The question on the motion proposed by Mr. MADISON, respecting the increase of the duty at a certain time, was put, and the House divided equally; it lying with the CHAIRMAN to decide, he did it in the negative, remarking that he did not see any necessity for using the words, because the subject was always in the power of the Legislature.

Mr. BOUNDWOT moved fifty cents; which motion, after sixty cents had been negatived, was adopted by the committee.

On motion of Mr. FITZSIMONS, seconded by Mr. GOODHUE, it was provided that no vessel built within the United States, and belonging to a citizen or citizens thereof, whilst employed in the coasting trade, or in the fisheries, shall pay tonnage more than once in any one year. Nor shall any ship or vessel built within the United States, pay tonnage on her first voyage.

The committee rose, and reported the foregoing resolutions as agreed to. The report was ordered to lie on the table, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 22.

PETER SYLVESTER, from New York, appeared and took his seat.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution, Mr. PAGE in the Chair. After going through the bill and making some amendments therein, the committee rose and reported the bill with the amendments; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, April 23.

JOHN HATHORN, from New York, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. RICHARD BLAND LEE reported, from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, in reporting a proper mode of communicating papers, bills, and messages, between the two Houses, that the committee had, according to order, met and conferred with a committee of the Senate thereupon, and had agreed to a report; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the report from the Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution, be put off until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 24.

Mr. BOUNDWOT reported, from the committee appointed to attend with a committee from the Senate, to receive the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, at the place of his embarkation from New Jersey, that the committee did, according to order, together with a committee from the Senate, attend at Elizabethtown, in New Jersey, on the 23d instant, at which place the two committees met the President, and thence embarked for this city, where they arrived about three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and conducted him to the house appointed for his residence.

The House proceeded to consider the report from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate in reporting a proper mode of communicating papers, bills, and messages between the two Houses, which lay on the table, and the said report being twice read, was, on a motion made, ordered to be recommitted to the same committee.

On motion, Resolved, That so much of the standing rules and orders of this House as prescribes the enacted style of bills, be rescinded.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Vice President of the United States, enclosing a resolution of the Senate, appointing a committee to consider and report what style or titles it will be proper to annex to the office of President and Vice President of the United States; if any other than those given in the Constitution; also to consider of the time, place, and manner in which, and the person by whom, the oath prescribed by the Constitution, shall be administered to the President, and to confer thereon with such committee as this House should appoint for that purpose; whereupon,

Ordered, That a committee, to consist of five members, be appointed for the purpose expressed in the resolution of the Senate.

The members elected were Messrs. BENSON, AMES, MADISON, CARROLL, and SHERMAN.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House then proceeded to consider the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOUNDWOT complained that the articles were generally taxed too high, not too high for the article to bear, but too high for the due collection of the revenue. Every thing we tax should be considered as it relates to the interest of the importer, as well as other circumstances; now, if it is discovered that the duties are so great as to make it a beneficial trade to the merchant to run his goods, he will do so, and injure the revenue.

When this subject was before the Committee of the Whole, he expressed a desire for gentlemen to get information from such sources as were likely to be the purest; in conformity with this desire, he had endeavored to avail himself of the few leisure moments which his avocations allowed him, in order to ascertain what would be the amount of the duties, the risk of smuggling, and what degree of temptation merchants will be under to engage in this practice. The duty on spirits is so high as to afford a very strong temptation; and when we consider the extensiveness of our seacoasts, we shall find it impossible to place our guards so thick as to prevent the importer from falling into the practice. We ought not, therefore, to make the inducement so strong as to endanger the loss of the revenue. But suppose, on experience, we discover the fatal tendency of the measure, can we lower it with convenience? Certainly we cannot as regards the fair trader.

Duties on Imports.

[APRIL, 1789.]

The article of Madeira wine will bear a heavy duty, as well as spirits; but, in laying a duty on it, we ought to consider its situation. That we pay for it in the produce of our country, is one consideration; but when it arrives, it is not immediately productive; it is necessary to keep it some years before it is fit for sale. Now, on a cargo of two hundred pipes of Madeira, the duties will amount to three thousand or two thousand six hundred pounds; this is a very large sum for a merchant to pay from his capital; no doubt the Government will give some credit, but we cannot give a credit equal to the merchant's necessity. The temptation will be increased from the want of means to discharge the duty; and the advantage of clearing three thousand pounds on a cargo will make it the most advantageous trade a person can engage in. Will not so large a reward as this awaken all his powers to defraud you, and to evade the checks which you are obliged to establish? But if many officers are necessary to watch the faithful collection of the impost, they will defeat the object of revenue as much as a loss by smuggling; they will consume the whole in compensating their services; besides, such establishments are odious to the people, and will render the Government itself unpopular.

The duty on 2,500,000 gallons of West India rum, which is less than the quantity actually consumed in America, calculated at one shilling only, will amount to 125,000 pounds; the duty on 5,000 pipes of Madeira wine will be at least £67,500, besides the twelve cents on all other wines. What an extravagant sum—above half a million of dollars for these two articles alone! Can this be in proportion to our wants? Surely it exceeds them. But it is to be feared, after all, that these high duties will diminish the revenue rather than increase it. Such is the natural consequence resulting from an extension of the subject beyond what it is capable of bearing. He knew a fact in point: when molasses was subjected to a duty of six-pence a gallon in this State, a person who was considerably in the trade, did not pay at the rate of a farthing per gallon for seven or eight years; but when the duty was reduced to a penny, he paid £1,200 annually. This anecdote will serve to show the committee the propriety of not exceeding the bound of moderation, if revenue is their object. In order to begin to make the reduction, he moved to lower distilled spirits of Jamaica proof from fifteen to twelve cents per gallon.

Mr. Madison was sensible that high duties had a tendency to promote smuggling, and in case those kinds of fraud were successfully practised, the revenue must be diminished; yet he believed the sum proposed on spirits was not so high as to produce those effects to any considerable degree. If any article is capable of paying a heavy duty, it is this; if the duty on any article is capable of being collected with certainty, it is this; if a duty on any article is consonant with the sentiment of the people of America, it is this; why then should not the article be made as tributary as possible to the wants of Government? But, besides these favorable circumstances, I think the combination of the merchants will come in aid of the law; the people will also lend their aid. These circumstances would do much toward insuring the due collection of the revenue.

Mr. Jackson seconded Mr. Boudinot's motion for reducing the duties, because he was well convinced they were too high even to be well collected, unless we establish custom-houses every ten or twelve miles, like watch-towers, along the sea-coasts. When trade is so unproductive, the Legislature ought to be careful how they make it more worth a man's while to live by committing frauds upon the revenue than by practising honest commerce.

There is another consideration which particularly regarded the Georgia trade. That country, abounding with lumber of the most luxurious growth, could only exchange it for rum; and a very considerable commerce grew out of this intercourse favorable to Georgia. This would be affected by the imposition of heavy duties; but commercial considerations, we shall be told, form only a secondary object in this business. There is another proposition in which he acquiesced; it would be more convenient, and more to the honor of the House, to make their first essay with low duties; because, if they persisted in laying them high, they would be compelled to an inglorious retreat, and the Government would be insulted. In the State he represented, it was next to impossible to collect the revenue, the country was so intersected with navigable creeks and rivers, if the people were disposed to evade the payment of it; and there was no more certain way to produce this disposition than by making it their interest to defraud you.

Mr. Wadsworth conceived the duty much too high, and joined the gentlemen of the opposition in believing it never could be collected; the quantity of rum imported was full 4,000,000 gallons annually; can it be thought that the whole of this duty will be paid, or even a considerable part of it? He thought it would not. The British, when in possession of this country, only imposed a duty of three pence sterling on molasses; but, with all their custom-house officers, their navy, their cutters, and energetic Executive, they were unable to obtain it. When it was reduced to one penny, they got something. How, then, can the Federal Government expect, without these aids, to collect a higher duty, when even the specie in the country is insufficient to pay the whole amount of it? If we attempt a thing that is impracticable, we shall expose our weakness, without effecting any one good purpose whatsoever; by moderating the duties we shall obtain revenue, and give that encouragement to manufactures which is intended; but by persisting in keeping them so high, we shall obtain nothing, and the law will be destructive of itself.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. Fitzsimons.—If it is the opinion of the House that the duties agreed to in the committee cannot be collected with any tolerable certainty, they will agree to a reduction. One gentleman tells you it is impossible to prevent smuggling; another that there is not money enough in the country to pay the duties; and another that their amount exceeds the wants of the United States. Have gentlemen made a calculation of the amount of those duties? If they have, do they find it exceeds even the probable wants of the United States? If it does this, it will be improper to make a demand of so much; but I believe, if the calculation was made, and the whole of the duties carried into the total, we shall still fall something short of what is absolutely necessary to discharge our national obligations and support the Government; but if there is not money enough in the Union to pay these things, the Government must go without it; we can have no alternative. But whether any or all of those observations are true, is but matter of opinion; we have not the means of ascertaining them with precision; for my own part, I entertain sentiments very different from those delivered by the gentlemen in opposition. One of them stated a fact relative to the collection of the duty on molasses when at six pence and one penny per gallon; no doubt it is true, but the inference does not hold good in the case before us; the gentleman only proposes a reduction from fifteen to twelve cents. Whether we can prevent smuggling or not, it will be best ascertained when the bill for collecting the duties shall be brought forward. Such a bill is now in the hands of the committee, and I trust that it will be adequate to the object; if it guards sufficiently against smuggling, or if it guards the revenue of twelve cents, it will require but very little more circumspection to secure fifteen. The gentleman from New Jersey states the embarrassments to which the importer will be subjected by having to make such large payments for duties out of his capital; he supports this by supposing a merchant obliged to pay three thousand pounds on two hundred pipes of Madeira; but there are very few such cargoes imported into the United States. But suppose there were, cannot the bill I alluded to before regulate the time and manner of payments, so as to give an opportunity to the owner to sell enough of the article to discharge the duty before it is demanded? This is the practice in England, where the duties frequently exceed double the value of the article, and by a mean of this kind he can avoid employing his capital in the payment of the duty. Gentlemen have remarked on the impossibility there is of preventing an illicit trade being carried on. I know it will be more difficult to provide against this in some States than in others; but gentlemen will recollect, that generally those places where goods can be landed with privacy are places of but little consumption; it will, therefore, be necessary to remove them to others, and I trust this removal can be so guarded against as to frustrate the attempt. To defraud the revenue in this view, a person who has got his goods on shore in Georgia will be little higher his object than if they were in the West Indies. The duty on a hoghead of rum will be about sixteen or eighteen dollars; the fraudulent trader will calculate the cost to remove a hoghead landed at these unfrequented places to the place of consumption, with the common charge for risk, and extra one for illicit trade, and will find perhaps that the profit to himself is small and precarious. Now, whether we fix the duty at twelve or fifteen cents, it will be equally easy, or nearly so, to secure our object—revenue.

The gentleman from Jersey has recommended to the committee to gain information. I have endeavored to inform myself of the public opinion, and of the opinion of merchants, and can say, as the result of my inquiries, that if it was possible to obtain a revenue of double the amount from ardent spirits, it would give general satisfaction in Pennsylvania. I believe in some States the proposed duties would be paid under almost any system of collection with great certainty; where it cannot be so obtained, the law must aid the officer sufficiently to attain the object.

The gentleman from Georgia says it will injure the trade of his State, because they export their lumber and take rum in payment; I think they have very little advantage by such an exchange. It is said, that we shall, on experience of the predicted disadvantages, be compelled to lower the duties. I believe it would be injurious to the Government to have revenue laws that could not be executed; but that, I trust, is not likely to be the case with the present; because the mode of collection can, I think, without great expense, be so regulated as to secure a faithful performance of what it directs. If the duties should lessen the consumption and importation of distilled spirit, a great good is effected; it will tend to improve the morals of the people; if it does not produce that consequence it will afford the more revenue. It is a proper object of a sumptuary regulation, not only as it is a luxury, but inasmuch as it is a luxury of the most mischievous kind. As I think the collection of twelve or fifteen cents equally secure, and as the best source of obtaining revenue is by impost, I shall be for the highest sum; knowing that, if there is not money enough in the country to pay the necessary sum for the support of Government, a recourse to excise or direct taxes cannot produce more.

Mr. Boudinot was not ashamed to confess that he wanted the advantages of commercial knowledge on a question where the principles of trade were interwoven; but he opposed high duties on a conviction in his own mind that they could not be collected. He repeated some few of his former arguments to show why he held this opinion; but it was not the particular article of rum that he was opposed to; it was the high scale on which the duties were laid generally, and that only from an idea that greater revenue might be obtained from less duties.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FITZSIMONS) has observed, that a high duty on rum will tend to improve the morality of our citizens, at the same time he expects to raise a considerable revenue from the importation; if the consumption is lessened, the object of revenue is defeated; and the deficiency rendered uncertain. The true object I take to be this, that we lay our duties in such a manner as to produce the greatest quantity of revenue from each article which it is capable of yielding, considering its nature and circumstances. Here, then, it is worthy of consideration, whether we have laid the impost on rum so as to obtain the payment of the duty on the whole quantity imported, or whether it will not occasion so much to be smuggled as will lessen the amount of the revenue below what a lighter duty would bring into the treasury. If the fact is, that smuggling is increased by high duties, the revenue runs great risk of loss. Now, several gentlemen contemplate that this will be the case here, and they imagine this because the duty is much higher than the mean rate of all the duties laid throughout the Union. It is higher than has been laid by any particular State; besides, it does not correspond in a ratio with the other articles. As the quantity already imported has paid but a small duty, it may be afforded at a moderate price, but what hereafter is imported, if it pays a much higher duty, cannot come in competition with the former; so that the importer must either keep the latter upon hand, or introduce it without the payment of any duty at all. The fact which was mentioned by the gentleman from Jersey (Mr. BOURNOR) has made a deep impression on my mind; from which I plainly foresee that, if the duty is laid too high, it will be an irresistible inducement to smuggling, and smuggling will take place; if smuggling does take place, it will probably tend more to corrupt the morals of the people than can be amended by restricting the use of rum. After they once have a habit of smuggling, it is but chance whether lowering the duties would root out the evil; for when once the business is established, and connexions formed, it will be easy to carry it on for a less profit than it was before it had been got into train. It is said, that the sense of the people, and the combination of the merchants, will assist the Government in the collection of the duty, and prevent smuggling. I have a high opinion of the merchants of America, and believe them to be a virtuous body of men; but I fear, like every other body of men, they may be induced to evade your laws if their interest is concerned in the event; and their interest will be concerned, if the profit from smuggling is likely to be considerable, after defraying the charge of risk. But there can be no absolute reliance on circumstances of this nature; our reliance ought to be on the law; and if the law does not take effectual means to secure the collection, we are not to expect our citizens will do it. I think, then, before we get through the impost bill, we ought to see what security the one for collection will afford; if it is not sufficient to obtain the object in view, no doubt can remain but that the duties ought to be lowered. It is at present the sense of well-informed men, both in Congress and out of doors, that the duties are too high to be collected, and being of that opinion I shall vote for the reduction. On this principle I hope the amendment will take place.

Mr. TUCKER wished the duties to be lowered, and proposed to the committee to strike off seven cents from the fifteen; by varying his motion in this manner, he expected the sense of the House could be taken on his proposition first, notwithstanding the rule that "the question shall be put on the highest sum first." He joined in the opinion that high duties were productive of smuggling; that notwithstanding the powers and vigilance of custom-house officers, and the whole Executive, contraband trade is carried on in every nation where the duties are so high; the facility with which it could be done in America ought to show a prudent Legislature the degree of probability; unless this can be guarded against, what will the law avail? It can avail nothing. Besides, the higher the duty is laid, the more you expose the officer to the temptation of being corrupted; when that is done, the revenue will be very unproductive.

Mr. BLAND would second the gentleman last up, but thought it was not in order to have the question taken first on the lowest sum.

Mr. MADISON.—The question is not whether the whole scale of duties agreed to in the committee shall be reduced, but whether the particular duty on the article of spirit. I will not differ with the gentleman altogether, and say that none of the subsequent articles are too high to be collected with certainty, but I am not convinced by any thing yet said that fifteen cents per gallon is too much to be laid upon spirit of Jamaica proof. The gentleman from New York says, the example of the States has proved that high duties are not expedient, and that this article does not correspond with the rate they have fixed to it. The State Governments, no doubt, collected what duty they thought best, but it does not follow that the General Government cannot collect more than the State Governments have done. The people adopted the new Constitution, I believe, under a universal expectation that we should collect higher duties; we must do this, I believe, if we mean to avoid direct taxation, which was always a mean of revenue in the particular States. But with respect to what the States have judged expedient to be derived from this source, let us turn to authentic acts; they will neither deceive nor mislead us. We find, in Massachusetts, one-sixth of a dollar laid some years ago; if it did not succeed, was it not owing to the inauspicious policy of the neighboring States? In Pennsylvania the consumer of rum pays to Government ten pence a gallon.

The same gentleman has said, that our laws ought to be such as to execute themselves, and not depend upon the support of the people; now

April, 1789.]

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

I cannot discern how the law can execute itself without the support of the people, therefore I think it right to place the dependence where I have imagined it will be well supported. It was also remarked, that smuggling depraves the morals of the people. If we are to consider the effect of our laws in this point of view, (laying aside the corruption which the general use of rum occasions,) let us consider what will be the effect of a deficiency in the revenue, by the proposed reduction of the impost; and no gentleman has suggested a substitute for this defalcation, nor pretends that we shall raise more than we want. What, then, will be the consequence? Lessening the impost will prevent the Government from performing its engagements, and doing justice to its creditors. Have we not seen the turpitude of such conduct, and the consequent contamination of morals? Examine both sides, and say which of these evils is most to be deprecated. But if people are disposed to enter into a system of smuggling, they will find a better interest in running fine goods with only five or ten per cent. than in such a bulky and inconvenient article as rum at thirty per cent. A worthy gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. WADSWORTH) suspects that there is not money enough in the country to pay the duties. If there is any dearth of money, let us take measures to prevent the importation of rum, and then we may get money for our produce, and soon supply the vacancy. I cannot believe the virtue of our citizens is so weakly fortified as not to resist the impression which a seeming interest in the article of smuggling, is no proof to me of a natural disposition to evade a just tax; they conceived themselves at that time oppressed by a nation in whose councils they had no share, and the resistance on this principle was justified to their consciences; but as the case is altered, so that each has an equal voice in every regulation, I do not despair of a great revolution in sentiment in this particular, when it is known and understood that the man who wounds the honor of his country by a baseness in defrauding the revenue, only exposes his neighbors to further and greater impositions. Under this impression, I trust the great body of the people will unite and drive out smuggling from our country.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed to the House, that the decision of the present question, in his mind, involved some very important alterations in the present measure; the consequences resulting from which ought to be well considered. In order, therefore to gain time for this purpose, he would move an adjournment; whereupon the House adjourned.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed to the House, that the decision of the present question, in his mind, involved some very important alterations in the present measure; the consequences resulting from which ought to be well considered. In order, therefore to gain time for this purpose, he would move an adjournment; whereupon the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 25.

The House, according to the order of the day, received the report from the Committee of the whole House, to the bill to regulate the taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution; and the amendments to the said bill being read and amended at the Clerk's table, were agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed to consider of the time, place, and manner in which, and of the person by whom the oath prescribed by the Constitution shall be administered to the President of the United States, and to confer with a committee of the Senate for the purpose, reported as followeth:

"That the President hath been pleased to signify to them, that any time or place which both Houses may think proper to appoint, and any manner which shall appear most eligible to them, will be acceptable to him: that requisite preparations cannot probably be made before Thursday next; that the President be on that day formally received by both Houses in the Senate Chamber; that the Representatives' Chamber being capable of receiving the greater number of persons, that therefore, the President do take the oath in that place, and in the presence of both Houses; that after the formal reception of the President in the Senate Chamber, he be attended by both Houses to the Representatives' Chamber, and that the oath be administered by the Chancellor of this State.

"The committee further report it as their opinion, that it will be proper that a committee of both Houses be appointed to take order for further conducting the ceremonial."

The said report was twice read; and, on the question put thereon, agreed to by the House. Ordered, That Messrs. BENSON, AMES, and CARROLL be a committee on the part of this House, pursuant to the said report.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolutions respecting the impost, as reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion made yesterday by Mr. BOURNOR for reducing the impost on spirits from fifteen to twelve cents per gallon, was put and lost.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, stated, that there was propriety in discriminating on the article of spirits between nations in and not in alliance with us; for which reason he proposed that a duty of six cents per gallon be laid on all spirit of Jamaica proof imported from the dominions of nations in alliance.

Mr. LEE observed, that a preference was given to our allies in the tonnage; if more was necessary to be done, he would rather do it in that way, than by making such alterations in the system as would give a preference to the articles individually which America takes from them.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—French brandy, I take it, is as destructive to the morals and health of the people as West India rum; therefore the argument drawn from that consideration does not apply in favor of reducing the duty on the former. If we pay for French brandy in the produce of our country, we do the same for West India rum; therefore that argument is not more favorable to the one than to the other. I believe, in short, every argument that applies in one, will apply in both instances; whether, therefore, it respects the morals of the people, commerce, or revenue; there is no reason for the reduction, unless it be on the principle that the whole of the duties are too high, and it is proposed to lower them generally. But one observation further may be necessary, to show the effect a partial reduction may have upon the revenue; if brandy can be imported at a less price than rum, the consumption will increase, and in proportion as the consumption of brandy increases, that of West India rum will diminish; if the importation of West India rum is lessened, the revenue will lose all the difference between the duty on that article and French brandy.

Mr. FITZSIMONS thought, when the discrimination was agreed to in the article of tonnage, as much was done as the House could be disposed of at this time to do, it was certainly enough to manifest the good disposition of the United States towards those nations it was intended to befriend; perhaps it was doing as much as commercial principles would warrant. At any rate, the measure would lessen the revenue without giving any material preference, and therefore was improper.

Mr. PAGE thought that brandy was a more wholesome spirit than any other; but if it was not so, it was less noxious, and on that account merited more favor. But the real principle on which the motion was founded, was certainly a discrimination favorable to our allies, and on this account he would support it.

Mr. FITZSIMONS reminded the House, that the French had already, by the vote of the committee, a very considerable advantage in the article of wine. The French wines were frequently of the most superior quality, and yet were subjected only to an equal duty with the lowest from other countries.

Mr. MADISON.—Discriminations, however small, may have a good political effect; even a difference of one cent on brandy may have a tendency to advance the interest of the United States. I differ essentially from the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAWRENCE) on the subject of preference. I think we have a great deal in our power by this policy, if we make a right use of it. I wish to teach those nations who have declined to enter into commercial treaties with us, that we have the power to extend or withhold advantages as their conduct shall deserve. If the situation of our country and our public wants admitted the experiment, I should interdict the importation of rum altogether, until we should be allowed to carry to the West India islands, in our own vessels, the produce of America, which necessity compels them to take. In any case, where we have made a treaty to open all our ports to the vessels of a nation, without stipulating for reciprocal advantages, I agree we must abide by it; but where we have entered into no stipulations, I would give no encouragement unless equal advantages were obtained on our side. We have now the power to avail ourselves of our natural superiority, and I am for beginning with some manifestation of that ability, that foreign nations may or might be taught to pay us that respect which they have neglected on account of our former imbecility. This language and these sentiments are the language and sentiments of our constituents. The great political revolution now brought about, by the organization of the new Government, has its foundation in these sentiments. Sensible of the selfish policy which actuated a nation long disposed to do all she could to discourage our commercial operations, the States singly attempted to counteract her nefarious schemes; but, finding their separate exertions ineffectual, with a united voice they called for a new arrangement, constituted to concentrate, conduct, and point their powers, so as to obtain that reciprocity which justice demands. The arrangement has taken place, and though gentlemen may contend that we are not at this moment prepared to use it in the latitude I could wish, yet let them concur in doing what shall indicate, that, on a proper occasion, we dare exert ourselves in defeating any measure which commercial policy shall offer hostile to the welfare of America. The mere showing such a disposition, at this time, may have a good effect. I believe such a discrimination as is proposed will be a manifestation of that disposition; but perhaps a less discrimination may effect the business as well as a large one; if so, I would rather brandy should be reduced two or three cents below West India rum, and then the revenue would be but little diminished, and the consumption could not be supposed to increase considerably.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The probable amount of the duties we have agreed to, will not, in my opinion, exceed two millions of dollars. This sum is insufficient to answer the public exigencies, therefore I should be sorry to reduce much upon any article. In this case it is not intended, perhaps, to make a great reduction; it is only to show a preference to our allies; but if the discrimination on tonnage is not sufficient for that purpose, I would rather make a discrimination on any other article than on brandy, the importation of which does not deserve encouragement from any part of the world.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—It seems to be admitted that the supply from the impost will not effectually answer the demands of the United States, and that the article of rum is to be principally relied upon for raising revenue. These considerations induced the House not to agree with the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. BOURDINOT) for reducing distilled spirits. Gentlemen who urged those considerations are now advocating the reduction of the duty of other spirits of equal proof. The natural consequence of this measure must be to encourage the importation of the latter, and limit the importation of the other. Will not this diminish the revenue? And do gentlemen come forward with a substitute which will provide for the deficiency? I say, if the consumption of Jamaica spirit is lessened, that of brandy will be increased, and we lessen our revenue in order to pay tribute to our allies; to manifest our regard at a great expense to ourselves; but nevertheless, we are told it is proper to do it, and the public sentiment of our country is in favor of the measure, though it is contrary to the principle of interest which governs all nations. When it is a proper time to make these discriminations, I shall not be against it; but the United States are not in a condition at present to engage in a commercial warfare. Such regulations as these will be met with other regulations by the nation against which they are aimed, and they will probably operate with more severity on us than ours can upon them. I feel myself impressed with as lively a sense of gratitude to the French nation for their important services during the late Revolution, as any man; yet I have an equal affection for the interests of my country; and before I accede to a measure like the present, I ask this question—whether we are in such a condition as to make it necessary for the United States to pay tribute to our allies? For what are these sacrifices to be made? Is our commerce on such a favorable footing with them as to require this manifestation of regard on our parts? We have the privilege of entering with our vessels into some particular ports in the West Indies, but the advantage is but small, and we have done something on tonnage to show our sense of the favor; surely gentlemen will admit it is sufficient, and not call upon us for more, if they compare the actual benefit derived from our commerce with Britain, to the real advantages afforded by the French trade. We can export any of our produce to England in our own bottoms, and it pays no higher duty than if it was carried in British vessels; we export our produce to the British West India islands, but it is in their vessels; it is the policy of that nation to improve her maritime importance by navigation laws, giving a preference to her own shipping. Can we export our produce to France, or the French West Indies, on such good terms? Then the preference, in a commercial view, is on the other side. The exportation of iron, lumber, and potash to Britain is very considerable; but we are told these articles cannot be got elsewhere, yet they are frequently imported into England from other countries, but subjected to a much higher duty than ours. If Britain was to oblige our article to pay similar duties, it would soon counterbalance every good we promise ourselves from discrimination. True it is, we have a right to regulate our commerce, and declare the terms upon which foreigners shall trade among us, but we ought to consider the expediency of exercising our powers so as not to give umbrage to a nation from whose policy we derive considerable advantage, especially as we are not in a condition to wage a war of commercial regulations with her. There may a time come, and soon, when our tonnage shall be increased, and our manufactures improved, so as to enable us to come forward with regulations adverse to the commerce of that nation. At present, I deem such measures impolitic; but when the moment of our improvement arrives, I shall be as well disposed to enter on that business as any gentleman. At this time, it is certainly impolitic, inasmuch as it affects the revenue, and engages us in commercial hostilities. If the House only makes a diminution of two cents per gallon, and it should change the consumption from rum to brandy, it will be a very considerable loss on four million gallons—it will be eighty thousand dollars annually.

Mr. MADISON.—I did not rightly comprehend the gentleman who has just sat down; when he supposed the discrimination which is moved for to be merely the payment of a tax or tribute to our allies, and, therefore, cannot reply particularly to what I did not comprehend; but I acknowledge with pleasure the services America derived from that nation, and I admit the justice of the debt we owe her; but I never meant that the preference we are inclined to show her, in common with nations with which we have commercial treaties, should be considered as a tribute to our allies; I consider it rather as a lesson to those Powers that are not within that description. If it reduces the revenue, it is a good object so far as the reduction goes; if it is reduced one or two cents, it will have no sensible effect upon the amount of the duties collected from distilled spirits. In Virginia, brandy from France, imported in either French or American bottoms, is clear of duty, whilst the duty on rum is six pence per gallon that money. There have not, however, been imported more than 10,000 gallons annually, till very lately, and now it amounts to but 12,000, while the quantity of West India rum is from 500,000 to 600,000. This tends to show the proportion the two articles bear to each other, and the effect it would have on the revenue. The gentleman supposes that a difference of one or two cents will change the consumption from rum to brandy; but commercial people do not suddenly alter their operations. Besides, the habits and prejudices of the community are not easily removed; the habit of using rum is so fixed, that it will perhaps take more than a century to change it to another object—hence the evil, which the gentleman contemplates as resulting from the present measure must be remote indeed. But I am clearly of opinion, that a discrimination will have the most salutary effects; it will redound both to the honor and interest of America to give some early token of our capacity and disposition to exert ourselves to obtain a reciprocity in trade.

Let us review the policy of Great Britain towards us. Has she ever shown any disposition to enter into reciprocal regulations? Has she not, by a temporising policy, plainly declared that until we are able and willing to do justice to ourselves, she will shut us out from her ports, and make us tributary to her? Have we not seen her taking one legislative step after another to destroy our commerce? Has not her Legislature given discretionary powers to the Executive, that so she might be ever on the watch, and ready to seize every advantage the weakness of our situation might expose? Have we not reason to believe she will continue a policy void of regard to us, whilst she can continue to gather into her lap the benefits we feebly endeavor to withhold, and for which she ought rather to court us by an open and liberal participation of the commerce we desire? Will she not, if she finds us indelusive in counteracting her machinations, continue to consult her own interest as heretofore? If we remain in a state of apathy, we do not fulfil the object of our appointment; most of the States in the Union have, in some shape or other, shown symptoms of disapprobation of British policy. Those States have now relinquished the power of continuing their systems, but under an impression that a more efficient Government would effectually support their views. If we are timid and inactive, we disappoint the just expectations of our constituents, and I venture to say we disappoint the very nation against whom the measure is principally directed.

Duties on Imports.

It has been said that Great Britain receives all the produce of this country in our own bottoms. I believe that in some ports of that kingdom our vessels are admitted, but those in the West Indies, into which we want admission most, are closely barred against us; but the reason that she admits us, because it is necessary to repay herself for her exports to this country, and to constitute herself a market for this and the European nations. Adventitious causes have drawn within the commercial vortex of her policy almost all the trade of America; and the productions of the most distant climes, consumed among us, are tributary to her revenue. As long, therefore, as we do not protect ourselves, and endeavor to restore the stream of commerce to its natural channel, we shall find no relaxation on the part of Britain; the same obnoxious policy will be pursued while we submissively bear the impression. This is a copious subject, and leads to serious and important reflections. After what has passed, I am certain that there is a disposition to make a discrimination, to teach the nations that are not in alliance with us that there is an advantage to be gained by the connexion; to give some early symptom of the power and will of the new Government to redress our national wrongs, must be productive of benefit. We soon shall be in a condition, we now are in a condition, to wage a commercial warfare with that nation. The produce of this country is more necessary to the rest of the world than that of other countries is to America. If we were disposed to hazard the experiment of interdicting the intercourse between us and the Powers not in alliance, we should have overtures of the most advantageous kind tendered by those nations. If we have the disposition, we have abundantly the power to vindicate our cause. Let us but show the world that we know justly how to consider our commercial friends and commercial adversaries. Let us show, that if a war breaks out in Europe, and is extended and carried on in the West Indies, we can treat with friendship and succor the one, while we can shut the other out of our ports. By these favors, without entering into the contest, or violating the law of nations, or even the privilege of neutrals, we can give the most decided advantage.

I will not enlarge on this subject; but it must be apparent to every gentleman, that we possess natural advantages which no other nation does; we can, therefore, with justice, stipulate for a reciprocity in commerce. The way to obtain this is by discrimination; and, therefore, though the proposed measure may not be very favorable to the nations in alliance, yet I hope it will be adopted for the sake of the principle it contains. I should rather be in favor of a small discrimination than a large one, on purpose to avoid the loss of revenue which, any how, in this article, will be but trifling.

Mr. FRIZZIMONS was firmly of opinion, that the trade of the United States was of so much importance to Great Britain, that she would willingly grant our shipping reciprocal advantages in the West India ports rather than run the risk of losing it; he was entirely in sentiment with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) that it would be possible to meet that nation with regulations that would force her to open her West India ports. If the importation of rum was to be prohibited to any considerable degree, it would produce this effect; for if it was not for the market the United States afforded for the consumption of rum, the sugar colonies would not be worth keeping; the rum alone bears the whole expense of cultivation. The quantity consumed in other parts is but small, so that a measure of this kind would have the most desirable effect; but how far it would be politic, at this moment, to adopt a severe remedy for the evil, was doubtful; it is, perhaps, much better to make only a small discrimination for the present.

He would not repeat the observation he had made on a former occasion, to show the policy of a similar measure, but would just add, that Great Britain took nothing from America which she could procure as cheap elsewhere, and there can be but very little danger that she will do any thing to make those articles cost the consumer more money; and any obstacles she might throw in to embarrass that part of our commerce must inevitably have that effect.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in reply to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE,) who had said that the British admitted all the produce of America into the ports of England, would call to the recollection of the committee a very considerable production which was restricted, unless it exceeded a certain rate in that kingdom—it is wheat and flour; besides, our vessels are always subjected to higher duties than British. For these reasons he hoped the clause would prevail. The motion then for agreeing to the discriminating clause was put and carried, and the duties were ordered to be, on all spirits of Jamaica proof imported from nations in alliance, twelve cents per gallon; on all other spirits from the same nations, ten cents.

Mr. BOUNDNOT moved to reduce the duty on Madeira wine, from an apprehension that it would be injurious to the commerce of the United States. The observations he had made on a former occasion respecting the amount of the duty,

APRIL, 1789.]

Duties on Imports.

[H. OF R.]

the length of time it was requisite to keep this wine before it was fit for sale, and the embarrassment a forced sale must occasion to the merchant, induced him to endeavor to prevail on the House to lower the duty.

Mr. MADISON acquiesced in reducing this duty, because it was too high to insure its due collection, to twenty-five cents.

Mr. FRIZZIMONS opposed the reduction, and thought the duty proportionably low; the collection of the impost on wine would be as secure as the impost on rum. As to the objection that the merchant could not pay them, he might either deposit a part as security for the payment, or bond the debt, and obtain time. He thought, that it was a revenue principally paid by the rich, that no objection could lie against continuing it at thirty-three and one-third cents.

The question on reducing the duty to twenty-five cents was put and carried.

The duty on all other wines was, of consequence, reduced from twenty cents to fifteen.

On motion of Mr. AMES, the duty on barley and lime was struck out; and shoes were reduced from ten to seven cents.

The remainder of the report was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Vice President of the United States, notifying the House that the Senate had appointed the Rev. Doctor PROCTOR Chaplain to Congress on their part; and then
The House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 27.

The engrossed bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths, was read the third time and passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for their concurrence.

On motion.

Resolved, That this House will, on Friday next, proceed by ballot to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress on the part of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Vice President of the United States, enclosing certain proceedings of the Senate, touching the ceremonial of the formal reception of the President of the United States, by both Houses; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee of both Houses, appointed to take order for conducting the ceremonial of the formal reception of the President of the United States, reported as follows:—

“That it appears to the committee more eligible that the oath should be administered to the President in the outer gallery adjoining the Senate Chamber, than in the Representatives’ Chamber, and therefore submit to the respective Houses the propriety of authorizing their committees to take order as to the place where the oath shall be administered to the President, the resolutions of Saturday, assigning the Representatives’ Chamber as the place, notwithstanding.”

The said report being twice read,

Resolved, That this House doth concur in the said report, and authorize the committee to take order for the change of place thereby proposed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Vice President of the United States, enclosing two orders of the Senate, one of the 13th instant, appointing a committee to confer with any committee to be appointed on the part of this House, respecting the future disposition of the papers, &c. in the office of the late Secretary of the United States: the other of the 27th instant, for the attendance of both Houses, with the President of the United States, after the oath shall be administered to him, to hear divine service at St. Paul’s Chapel: which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FRIZZIMONS proposed that a duty of one hundred cents be laid on cables and cordage, instead of the fifty cents. He hoped this alteration would take place, otherwise the object the committee had in view would be defeated. It is now become the interest of the importer to introduce cordage instead of hemp; the freight is lower and the value greater.

Mr. GOODHUE said that there ought to be a proper proportion observed, and therefore he would second the motion.

Mr. MADISON thought the question deserved a careful examination; it had been discussed in the committee, and it was then determined to be as necessary to promote agriculture as manufactures; that the labor of extracting materials from the bosom of the earth was as useful as that employed in giving them form; nothing had been said to invalidate that policy, and therefore he did not see it requisite to cherish the one more than the other by protecting duties.

Mr. FRIZZIMONS admitted the policy of encouraging agriculture. He was with the gentleman in that measure; he hoped it might tend to supersede the necessity of importing both hemp and cordage; but if some distinction was not made at present, to give the latter an advantage over the former, we should have cordage imported altogether, and the manufacture destroyed for want of materials.

Mr. GEARY remarked, that the duty which was laid on cordage was intended to give a preference to the manufacture of that article; fifty cents was deemed equal to the object, but no sooner was it laid, than the committee imposed a duty of fifty cents on hemp, by which means the manufacture was as much without encouragement as if nothing had been done. He begged gentlemen to consider how important a manufacture of this kind is to the navigation of the country, and he was persuaded they could not hesitate to agree to the motion now proposed.

Mr. MADISON observed, that if cordage was so essential an ingredient in navigation, hemp was also useful; he doubted from the beginning the policy of subjecting either of them to a duty. It was unnecessary to repeat the arguments he had collected them, and he satisfied that it was improper to raise the price of an article necessary to shipbuilding.

Mr. WADSWORTH.—There is a material difference between the two objects. There is but little hemp raised in America; the manufacture of cordage is carried to great perfection; if a duty is laid upon the former, it will be necessary to lay it heavier upon the latter, or we shall prevent the European hemp from coming amongst us; the making of cordage will be altogether at a stand in America, while all our supplies of this article are drawn from Europe; the consequences will be dreadful. The loss of this manufacture will go far towards the annihilating our navigation.

Mr. MADISON said, that one hundred cents was too much to be allowed on cordage. As a difference was necessary in the duty between the two articles, he would move seventy-five cents.

The question on one hundred cents was taken and lost, and seventy-five cents adopted. It was then proposed by Mr. FITZSIMONS that tarred cordage should be taxed ninety cents; this was agreed to. On motion of Mr. HEISTER, a duty of sixty cents on hemp was agreed to, but not to take place till the 31st December, 1790. Twine and pack thread was raised to two hundred cents per one hundred and twelve pounds.

On molasses:

Mr. GOODRUE.—The committee have postponed the consideration of this subject in order to indulge the members of Massachusetts with an opportunity to get information, that so they might meet the discussion with greater ability; but I believe they have been unsuccessful on this head. No communications have been received from our State; we must therefore proceed to consider and judge the question by those lights which our own minds afford. The article of molasses is intimately connected with the fisheries of our country; it is produced almost altogether in the French West India islands; it is procured from them in exchange for our fish: nine months are our fishermen employed on the Banks, but a part of the Summer months the fish they catch is unfit for any other market; therefore if we do not find a market for this kind of fish, they must remain unsold, nor can we get any thing in return even when it is sold but molasses or rum; for they allow us to bring away no other articles. The reason why they allow us those is because they do not wish them to be imported into Europe, lest they should interfere with their wines. It is a well known fact, that if we did not take those articles, they would prohibit our fish. From this view, it appears to me, that if the importation of molasses should fall through, our fisheries must fall with it: it will likewise be well for the House to consider, that molasses is a necessary of life; at least custom has made it such among the poorer class of our people; those who cannot afford the expense of sugar, use molasses. Each of our fishermen consumes, on an average, twelve gallons annually, while employed in his business. Now the committee have duties this article at thirty per cent. upon the prime cost, which is greater in proportion to its value than any on the list. The reason that was urged in support of a high duty was, that the revenue might be raised from country rum, in a ratio with what had been levied on West India. If this is the principal reason, I think it would be more just to raise it by way of excise at the still-head, and not include that in the rough state consumed by the poor. To equalize this duty, we have agreed to one penny a pound on brown sugar; but six cents per gallon on 30,000 hogsheads of molasses will raise 180,000 dollars, which is a much greater sum than all the sugar consumed in America will pay. Massachusetts imports that quantity of molasses, and would contribute more than Pennsylvania for all the rum and sugar imported into that State; for, on a calculation from the late statements, I find the duty on both these articles amounts to no more than 164,000 dollars; yet Massachusetts imports her proportion besides of West India rum and sugar. Now, it appears to me, that on the principle of equality, this duty is too high, because it affects one State more than all the others together; besides it is too high in comparison with the duty now collected in the several States. In New York it is trifling; in Virginia it falls among the mass of non-enumerated articles; in Massachusetts it pays no duty. I am well persuaded that the House would not wish to subject any State to heavier burdens than the others; but it will be the case, unless they separate the distilled spirit from the raw substance. If this can be done no other way, it can be done by excise, which will give less umbrage to Massachusetts than so high an impost. The House will therefore consider well before they decide the question, and on principles of justice and policy reduce the duty.

Mr. SHERMAN had not made up his mind on the subject; but he thought it necessary that some way should be devised of coming at a proportionable duty on country rum, otherwise the preference it would obtain, by the lowness of the price, must occasion a considerable diminution of the revenue, by lessening the consumption of foreign rum. If an excise was an agreeable tax, perhaps it might be so managed as to answer the end; but he feared it was a disagreeable one in some States, and ought therefore to be well considered before it was laid. He would, while he was up, mention another idea. He had said, in a former debate, that he would rather give our allies a preference over other foreign nations in any article than spirits. Molasses is an article principally imported from the colonies of nations in alliance; a discrimination, therefore, in favor of such molasses would be a substantial benefit, and he recommended it in lieu of that on brandy.

Mr. JACKSON was opposed to a reduction of the duty; he thought it ought to be laid high, in order to come at the necessary tax on rum. He knew the distilleries gave a gallon of rum for a gallon of molasses, and therefore the impost on each ought to be in due proportion, otherwise country rum would be sold fifty per cent. cheaper than West India. If he considered the subject, as it related to the morality and health of his fellow-citizens, he might venture to pronounce the New England rum five hundred times as bad in its effects as any from the West Indies; if therefore the House wished to obtain revenue, or discourage the use of bad spirits, they would continue the present rate.

Mr. GERRY.—It is clear by this time to the House, that we have in contemplation no other mode of obtaining revenue but the impost, at least for the present; the impost must come from the commercial States, and therefore the burdens should be light, or one part of the community is oppressed more than the other. It may be said that the duty falls eventually upon the consumer, and therefore all the States participate in the payment. But gentlemen will admit the importer pays the revenue in the first instance, and I grant that if he sells his commodities on good terms, he provides for the re-payment; but in case of failure in the person to whom he sells them, he loses the duty, and the consumer does not pay it. Considering the deplorable condition of our country, it is not unlikely but misfortunes of this kind will frequently happen. This argument is directed against high duties generally, or, in other words, it is directed against the rate of almost every article on the list. The article of molasses is now imported under very great disadvantages; but if it is burdened with an impost of six cents per gallon, the trade must be given up; the price of it has latterly increased in the West Indies so much as to make it scarcely worth importing. If on a cargo of two hundred hogsheads a merchant has to pay down three hundred and ninety-six pounds more for the impost, he had better not bring it; but gentlemen will tell us, that he may have time by giving security for the payment. Sir, such is the scarcity of money in the country, that it will put him under the necessity of forcing a sale for the molasses. But if the whole of this article was made into rum, six cents would be an over proportioned duty, both as it relates to the price and quality of West India rum; but when the fact is otherwise, and very large quantities are consumed in the raw state by the people, and the poorest of the people too, it certainly must be judged too heavy. There are no breweries in our country; it may be our misfortune, but the people there use molasses, with spruce and hops, as a substitute, and why should they be taxed for this inoffensive liquor more than the consumers of beer brewed from malt? How would the middle States view a tax on malt beer? They would think it unwise and oppressive; yet a tax on molasses affects the Eastern States in a similar manner.

This duty will prevent the sale of molasses to the distiller; it must reduce his capital, and he cannot buy so much as he used to do; to obviate this objection, it is proposed that a drawback shall be allowed upon what is exported. But why should such policy be necessary? It is very well known that drawbacks injure both trade and revenue, and ought therefore to be avoided.

My colleague over the way has justly stated the injury it will do the fisheries. At a time when the policy of every country is pointed against us, to suppress our success in this important branch, when it is with extreme difficulty that it continues its existence, shall we lay burdens upon it, which it is unable to support? A fisherman uses, while engaged in his occupation, twelve gallons of molasses; add to this what is consumed in his family, and one man will on an average pay one hundred and eighty cents. Can gentlemen tell you that one hundred and eighty cents is no burden upon that class of men, while its operation is as a poll-tax—a poll-tax towards which the poor contribute more than the rich? Every increment laid upon this branch of our trade acts in the nature of a bounty to other nations. If this important interest is injured, it will not only destroy the competition with foreigners, but will induce the people to sell their property in the United States, and remove to Nova Scotia, or some other place where they can prosecute their business under the protection of Government. There are at this time four hundred and eighty sail of vessels engaged in the fisheries, amounting to 27,000 tons, constantly employed during the season; it may fairly be supposed that the exportation of the fish requires half as many more, say thirteen thousand tons; and is this interest, together with the ship building and fishermen, to be sacrificed for a revenue which is unjust and unequal in its principles? Do gentlemen flatter themselves it will be borne without murmuring? It certainly will not; for these people, in adopting the Constitution, expected to be relieved from burdens? If they find them increased, it is natural to suppose they will be dissatisfied.

It has been frequently observed, that rum is injurious to the morals of the people; if I could have my wish, it should not be to diminish, but to annihilate the use of it, both foreign and domestic, within the United States; but to encourage the importation from the West Indies, and destroy our own distilleries, can never be good policy; yet a duty of six cents per gallon on molasses will destroy the capital of the distillers and ruin the men. But why do this? To prevent the use of rum! yet gentlemen consider the consumption of spirits as their great source of revenue. It has been observed that the tax is unequal, and that the duty on molasses used in Massachusetts will amount to more than all the duties on molasses, rum, and sugar used in Pennsylvania. I would be glad, then, to know upon what principle gentlemen extend the duty to such a height on molasses? Will any gentleman say it is more a luxury than sugar? and yet it is taxed in more than a double proportion to it. In short, whether it is considered as it affects our fisheries, our ship building, and our commerce, or whether we consider it as too high for collection—which it certainly is—it must be admitted that the object is not worth the sacrifice, especially as it may be accomplished in a more just and certain manner by an excise.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. SYLVESTER concurred in the tax for the purpose of raising revenue, but he did not wish it to bear hard on any class of citizens, especially the poorer class. Was all the molasses imported distilled into rum, he should not have hesitated to lay even a higher duty; but as the gentleman had explained the effect it would have in Massachusetts, he was inclined to agree with the Eastern members, and reduce it one cent, so as to stand at five; but as it was growing late, he moved an adjournment; which being agreed to, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 28.

Mr. RICHARD BLAND LEE, from the committee to whom was recommended the report respecting the mode of communicating papers, bills, and messages, between the two Houses, reported as follows:

"When a message shall be sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it shall be announced at the door of the House by the Doorkeeper, and shall be respectfully communicated to the Chair by the person by whom it may be sent."

"The same ceremony shall be observed when a message shall be sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate."

"Messages shall be sent by such persons as a sense of propriety in each House may determine to be proper."

The said report was twice read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A letter from Matthias Ogden, of New Jersey, referring to sundry petitions from citizens of that State, complaining of illegality in the late election of representatives for that State to this House, was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The order of the Senate of the 13th instant was read, appointing a committee to confer with any committee to be appointed on the part of this House, respecting the future disposition of the papers in the office of the late Secretary of the United States: whereupon,

Ordered, That Messrs. THUMBULL, CADWALLADER, and JACKSON, be a committee for that purpose.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The impost on molasses being under consideration,

Mr. SHERMAN said: This subject was spoken of pretty largely yesterday; I wish the gentlemen would come forward with some plan that will secure the revenue on rum. They intimated that this could be done by way of excise; if it can I shall have no objection to reducing the impost on molasses to two cents, as I do not wish to burden the consumption of that article in the raw state.

Mr. WADSWORTH.—I am opposed to a high duty on molasses for the reasons assigned yesterday. Besides, the arguments respecting the morals and health of the people are not well grounded; the fishermen and seamen belonging to the Eastern States are the principal consumers of country rum; they drink more of it perhaps than any other class of people, yet they are a healthy, robust set of men; and as for their morals, I believe they will not suffer from a comparison with their neighbors. But let us waive any further remarks on this head, with which at this time we have little to do, and consider the effect a duty of six cents will produce. The capital employed in this business of distillation amounts, at least, to half a million of dollars; it has been proved that the fisheries depend upon the molasses trade: this trade cannot be carried on unless the article is manufactured into rum, and if the manufacture is encouraged, it is likely to become an important branch of commerce. Considerable quantities of New England rum are at present sent to Africa and other parts, and a market is lately opened for it in the north of Europe. This extension of our commerce is a likely way to increase the number of our seamen; for this purpose, and as one of the best nurseries for this purpose, and gentlemen admit the necessity of improving our maritime importance; but the whole of this business is so connected with the molasses trade that, if you destroy that, the others must fall with it. The duty being so high will never be collected; the people conceiving it to be an unequal and unjust tax, will justify to themselves the illicit trade which you drive them into. Every individual will be interested to smuggle the article, and the extent of their sea-coast, their numerous inlets and harbors, will furnish abundant means for doing it without fear of detection. I will venture to say, that one-fourth part of the duty can never be collected, even if you fill the country with custom-house officers; but, if it could be collected, the trade of New England and the fisheries would be ruined; a capital of half a million of dollars would be thrown out of use, and thirty thousand tons of shipping would be unemployed; for which reason I hope the House will join in reducing the duty.

Mr. THATCHER.—I did not intend to rise on this occasion, because commerce is a subject with which I cannot pretend to be well acquainted; yet, as the interests of my constituents are at stake, and the impolicy of the measure is so glaring as not to require a very deep research, I may venture to give my opinion without being deemed presumptuous; besides, I might not give my fellow-citizens that satisfaction in the performance of my duty which they have a right to expect, if I were to pass the subject over with a silent vote.

It has, on former occasions, been argued by the members of this House, that a duty which is in itself either unreasonable or partial in its operation ought not to be laid, unless for the purpose of equalizing the system. Now, that a duty of six cents on molasses is unreasonable, will appear, if we only consider it as a necessary of life, or as a raw material requisite for the well-being of an important manufacture. It is a necessary of life; the people in the Eastern States have been so long in the habit of using it in their food and drink, that it would be little less than a revolution of nature to change them from it. We have done something on this occasion to favor the breweries in the Middle States; then why should we deprive our Eastern brethren of a simple liquor which they equally approve?

Duties on Imports.

It has been proved that the success of the navigation and fisheries of Massachusetts depend upon this trade; six cents will amount to a prohibition; then the question will regard the policy of producing such effects by our regulations. This article, considered as a raw material for a well-established and profitable manufacture, ought not to be prohibited; but when distilled into rum, it is said to be injurious to the health and morality of the people. I shall not take up the time of the committee with an examination of this position; but, supposing it to be admitted, I will ask the gentlemen if molasses ought on this account to be taxed any more than other materials that are worked up into more pernicious liquors; such as rye, apples, and peaches? What would be the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, if a member was to propose a duty on those articles equal to six cents, and urge as a reason for so doing, that it was necessary, in order to keep up the ratio between whisky and Jamaica spirits? I conceive they would deem the proposition and argument absurd; they would never consent to its being done. What, then, ought to be the language of the people of New England on a proposal for taxing an article equally as useful to them as fruit is to the Southern States? I will place the subject in one other point of view, with the leave of the Chair, before I conclude the subject. How is the exchange brought into the State? It is the exchange procured by the hard labor and industry of the Eastern inhabitants; they toil late and early, day and night, in a business beset with danger and difficulty; they go in search of fish to the Banks, remote from their home, and when these are procured they cannot consume them, they must dispose of them to foreign markets. But no market offers unless by barter, it is of necessity that they bring back molasses in exchange; this, then, becomes the produce of their industry, as much as the rice and tobacco of Virginia and Carolina become the staple articles of the labor of those States. Can any reason be assigned why the industry of Massachusetts should be imposed, while that of the other States goes free? and to my mind it is equal, whether the produce itself, or the returns for it are subjected to a duty. The effects are the same; it operates to discourage the pursuit; but the returns for tobacco and rice are not imposed in any thing near a proportion with molasses. Let us compare it in one other point of light. Suppose a member from Massachusetts was to propose an impost on negroes, what would you hear from the Southern gentlemen, if fifty dollars was the sum to be laid? And yet this is not more than the proportion laid upon molasses. If the pernicious effects of New England rum have been justly lamented, what can be urged for negro slavery? Certainly there is no comparison; but I will avoid the enumeration of its evils, and conclude with a hope that, if the House will not condescend to strike it out, they will reduce it to two cents. It will be unnecessary to recapitulate the immediate connection between this article, the fisheries, and our navigation. I trust it is clearly seen by the House, if a high duty is still insisted upon molasses, you will have to go further, and provide energetic means for the execution; for the people will hardly bear a tax which they cannot but look upon as odious and oppressive. If gentlemen are determined in persisting on what was carried in the Committee of the Whole, they ought to know, with as much precision as possible, what they are to expect. If the support and good will of four hundred thousand citizens are worthy of cultivation, the House will decide the present question with candor and moderation; they will ever consider that their laws ought as much as possible to be conformable to the customs, habits, and sentiments of that people whose conduct they are intended to regulate.

Mr. BODDINOT.—I am sorry, Mr. SPEAKER, at this stage of the business, to hear any thing that sounds like an attachment to particular States, when we are laying a general duty to affect the whole. For my part, I consider myself as much the representative of Massachusetts as of New Jersey, and nothing shall prevail on me to injure the interest of the one more than the other. I profess myself a friend to the present revenue system, because it is the best way of getting money to supply our necessities. I am the more attached to it, because I conceive it will prevent an application to direct taxes. I say, I would avoid every thing which would make a difference between the States, and therefore I like the system before you; it goes upon the principle of mutual concession. It would be impossible to impose a duty on any article that will not affect one State more than some others; but we have endeavored to equalize the burdens as much as possible. I confess, at the same time, that I consider the duty on molasses too high; but it is for the same reason that I consider all the other articles too high. I do not conceive that it is much out of proportion to rum. The object I have in view by the impost is, to produce revenue enough to answer the necessities of the United States, and to have it done according to system. I have endeavored to establish some principle by which we should be governed in laying the duties. I have endeavored to do this in my own mind, and have fixed on about twenty-five per cent. on the value of the articles at the time and place of importation. If we infringe this principle, it ought to be in favor of a raw material, to increase the manufacture of an article within the Union, or secure the collection of the revenue. I confess, Mr. SPEAKER, I agree with the gentlemen from Massachusetts, that six cents are too high. If we reckon the cost of the molasses, we shall find five cents to be nearer the proportion of twenty-five per cent. which we have laid on other articles.

H. or R.]

Duties on Imports.

If we consider it as a raw material we ought to make some further allowance; if we admit on this account the reduction of one cent more, it will be as much as is necessary. If we then take up the idea that molasses is a necessary of life, and that a great part of it enters into the support of the inhabitants, I think we may justly lower it another cent. By this allowance we shall come down to a proper medium, and secure the collection of the duty. If we could accomplish our object of taxing rum in any other way than by laying a duty on the raw material, perhaps it might be proper to reduce it to what gentlemen have mentioned; but, as I despair of this, I think three cents would be as low as we ought to go. As to the proposition for an excise to be levied at the still-head, I cannot vote for it; the very name of such a tax is odious, nor will the multiplication of officers necessary to collect it be less so; but I believe this idea has not met any countenance in the House.

It has been hinted, that four hundred thousand people disapprove the measure. I give every weight to information which gentlemen lay before the House, but in this case I take it to be no more than matter of opinion. I have so high an idea of the good sense and patriotism of the citizens of Massachusetts, that I never can be persuaded that if this House, on principle, think it expedient to lay a duty on any particular article, the inhabitants of that State will rise in opposition to the measure. I believe them to be as well affected to the Government as any other part of the United States, and that our acts will receive as ready attention and as prompt execution among them as elsewhere, provided we act on principle.

I felt myself sorry to hear a comparison drawn between the Eastern and Southern States. I thought the reasoning used on that point fallacious; the principles were not true; so, of consequence, the conclusion was erroneous. The inference was this, that from the labor and industry of the Eastern people fish were obtained, and from the labor of the Southern States, other articles of commerce were produced. The question was then asked, why should the articles obtained in exchange for the one be subjected to higher duties than the other? If this were the case, I should admit, with the gentleman, that it was a partial imposition; but do not we lay an equal duty on the articles imported into the Southern States? Let the gentleman examine the list, and say, if the articles taken in exchange for tobacco and rice do not pay as much as molasses. Some articles essential to agriculture are considerably taxed, such as steel and salt; but they pay above twenty-five per cent. on the rum they receive, which is more than I contend ought to be paid upon molasses. But gentlemen ought not to contend that all the duty paid on molasses is taken out of the pockets of the inhabitants of Massachusetts. They export to other parts of the United States great quantities of their rum, the consumer of which repays the duty on molasses. The port of Philadelphia alone, in one year, received of this article 360,000 gallons; will not treated as foreign rum; yet even under the disadvantage which this must have occasioned, we find that the exportation to the several parts of the United States, amounts annually to 500,000 or 600,000 gallons; a certain proof that it is able to carry on a successful competition in America with West India rum, without the aid of Government; and that the preference given by this revenue system, and by the new Constitution, which permits its free entry into every State, will enable the manufacture to rise into an importance hitherto unknown to it.

We are told that molasses is not merely used in the distilleries, but that it enters into the subsistence of the inhabitants as an article of food, and that in this light it bears harder upon the poor than upon the rich. I will not deny but the consumption of molasses in substance is greater in the eastern States than in the others; but I do presume that this disproportion of consumption is productive of an equalization in the system. If we compare the consumption of the northern and southern States, as it respects the articles of sugar and molasses, we shall find that the duty on the molasses does not bear harder upon the one than sugar does upon the other; for reduce a gallon of molasses to weight, in order to make the comparison fairly, you will find it weighing at least eight pounds; now, eight pounds of this article, taxed at six cents, cannot be so much as eight pounds of sugar at one cent per pound, so that on the ground of equality I do not see there is any room for the opposition to maintain themselves. It has been said, that the duty will be burdensome on the merchants, and require greater capitals than they possess, or will necessarily lessen their operations. There may be some weight in this consideration; but let me ask the gentlemen if it does not apply to our duties in general? Will they say that the objection is sufficient to deter us from this mode of taxation? I apprehend it will not be said, because it has been constantly admitted in this House, that although it is an inconvenience, yet it is such a one as must be submitted to, to avoid a greater; either we must derive a revenue from this source, or take a mode much more exceptionable.

But how will it affect the fisheries? It is said that if rum is indirectly taxed, through molasses, it will ruin this interest; yet, at the same time, the State of Massachusetts collects near seventeen cents per gallon from rum. Then there must be a drawback allowed on what is consumed in that business; but I am informed there is no drawback allowed, so that the fisheries at present labor under greater discouragement from the policy of Massachusetts, than they will be exposed to from the policy of the United States. The gentlemen have told us that the duty cannot be collected from a supposition that the officers will neglect their duty, or that the high impost furnished such a temptation that the people cannot withstand it, and must, of consequence, engage in an illicit trade. If this supposition is warrantable, how can the duty affect the fisheries? If it is not warrantable, can it be supposed that a duty of three-fourths of a cent on a pound of sweetening, in the form of molasses, will mortally affect the terms on which the fishermen carry on their business? And will it contribute to the success of other nations engaged in the same employment? When gentlemen so repeatedly tell us it will be impossible to guard against smuggling, I own it has made some impression on my mind. I fear we shall encounter difficulties in this part of our regulations; but I trust they will not be greater, as they respect the collection of a duty on molasses, than on other articles, the bulk and weight of which, added to the smallness of its value, will rather deter people from engaging in a clandestine trade of this kind, than almost any other. I believe more just apprehensions may be entertained with respect to tea, a pound of which is taxed at twenty cents. I do not, therefore, conceive that the arguments drawn from the danger of smuggling molasses are of an insuperable nature.

Duties on Imports.

It has been suggested to the House, that there would be more propriety and convenience in substituting an excise in lieu of part of the impost duty. For my part, I consider such a tax inexpedient, if not impolitic. It will not be necessary to go into a discussion of its expediency, for it is a question not before the House. It will be time enough to enter upon the subject when it has been proved by experience that the impost is ineffectual; at present, I will content myself with observing, that an excise, in my opinion, would be received with indignation in some parts of the Union, and it is not for this Government to distrust any of its citizens if it can be avoided.

It has been said, that the duty agreed to by the committee is higher than has been laid by any particular State upon molasses. Granted: but are gentlemen unacquainted with this circumstance—all the rum imported from New England into those States was subjected to a heavy duty, and the duty on the rum answered the purpose which the committee had in contemplation when they agreed to six cents per gallon on molasses. The States have now disqualified themselves from this means of self-defence; if the General Government, therefore, does not defend them, they will be abandoned altogether to the effects of a torrent poured in upon them by the Massachusetts distillers. Surely gentlemen who are in favor of reducing the impost on molasses, do not consider the effect it will have upon the revenue; when it stands at six cents, it leaves a bounty of several cents to favor a competition with West India rum. We have been witnesses to the great quantity manufactured even when the raw material had a high duty upon it, and had to contend with foreign rum, which was duty free. I have no doubt but under this favorable regulation the manufacture will increase; if the duty shall be reduced, we bid fair to lose the great revenue we expect from West India rum, and have its place supplied with a baser spirit. Thus the interests of 3,000,000 of our fellow-citizens are to be sacrificed to the establishment of a few distilleries.

If on a general view of the system, gentlemen had proved that Massachusetts would be injured, they might, with propriety, contend for the reduction of this article; but I think I can say with truth, and support the position, that that end of the continent will not bear a greater proportion of the public burden than the other: there are, as has been often remarked before, parts of this system which bear harder upon some States than others; but, take the whole together, the duties will not be unequal. Those States that raise less produce export less; consequently they import less, and consume in the same proportion: if so, they must pay less impost than other States. It is on these principles I contend against a reduction of the duty, and I think the House, upon a strict examination of the subject, will be found to have shown a great degree of liberality to their eastern brethren, when they were satisfied with carrying the impost on molasses no higher than six cents.

Mr. AMES.—I appeal, Mr. SPEAKER, with confidence, to the justice of this House, though I am far from being convinced that any liberality has been shown in fixing the duty on molasses; but I am persuaded that Congress will adopt no measures but those they can justify on principle to their constituents.

I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than any other cause. The want of an efficient Government to secure the manufacturing interests, and to advance our commerce, was long seen by men of judgment, and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare. If the duty which we contend against is found to defeat these objects, I am convinced the representatives of the people will give it up. I trust that gentlemen are well satisfied, that the support of our agriculture, manufactures, navigation, and fisheries, are objects of very great moment. When gentlemen contemplate the fishery, they admit its importance, and the necessity we are under of encouraging and protecting it, especially if they consider its declining situation; that it is excluded from those advantages which it formerly obtained in British ports, and participates but in a small degree of the benefits arising from our European allies, whose markets are visited under severe restrictions; yet, with all these discouragements, it maintains an extent which entitles it to the fostering care of Government. There are taken, upon an average, 400,000 quintals of fish; in this branch of business, as was stated by my colleague, there are employed 24,000 tons of shipping in the transportation of the fish to market and in the returns of molasses, near an equal tonnage is employed. The building of these vessels furnishes no inconsiderable employment to another important interest; the vessels, it is true, are but small yet, after every deduction on this account, the concern will be found interesting to the public welfare. If it is true, and I believe it is, that agriculture and commerce are mutually dependent upon each other, and there is a probability that the additional burden we have imposed will injure the latter, gentlemen ought to be cautious how they persist.

If they even doubt of its effects being hurtful, they ought not to vote for its continuance; now, I think I can raise such doubts in gentlemen's minds, and dare commit myself to their candor for the consequences. Notwithstanding gentlemen have expressed a uniform desire to encourage manufactures, (and I have been with them in accomplishing this object,) they now desert their principles. When it has been contended that the raw material, it has been replied that the manufacture is pernicious. It has been said that promoting our own distillation will exclude foreign rum, and consequently affect the revenue; but does not the same argument apply to every article of domestic manufacture? Has it not all along been contended that it is proper in the General Government to nurture those interests which have had the particular regard of the individual States, upon the principle that the State Legislatures knew feelingly what were the best means to advance their interest? Has not the position been fully established, that promoting the interests of particular States increases the general welfare? After this, can gentlemen tell us we are advocating a local policy? That we are sacrificing the interest of 3,000,000 of people to the establishment of a few New England distilleries? For my part, I ground my opinion upon national principles; and from these I conclude that molasses ought not to be taxed, or taxed but very lightly.

The gentleman from Virginia fears the loss of revenue from the success of this manufacture. To quiet his apprehensions it will be only necessary for me to remind him of what he ingeniously urged a few days ago on this point, in order to obtain a discrimination in favor of the brandy of France. He told us that, although the State of Virginia had imposed no duty on brandy, but a heavy one on West India rum, that under this encouragement there were not more than 10,000 gallons of brandy imported, while there were 600,000 gallons of rum; inferring from this fact that there was no probable ground for suspecting the consumption to change from the one to the other article. If no danger is to be apprehended from brandy, much less can New England rum stand a competition with Jamaica spirit; the force of habit will not be more easily overcome in this case than the other. Besides, it is well known that a great proportion of the people will not drink it at all; it is a kind of genteel thing to affect disgust and loathing at the very name, much less will they suffer the despised liquor to pollute their mouths. So far are we from having ground to dread the effect of a competition on this side, that the contrary may be justly apprehended. The custom and fashion of the times countenance the consumption of West India rum. I consider it good policy to avail ourselves of this means to procure a revenue; but I treat as idle the visionary notion of reforming the morals of the people by a duty on molasses. We are not to consider ourselves, while here, as at church or school, to listen to the harangues of speculative piety; we are to talk of the political interests committed to our charge. When we take up the subject of morality, let our system look towards that object, and not confound itself with revenue and protection of manufactures. If gentlemen conceive that a law will direct the taste of the people from spirituous to malt liquors, they must have more romantic notions of legislative influence than experience justifies.

When it was asked what is the occasion of a high duty? it was answered, that it is necessary in order to come at the proper tax on rum; but I insist that there is no such necessity while an excise is within our reach, and it is in this mode only that you can obtain any considerable revenue. The gentleman from Virginia has said that the manufacture of country rum is in no kind of danger of destruction from the duty on molasses. He has stated to the House the quantity made before the Revolution, and goes on to argue that, as West India rum paid no duty, and molasses paid some, if the manufacture thrived under these disadvantages, why should it not continue to support itself in future? I believe this matter easy to be accounted for, though I fear it will not be in my power to make a proselyte on the occasion. I should be vain of such success, and therefore I shall proceed.

There were many very considerable markets for New England rum cut off entirely by the Revolution; even those that remain we have to encounter with rivals, who successfully contend for a preference. Previous to the late war we had a market in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Canada, all the Southern Colonies, Europe, and Africa. We are now obstructed from going to many of those, to Quebec, and Newfoundland; and our trade gains no ground in others to make up the difference. Consider the state of the fisheries. At that time we possessed them unrivalled; it was the policy of Britain to favor our efforts; believing that our success tended to increase her maritime strength, she dealt out to us an annual bounty equal to £20,000 sterling for the fish we took. All her ports were open to us; we could carry it to what market we pleased, and obtain molasses at a low price for the distilleries. But the present state of the business bears no comparison with its former situation; the trade is confined to a less channel, in which, instead of bounties, we meet with restrictions. Our fish pay a duty of twelve dollars a quintal, which is given by Government as a premium in favor of their own fisheries. This imposition amounts to more than the value of the article; yet, even under all these discouragements, there are but six ports in the West Indies that we can go to: St. Lucia, three in Hispaniola, one in Guadeloupe, and one in Martinico. This being the case, the duties are rigidly exacted of us, and we have no other means of vending it but by the exchange of molasses. Nor is this the end of the evil; I fear it is seriously to be apprehended that we may shortly be deprived of this market also. The merchants of L'Orient have represented to the King that it would be for the interest of their colonies to distil the molasses in the islands. Upon the strength of this idea, distilhouses are erected there, and bid fair to rival us in the business of supplying not only Europe and Africa, but even our own country. Now, from this view of the ground on which we stand, will gentlemen say we can maintain and defend ourselves as well as we did before the war? If we even had the same advantages in vending the rum, the business would not be equally profitable, as the price of molasses has increased, and our fish has fallen. In short, unless some extraordinary measures are taken to support our fisheries, I do not see what is to prevent their inevitable ruin. It is a fact that near one-third of our fishermen are taken from their profession—not for want of skill and abilities in the art, for here they take the rank of every nation on earth—but from the local, chilling policy of foreign nations, who shut us out from the avenues to our market. If, instead of protection from the Government, we extend to them oppression, I shudder for the consequences. But I will not enlarge on this head, trusting that gentlemen are convinced of the importance of the interest, and do not mean to destroy it.

Mr. SPEAKER, we are not to consider molasses in the same light as if it was in the form of rum. We are not to tax a necessary of life in the same manner as we do a pernicious luxury. I am sensible an attempt to draw a critical line of distinction in this case, between what is a necessary and what is a luxury, will be attended with some difficulty; but I conceive the distinction sufficient for our present purposes, if it prove molasses to be necessary for the subsistence of the people. No decent family can do without something by way of sweetening; whether this arises from custom or necessity of nature is not worth the inquiry; if it is admitted to be a requisite for the support of life, a tax on it will be the same as a tax on bread; it is repugnant to the first principles of policy to lay taxes of this nature in America. What is it that entitles the United States to take rank of all the nations of Europe, but because it is the best country for the poor to live in? If we go on taxing such articles as salt and molasses, these advantages will not long continue to be ours. It may be said that sugar is also a necessary of life—true; but molasses, inasmuch as it is cheaper, can be more easily obtained, and enters more into the consumption, at least of the poor. They apply it to various uses; it is a substitute for malt in making beer; and shall it be said that the General Government descends to small beer for its revenue, while strong beer remains duty free? Why shall this difference be made between the common drink of one part of the continent and the other, unless it be with a view to drive the people to drinking simple water? The gentleman from Virginia contends that the consumers of eight pounds of sugar pay more than those who use eight pounds of molasses; this may be true, but from the variety of ways in which molasses is used, eight pounds is sooner consumed than six or four pounds of sugar, which makes up the difference. But do gentlemen mean that the poorest and weakest part of the community shall pay as much for what they use as the richer classes? Is this the reward of their toil and industry?

It has been stated as a fact by my colleague, (Mr. Goodhue,) that Massachusetts will pay more by the impost on molasses than Pennsylvania will on both rum and sugar. The population and strength of these two States are nearly equal; then why should this disproportion be contended for? Is it supposed that Massachusetts will not contribute her proportion on other articles? This, on examination, will be found not to be the case. Gentlemen say the State that exports least, imports least; but, does it not follow, that this State pays according to her ability to pay? If the products of Massachusetts are neither so rich or valuable as those of the Southern States, ought she to pay the impost in the same proportion?

The question is plainly reducible to this: shall we tax a necessary of life in the same proportion as a luxury? Gentlemen will not contend for either the justice or policy of such a measure; but they say the necessity of the case obliges them; they cannot come at the luxury but through the raw material. They say they cannot lay an excise. I ask why not? People may justly think it burdensome to raise all our supplies from impost. Much can be obtained from this source, to be sure, by touching every thing; but I would recommend touching such things as are essential to subsistence lightly, and bring in the excise as a means of obtaining the deficiency; it will be the more certain way of making country rum contribute its proportion. I am not against a duty in this shape; but if the hand of Government is stretched out to oppress the various interests I have enumerated, by an unequal and oppressive tax on the necessities of life, I fear we shall destroy the fond hopes entertained by our constituents, that this Government would insure their rights, extend their commerce, and protect their manufactures. Mothers will tell their children, when they solicit their daily and accustomed nutriment, that the new laws forbid them the use of it, and they will grow up in a detestation of the hand which proscribes their innocent food and the occupation of their fathers; the language of complaint will circulate universally, and change the favorable opinion now entertained to dislike and clamor.

The House will not suppose we are actuated by local interests in opposing a measure big with such dangerous consequences to the existence of the Union. They will admit we have reason for persisting in our opposition to a high duty, and may be inclined to join us in reducing it either to five per cent, or, at most, to one cent per gallon. If the apprehensions we have expressed shall be realized, let it rest upon the advocates of the present measure; we have done our duty, and it only remains for us to submit to that ruin in which the whole may be involved.

Mr. Wadsworth wished to show from facts, that fisheries and distilleries were better able to support themselves before the Revolution, than they would be under the present arrangements.

This appeared from a retrospective view of the trade; the duties paid in the Dutch islands did not amount to more than five or eight stivers the quintal on fish, now they were from twenty to twenty-five. The port charges were one-half less than they are at this time; payments were then made in the most advantageous manner, now we are limited, and spirits is all we can get in exchange; they then took fish of an inferior quality, now we carry to Surinam the best kind. These facts will show gentlemen that the business of the fisheries and distilleries labors under considerable embarrassments. Another great source of profit was found in the African trade; the American vessels had then the liberty of engaging in the slave trade, now they are prohibited. He did not make these observations to prevent a proper duty from being obtained from country rum; he wished it and every kind of distilled spirit to contribute to the public exigencies; but he thought molasses ought not to be taxed in the same proportion; an excise would obtain revenue on principles of justice, and therefore was to be preferred to the present measure.

Mr. SYLVESTER.—I believe the discussion has been so full on this, as well as on former occasions, that there will not be much advantage in extending it, especially as gentlemen differ so widely in opinion. I would, therefore, hope that the question will be taken, and the duty fixed by way of compromise; if it is either too low or too high, it may no doubt have some of the inconveniences mentioned, to avoid which it will perhaps be better to take a middle course.

Mr. MARSH.—The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Ames) has endeavored to prove that no advantage the General Government can give to New England rum will bring it into use; he proves this by the observations I made the other day relative to the effect produced in Virginia, where French brandy is imported in certain vessels free of duty. I shall add nothing more on this point, than stating what is well known to be the case. In Virginia, the habits of the people are so strong in favor of rum, both foreign and domestic, that it requires the greatest exertion to change them; they consume vast quantities of this article. If we lay the duty low, the more of it will come within their power, and the transition from one kind of rum to another is more easy.

It was asked, if the business of distillation was able to support itself under the discouragement of Government, why would it not do as well when it received encouragement? To this it was replied, that some of the channels of the trade are dried up, and some obstacles now occur in procuring the raw material. But is not the population of the United States increased? And is not the home market daily extending by natural means? What then is to be expected from the encouragement given but an enlarged demand? But after all the embarrassments which the gentleman from Massachusetts has detailed, it does not appear that the number of distilleries are lessened; nor did we hear any thing in reply to the observation I made, respecting the use of this article in the fisheries. Can they suffer more under the policy of the United States than they are subjected to by the State of Massachusetts? The hardships which our regulations expose them to are not greater than those of every other part of the continent.

Another argument was used to show, that the State of Massachusetts did not contribute in proportion to other States. It was stated, that where the produce was small, the exports and imports were in the same proportion. Compare the imports of Massachusetts with those of Virginia, and you will find they do not exceed one-third of what the latter amounts to; then, of consequence, under a system of impost, they do not pay in proportion either to their population or representation. The Southern States import many articles which the Eastern States do not; many things which are necessary to the poor; and why may we not, with equal justice, color our reasoning with a description of our sufferings? May not public exclamations be excited, and the children, for want of clothes, be taught to breathe a vindictive spirit? But let me ask gentlemen, why these apprehensions for one part of the Union more than the other? Are the Northern people made of finer clay? Do they breathe a clearer air? Do their breasts burn with a more generous ardor for their rights as men, or for their country's happiness and glory? Are they the chosen few? Are all others to be oppressed with accumulated burdens, and they to take their course easy and unrestrained? No; I trust the General Government will equally affect all; it was instituted for the protection of all, and it is expected it will accomplish the end for which it was established. But this can only be done by acts of justice and impartiality, and on this ground I leave the decision to the House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I beg leave to trouble the committee with an observation or two before the question is decided. It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that there are 3,000,000 gallons of molasses imported into that State; if so, there is at least 1,000,000 gallons of rum exported, and certainly the gentlemen do not contend that they pay the duty on the rum consumed abroad. The price of molasses is about twenty-nineths of a dollar, the duty is about five, and the expense of the distillation may be six more, in all thirty-one nineths, or two shillings and seven pence. Other rum usually costs about three shillings, or three shillings and six pence, to which add one shilling duty, it will bring it, to the consumer, to near four shillings and six pence. A gallon of New England rum can be afforded for almost one-half of the price of West India, and will gentlemen tell us, that this regulation will destroy their distilleries and fisheries? But it will affect the manufacture in other States as well as Massachusetts. The business is carried on to a considerable extent both in New York and Philadelphia, and it is my opinion the duty could be well collected, at least at the latter. Nor are the poor inhabitants of Massachusetts to be taxed otherwise than all others; in Pennsylvania, considerable quantities of molasses are used; though perhaps not quite as much as to the northward, so that the objection of inequality does not lie to such an extent as has been mentioned.

Gentlemen say molasses is a necessary of life, and infer from thence that, it ought not to be taxed. If we are not to lay the impost on articles in common use, I fear we shall obtain but little revenue. It is said the fisheries will be ruined, because each fisherman consumes twelve gallons annually. Suppose there are eight men to each of the 480 vessels employed in this business, who use molasses at this rate, what will the whole amount to? $2,800! And are gentlemen serious when they assert this will ruin our commerce and navigation? It is a tax of not quite three-quarters of a dollar per man. Is it to be imagined any one's proportion can be less, and provide for the wants of Government.

Mr. GOODHUE.—It has been mentioned, Mr. SPEAKER, that Massachusetts does not import one-third part of the amount which Virginia does. But the gentleman did not offer to prove this, so that I take it to be a mere matter of opinion; for my part, I think she imports equally as much. It was said that two gallons of country rum will cost no more than one of West India. A gallon of molasses is worth a quarter of a dollar before it is distilled; West India rum about two pence; molasses was purchased for much less before the war, while the fish and lumber we gave in exchange is fallen, so that the trade is hardly worth carrying on.

I take it, Mr. SPEAKER, that we are in an error. They who contend for a high duty have nothing but taxing rum in view, and we want them to consider it as a necessary of life. Certainly the two objects have no kind of connexion. If we lay a moderate duty on the fish, and an excise upon the latter, we shall both have our desires accomplished. We ought to use a considerable share of circumspection in this business, and not give any just cause of uneasiness, especially at the commencement of the Government. Though I do not pretend to say that Massachusetts will not be as quiescent and obedient to our laws as any State in the Union, yet the people will consider a high duty on molasses as injurious to their interests in the fisheries and navigation, and contrary to wisdom and those principles of justice and policy, which they expect govern the present Legislature. We ought to draw our lesson from experience. You have heard that Great Britain, with all her power, was unable to obtain a duty of three pence a gallon; learn wisdom from her; she reduced it to one penny, and succeeded in the collection. The defiance of her laws was in consequence of the measure running counter to the sentiments of the people.

Mr. AMES said, he should be sorry if he had made use of any language to injure any gentleman's feelings. He did not mean to infer that the people of Massachusetts possessed any excellence over their Southern brethren; far from it. He was satisfied that their hearts beat with equal warmth, and their minds contemplated with equal precision; he believed that the most cordial regard subsisted on the part of the citizens of Massachusetts toward their fellow-citizens in other States; he therefore hoped that nothing local would be attributed to him on the occasion.

Was the language of gentlemen to be, let us lay a poll-tax of three-fourths of a dollar on the fishermen, I ask, would the House sit quiet even to hear the proposition? It is not because a tax is light that it is proper. It is supposed that the fishermen must be poor if they are not able to pay this. I contend they are very poor, they are in a sinking state, they carry on their business in despair; but gentlemen will ask us, why then do they not quit the profession? I answer, in the words that are often used in the Eastern country respecting the inhabitants of Cape Cod, they are too poor to live there, and they are too poor to remove. With respect to our distilleries, the gentleman assumes as a fact they have not declined; but the contrary is true—there is not more than three-fourths of the business done now that used to be, beside the quantity is not only lessened, but the profit on what is sold is also less. Those nations that used to supply us with the raw material are becoming our rivals; even our home market is not secured to us.

Gentlemen who contend for the encouragement of agriculture, should recollect that nature has denied us fertility, but she has placed along our shores an inexhaustible store. To labor on our land seems to be exerting ourselves against nature; our industry is therefore directed to a more productive business, and ought not this to be entitled to equal encouragement with any other. A tax upon molasses has been sufficiently demonstrated to be a tax upon the fisheries; and will gentlemen continue this burden upon Massachusetts alone, when she pays her full proportion on all other articles, according to her abilities to consume them? Oppression will lead to smuggling, and when once a system of this kind is formed, the persons engaged in it will not stop at molasses alone, they will include every other article in an illicit trade, so that it is impossible to know the extent of the evil, or provide a remedy. If these facts and arguments are sufficient to produce doubts in gentlemen's minds, they will hesitate in concurring with the committee in this article of the report; for, in cases of uncertainty, I take it to be the wisest way not to proceed in a dubious track.

Mr. GRANT.—After what I said yesterday on this subject, it cannot be necessary for me to go again fully into the argument; what I then advanced has been answered in few cases. I mentioned the difficulties to which a merchant would be subjected who would have to advance the duties; he must sell to a loss, or have a large capital for the purpose; no argument has been urged to show an impropriety in this reasoning. A cargo and outfit of a vessel worth £1000, lawful money, would bring in return 22,000 gallons of molasses; this, as I said yesterday, will pay £396, a duty of near forty per cent. upon the cargo. It was also mentioned, that a large quantity of the article was used by the poor of the seaports; a high duty must necessarily raise the price or lessen the consumption, in which case it will be an additional discouragement to the trade. If the price is raised, the distiller must likewise increase his capital or manufacture less; if so, the demand is again decreased. If it is necessary to destroy the manufacture on account of the injury it does to the morals of the people, the proprietors ought to be indemnified. But if rum is still to be used among us, let us give a preference to our own manufacture. By discouraging the molasses trade, you lessen the demand for fish, which are exported to be exchanged for that article.

It has been said, that a fisherman uses but twelve gallons. I include his family, and make it thirty; for this he has to pay two dollars annually. Is not this a burden? Gentlemen must own it is.

The gentleman from Virginia refers us to a period before the Revolution, when the manufacture supported itself under a duty. The kingdom of Great Britain was at that time in the zenith of her power; she had her board of commerce, her vessels of war, and bodies of troops to support the measure; she sent over an army before she gave it up; at last she was compelled to reduce it. But do gentlemen mean to engage Congress to support its measures in this way. The Parliament had an object to contend for; they did not like their New England colonies to interfere with the business of their West India islands; they wished to totally destroy our distilleries, but could not succeed. This Government has no object of this kind; then shall we give chagrin to those people of whom we exact support? Are we not putting to hazard the affections of the numerous citizens concerned in this business, who have been the warm advocates of the Constitution from an expectation of benefit to their particular interests? And this for the sake of a measure that must defeat itself. The duty will exceed the risk of smuggling; the latter, perhaps, not being more than five per cent., the former forty per cent., on the value of the article.

If, therefore, we lay an excise upon the rum, and a small duty on molasses, we shall prevent the necessity of a clandestine trade, obtain a greater revenue, and avoid those injuries which are so justly apprehended to extend to our fisheries and navigation.

Mr. JACKSON.—I have attended through the whole of this debate, but have been unable to discover any new light reflected on the subject. I do not mean to trespass upon the patience of the committee but for a moment. The gentleman from Massachusetts tell us that fish is an article of duty is imposed upon molasses, the business is ruined. Let me ask them, are there not other articles of trade of great moment to the southward? What is to become of the lumber of Georgia? We are obliged to take rum in the West Indies in exchange for our lumber, upon which we pay fifteen cents a gallon duty. The gentlemen are not for reducing this; so I hope they will admit their arguments on this point to be obviated.

One gentleman has thrown out a remark respecting the slaves in the Southern States. I know the subject is not before the House; but I beg just to observe, that however slavery may be condemned in the Eastern States, it is impracticable to cultivate the Southern country without their assistance.

The question on striking out six cents was determined in the negative.

Mr. FITZSIMONS revived his motion which was lost in the committee; that a drawback of three cents per gallon be allowed on all rum distilled in the United States, and which shall be exported without the limits thereof. This was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MADISON, the clauses of the report respecting the duty to be laid on tonnage, was postponed. And then the House appointed a committee to bring in a bill or bills, pursuant to the report as adopted.

WEDNESDAY, April 29.

The petitions of the citizens of New Jersey, whose names are thereunto subscribed, complaining of the illegality of the election of Representatives to Congress for that State, as referred to in Mr. Ogden's letter of yesterday, were read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that it be an instruction to the said committee, to report a proper mode of investigation and decision thereupon.

The House proceeded to consider the report from the committee of elections, (which lay on the table) on the petition of David Ramsay of the State of South Carolina, suggesting that William Smith returned a member of this House as elected within that State, was, at the time of his election, ineligible; and the said report being amended to read as followeth:

"That in this case it will be sufficient in the first instance, that a committee take such proofs as can be obtained in this city respecting the facts stated in the petition, and report the same to the House. That Mr. Smith be permitted to be present from time to time when such proofs are taken, to examine the witnesses, and to offer counter proofs, which shall also be received by the committee, and reported to the House.—That if the proofs so to be reported shall be declared by the House insufficient to verify the material facts stated in the petition, or such other facts as the House shall deem proper to be inquired into, it will then be necessary for the House to direct a further inquiry, and especially the procuring whatever additional testimony may be supposed to be in South Carolina, as the case may require.—That all questions arising on the proofs be decided by the House without any previous opinion thereon reported by a committee.

"Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said report, and that it be an instruction to the Committee of Elections to proceed accordingly."

On motion,

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report an estimate of the supplies requisite for the present year, and of the net produce of the impost as agreed to by the House, and that Messrs. GERRY, SMITH, (of Maryland,) and PARKER, be of the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the following resolution of the Senate, to wit:

"In Senate, April 27.

Resolved, That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, he, attended by the Vice President, and the members of the Senate and House of Representatives proceed to St. Paul's Chapel to hear divine service, to be performed by the Chaplains to Congress already appointed." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the Senate in the said resolution; amended to read as followeth, to wit:

"That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, the Vice President and members of the Senate, the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives will accompany him to St. Paul's Chapel to hear divine service performed by the Chaplains of Congress."

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 30.

JONATHAN GROUT, from Massachusetts, appeared and took his seat.

This being the day on which the President of the United States was inaugurated no other business, of course, was attended to. The President's Address to both Houses appears in the proceedings of the Senate, page 27.

FRIDAY, May 1.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the Speech of the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress, delivered yesterday in the Senate Chamber, immediately after his inauguration, which being read,

On motion,

Resolved, That the said Speech be committed to a Committee of the whole House.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAER in the Chair. And after adopting the following resolution, the committee rose, and reported it to the House, which agreed to it.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that an Address to the President ought to be prepared, expressing the congratulations of the House of Representatives, on the distinguished proof given him of the affection and confidence of his fellow citizens, by the unanimous suffrage which has appointed him to the high station which he fills; the approbation felt by the House of the patriotic sentiments and enlightened policy recommended by his Speech; and assuring him of their disposition to concur in giving effect to every measure which may tend to secure the liberties, promote the harmony, and advance the happiness and prosperity of their country.

Ordered, That a committee to consist of five members be appointed to prepare an Address pursuant to the said resolution. The members elected are Messrs. MADISON, CLYMER, SHERMAN, GALE, and BENSON.

A motion was made that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That ——— per annum, be the compensation to be allowed to the President of the United States, during the term for which he is to be elected.

The said resolution being read, was committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House then proceeded by ballot to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress on the part of this House. Upon examining the ballots, it appeared that the Rev. WILLIAM LINN was elected.

SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from New Hampshire, appeared and took his seat.

MONDAY, May 4.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition from the shipwrights of the town of Baltimore, praying the attention of Congress to the increase of American shipping and tonnage, and the passage of a suitable navigation act for its encouragement. Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Four other petitions were presented.

A petition of Alexander Lewis, of the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House, and read, setting forth that he had discovered and constructed an easy and expeditious method of impelling boats of twenty-five tons burden and under, through the water, against any current or stream however rapid; as also an easy method of raising a sufficient quantity of water twenty feet in height, to turn any mill; and praying that an act may pass to secure to him, his heirs, &c., for the term of twenty-one years, an exclusive right of constructing boats upon his model, in the United States.

Also, a petition of Andrew Newell and Seth Clark, of the State of Massachusetts, praying that the proper officer may be authorized to receive and examine their accounts as assistant-commissionaries of issues, the lapse of time limited for that purpose by the late Congress notwithstanding.

Also, a petition of Sarah Parker, of the State of Massachusetts, praying that some relief may be granted for the support of herself and a large family of children, being the widow and orphan of Lieutenant Colonel Moses Parker, who was wounded and made prisoner by the British troops in the battle of Charlestown, on the 17th of June, 1775, and was afterwards confined in the jail of Boston, and there died of his wounds in the month of July following.

Also, a petition of Martha Walker, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that some relief may be granted her, as the distressed widow of Thomas Walker, Esq., late of Boston, who, at the commencement of the late Revolution, abandoned a very considerable property in the province of Quebec, and attached himself to the interests and fortunes of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petitions do severally lie on the table.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE.

On motion of Mr. GOODHUE, the House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The clauses relative to the tonnage of vessels, discriminating between foreign nations in alliance and not in alliance with the United States, being under consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to strike out the discrimination, conceiving that, in the present situation of our country, we ought to be cautious not to express satisfaction or dissatisfaction with respect to the conduct of foreigners; so far as is prudent and right, we ought to preserve an exact neutrality; and act according as circumstances exist. It will be necessary, said he, to consider this subject in two points of view; first, as it respects the necessity of our employing foreigners; and, secondly, how far a regulation that is intended to meet the conduct of those nations not in alliance with us is proper on our part, and what effects will probably flow from the discrimination in this particular. It was stated, when this subject was under consideration before, that the United States had not a sufficient quantity of tonnage to transport its produce. It was said, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that its aggregate was but one-third of the tonnage employed for this purpose, if so we are indebted to foreigners for the other two-thirds.

Mr. FRIZZMONS.—I think the gentleman has misunderstood me. I believe I said, and the fact is, that near two-thirds of the tonnage is our own, and but one-third foreign.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I understood him, as I stated it, that two-thirds belonged to foreigners; however, the greater part of this foreign tonnage is owned in Great Britain. Being indebted to foreigners for their vessels, I ask, is it proper to give a bounty to some of them, especially as it operates as a duty upon the articles exported? Why make the discrimination? It is said we should enable those nations, with whom we have commercial treaties, to participate more largely of our trade; but at present they do not supply us with ships for the purpose of carrying it on. If we cannot get vessels from these favored nations, we must have them from others, or, the alternative is, we must keep our produce to perish in our hands. If the vessels are indispensably necessary, the very circumstance of our wanting them will oblige us to give the freight that is asked. Is it reasonable, when we are under the necessity of having vessels, and are from our circumstances obliged to give foreigners what freight they ask, to expect our own citizens to let theirs for less than what is paid to foreigners? Then the enhanced price of freight will be laid on all, whether foreign or domestic. If I am right in these considerations, let me ask gentlemen, will the produce of the country bear burdens of this nature? Every gentleman will determine for himself. The gentlemen from South Carolina and Virginia will determine whether their valuable and important staples, whether even their rice and tobacco, which have no rivals in the European markets, will, or possibly can, bear such an excessive burden? Let the gentlemen from the Middle States determine whether such is the flourishing state of their agriculture, as to enable them to pay a freight of this kind? If the articles to be vendied at foreign markets cannot, and I trust gentlemen have already determined in their own minds that they cannot, bear the expense, this measure will produce the most mischievous consequences. Mr. Speaker, it will discourage agriculture itself; it will destroy the soul of the nation, the ardent industry of the people. If the products of your soil cannot be sent to market, they must lay and perish; the planter and husbandman having no stimulus to labor, the prospect must be languid, and a universal cessation of operative industry stretch over all your land.

Let us now proceed to consider the subject in the second point of view, as a regulation to meet the conduct of those nations which have not formed commercial treaties with us. We have no treaty of commerce with either Spain, Portugal, or Great Britain; yet these are nations with whom the United States carry on a very beneficial commerce, as lucrative and useful to our interest as any we have with nations in alliance with us. The proposed discrimination does not apply particularly to one nation more than to another, the expression is general, as it respects all Powers with whom the United States have or have not commercial treaties. Now, is it to be supposed that they will remain quiet under this unfavorable discrimination? I believe it is more natural to suppose that they will meet you with similar regulations. Spanish and Portuguese vessels will pay the same tonnage as British; now, from them the Eastern States have some ill to apprehend; considerable quantities of fish are exported to the dominions of Portugal and Spain, will they not lay a duty on the fish unfavorable to us and advantageous to some other Power concerned in that business? This must operate to reduce the profits on American fish—and I believe it is well known to this House, the gentlemen have, on a former occasion, fully stated it to us, that the fisheries are incapable to bear the smallest increase of its burdens without doing an essential injury to the trade. I need not, therefore, amplify on this head.

It is true, Great Britain has not hitherto entered into a commercial treaty with the United States. Perhaps it is not worth the inquiry why this has not been done; but surely if we mean to induce her to form one with us, it is more likely to be brought about by moderation than by a war of commercial regulations. It is well known that that Power stands high in the opinion of all nations; its character for riches and power is justly great; its commercial importance is well known to us. Hence we have but little to expect by a commercial warfare, nor can it be necessary, when the object we aim at can be obtained in a more eligible manner. At least, had we not better try the effect of moderation? It is certainly the advice of prudence to do so; if we find this mean to be unsuccessful, we can certainly apply the other. We always have it in our power, and after being disappointed in temperate measures, we can urge the other more properly.

If we make them our friends, it may be advantageous to us; if they become our enemies in commerce, it may have a disagreeable and inconvenient effect. They can restrict us more than we can them; the nation, by being long established, is possessed of capital to bear the loss of a suspension of trade; we are, as it were, the creatures of yesterday, unable to stand such competition, even if we exert ourselves to the utmost said before, and repeat it now, that we draw great advantages from our commerce with England, which we run the risk of losing without an object worthy the sacrifice. We are admitted into their ports on terms more favorable than any other nation; articles brought from America do not pay the duty, to which the like are subject from other parts of the globe, which is a source of considerable benefit to our commerce. If my information is right, our vessels are admitted into their ports in the East Indies. This trade is likely to become of the greatest importance to the United States. We not only have vessels that answer for this branch of commerce, but furnish considerable produce for carrying it on. I am told that there are not less than forty-seven vessels, at this time, on voyages to the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope. This trade may be materially affected by the policy of the British nation, which has an amazing influence in that quarter of the world. I trust, no friend to the navigation of America will pursue measures destructive to this trade; it is the only one to compensate us for the loss of the West India trade, and yet the regulations of Britain may essentially injure us in that quarter. Upon the whole, I would recommend temper and moderation to the House; if they find these will not, or are not sufficient to produce the effect they contemplate, then take the mode now proposed; it can then be done with more propriety than at present. These are the hasty thoughts which have occurred to my mind against the measure; and I beg gentlemen to believe, that I am actuated only by the purest motives for my country's good, in opposing what I consider as prejudicial to her interest. I wish my country to do those actions which I am certain will reflect honor upon her councils, and bring to her sons that happiness which we are bound by duty to labor for. I would not have her, at her entrance into life, show an intemperate disposition, or do any thing which she might have cause to repent of hereafter.

Mr. MADISON.—I conceive, Mr. Speaker, that we must consider this as a general question, involving these points: How far it is expedient, at this time, to make a discrimination between foreign nations and the United States, for the purpose of promoting and accelerating the improvement of the American navigation? And how far it is expedient to make such a discrimination between foreigners, as may induce them to permit us to extend our own navigation on principles of reciprocity? For I imagine those subjects will be found to be connected. The arguments offered against the measure are founded on a maxim of impolicy. It is stated, that as we have not vessels enough of our own to transport the produce of our country, and as this produce sells low, we ought not to enter into regulations that will increase the price of freight. The plain meaning of which I take to be let us employ those vessels that will do our business cheapest, making no kind of discrimination whatever. If this argument has weight, it goes against discriminating in favor of our own shipping. I admit, that laying fifty cents on foreign vessels, and but six on our own, is a regulation by which the owners of American shipping will put a considerable part of the difference into their pockets. This, sir, I consider as a sacrifice of interest to policy; the sacrifice is but small, but I should not contend for it; if we did not stand in need of maritime improvements. Were it not for the necessity we are under of having some naval strength, I should be an advocate for throwing wide open the doors of our commerce to all the world, and making no kind of discrimination in favor of our own citizens. But we have maritime dangers to guard against, and we can be secured from them no other way than by having a navy and seamen of our own; these can only be obtained by giving a preference. I admit it is a tax, and a tax upon our produce; but it is a tax we must pay for the national security. I reconcile it to the interest of the United States that this sacrifice should be made; by it we shall be able to provide the means of defence, and by being prepared to repel danger, is the most likely way to avoid it. This tax, therefore, may prevent the horror of a war, and secure to us that respect and attention which we merit.

Duties on Tonnage.

I am a friend to the navigation of America, and shall always be as ready to go as great lengths in favor of that interest, as any gentleman on this floor. I have it in contemplation to propose a distant time to be fixed, at which these high duties on tonnage shall begin to operate; by which means the interests of that part of the community employing foreign shipping will be unaffected for the present, and the other part will have time to increase its tonnage, so as to answer for the transportation of the produce of all America.

With relation to the discrimination proposed to be made between foreigners, I think nothing new has been offered now. It has not been denied, and therefore I take it to be tacitly admitted, that the public sentiments are friendly to such a discrimination as is proposed. I do not think it necessary, therefore, to relate particularly some facts, which would have shown that almost all the States in the Union have manifested their opinion on the subject, that a discrimination ought to be made, and ought to operate particularly on Great Britain. A discrimination of this kind first appeared in New Hampshire; the influence of its example expanded the whole extent of the Union, and State after State adopted regulations for the salutary purpose of checking a power that was monopolizing our trade; but finding, from fatiguing experience, that their separate efforts were ineffectual, they united in forming the Government under which we deliberate. I will not say only, that if, in the first act of Congress, we abolish this favorite distinction, we disappoint the expectations of the warmest friends and advocates of the Constitution, but we shall also disappoint the expectations of its enemies, and the people of Britain. The policy manifested by that nation towards us since the Revolution must evince to every thinking mind the necessity of extending our commerce to other channels, and no longer suffer her to regulate and limit us in this particular. The policy of her Parliament has been on the watch to seize every advantage which our weak and unguarded situation exposed; she has bound us in commercial manacles, and very nearly defeated the object of our independence.

We all know there was a time when Britain showed a disposition to form the treaty we wish for. This resulted from an apprehension that the United States possessed both the power and inclination to do themselves justice. The moment she discovered we had not the power to perform our contracts, her disposition changed. Now, for my part, I can discover no motive for that nation to alter its conduct; if, now that we have the power, we want the inclination. They will persevere in their selfish interest, and narrow policy, to exclude us from a reciprocal share of trade; they will continue the ability to the Executive Magistrate to regulate the intercourse by circumstances as they arise, but ever studious to their own interest alone. The gentleman from New York seems to apprehend, that if we commence commercial hostilities, we shall suffer by reprisals. For my part, I am not afraid of suffering in the contest; her interests can be wounded almost mortally, while ours are invulnerable. She is sensible of this; and the people of America are not unacquainted with the natural advantages possessed over her: if it were necessary, and means of a pacific nature were not immediately successful, America could defend herself. Suppose Great Britain not pleased with our regulation, but disposed to counteract and oppose us with other restrictions, and we proceed to do each other all the injury which commercial prohibitions can produce; which, let me ask, of the parties, are most vulnerable? How we could sustain our wounds I will not say; those who know our country well, will have but little uneasiness on that head. But, though I do not say how we could sustain our wounds, I can point out how we could inflict most deadly ones. If we were to say, that no article should be exported from America to the West Indies, but what went in our own bottoms, we should soon hear a different language from any that has ever been held out to us on the subject of commercial regulations. It may be said, the British West Indies could draw supplies from the mother country; but these would be only precarious; there are always times when they must be dependent upon us, even for the necessary subsistence, to save them from destruction.

Duties on Tonnage.

[H. or R.]

Now, let me ask, what article is that we are dependent upon Great Britain for, that is necessary for our subsistence? If it be said there are articles of convenience we must have from her, I beg gentlemen to look round and observe, that those materials for manufactures which she supplies us with, and fabricates in the highest perfection, are to be found in the United States, and within these few years, we have made rapid advances in manufacturing ourselves. This must eventually lessen the imports from Britain, and her independent situation arises from the flourishing condition of her manufactures and commerce. I have, therefore, no fears of entering into a commercial warfare with that nation; if fears are to be entertained, they lie on the other side. I could go more largely into this subject, and demonstrate clearly that we have infinite advantages over her. Even at this moment we hear the cry of distress from one part of her dominions, which can only be relieved by the resources they have in this country. But I will not take up the time of the committee longer on this subject, nor dilate upon the nature and extent of the direct trade carried on between foreigners and us, and the circuitous one through Great Britain, from which she derives great advantages; nor show the comparative motives we have for making a discrimination between her and other foreign nations. Whales oil is prohibited in Britain; at least subjected to a duty amounting to a prohibition, but it is admitted into France. I need not remark the value which we ought to set upon this part of our commerce; fisheries are, perhaps, the best nurseries for seamen of any employment whatever. Rice is also an article received by them, and enters considerably into the consumption of the people; these articles are making their way through that country, and will open a considerable vent for the surplus that we have. In this point of view, it is important not to take any steps that would check that spirit which seems disposed to favor the commerce and interests of America. Tobacco is also consumed in considerable quantities in France; undoubtedly it is our interest that a direct trade should be carried on with that kingdom in this article. Eighty or ninety thousand hogsheads of this article have been shipped to Great Britain, of which scarcely 15,000 are consumed there; the remainder is sent off to other countries; 20,000 hogsheads of this very tobacco is consumed in France. It is not the fault of our merchants that this supply does not go direct to that kingdom, as good policy would dictate. I need not repeat the advantages to be derived from a direct intercourse with those nations, whose inhabitants consume the staples of our country. I conceive, where no special reason to the contrary exists, we may consider trade in its natural channel when the articles are carried immediately to the consumer. Considering our trade in this point of view, a great part of ours is extremely diverted from the course it ought to pursue; but a small proportion of it flows in any other than in that between Great Britain and us; our policy, therefore, as I stated on a former occasion, ought to be calculated to give it that impulse which nature directs. I wish that any general principle would permit us to make a distinction between Spain and Britain, but I do not know, there is such a general principle—there is none in the possession of this House to avail ourselves of. We must consider Spain as a nation not having formed a treaty of commerce with us. If they are disposed to make such a treaty, they will only be subjected for a short time to the inconvenience which the proposed measure will inflict. Admitting that the duty on tonnage is not very agreeable to every part of the Union, yet their momentary inconvenience must give way to considerations of greater importance. I have no reason to suppose, that the sense of the House will lead us to disagree to the measure. I have made these remarks, not because I thought they would influence the vote of any gentleman, but because I thought it decent to show the principles upon which our determination is founded. I trust there will be a majority, and a large majority too, in favor of the proposed discrimination; indeed, the question stands predetermined; we have made a discrimination on the article of spirits upon the same principle; it would be a violation of propriety, therefore, to suppose a contrary decision in this case.

Mr. Fitzsimons.—I shall not speak as to the policy of the measure; I mean to confine myself to stating a few facts, as I did when the subject was before the Committee of the Whole House. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Lawrence) has said, that I stated the foreign tonnage as two-thirds of the whole employed by the United States. It is possible that I made this mistake in my language, but the truth is, that one-third only is foreign, and of this a very considerable proportion is British. The state of the tonnage in Massachusetts is nearly all American, in New York, 55,000 tons of the same, and 30,000 foreign; nearly the same proportion is employed at Philadelphia. Maryland employs about three American to two foreign; in Virginia and South Carolina, they are nearly equal; in Georgia, the difference is two-thirds foreign, and one-third American; so that, upon the whole, there is little more than one-third foreign. This statement very considerably lessens our dependence upon foreign nations from what has been imagined by the gentleman who has spoken in opposition; nor does it follow that we shall pay the freight upon all our exports in proportion as we lay the duty. If we take a view of the trade of the United States, we shall discover that it will not necessarily be the consequence.

What are the articles Great Britain takes of America? A great proportion of the lumber used in the West Indies, indeed I may say the whole—a great proportion of the lumber used within that kingdom. The West Indies cannot draw her supplies elsewhere; if you were, therefore, to lay a duty of forty per cent. upon the freight, the consumers in those islands must pay it. The same observation holds good as it respects our intercourse with Britain; the articles she takes from us cannot be supplied from any other country. Experience has proved, that every one of these articles has been advanced in price in the proportion as it has been encumbered, and the high freight only serves as a pretext to increase the rate to the consumer. It is not just, therefore, to say that the articles are of less value in our country, for in instances of this kind the burden must fall upon those who use them. It is not the case with the rice of South Carolina, nor with the tobacco of Virginia, nor ever can be, unless there is a competition with other countries in the sale of these articles. Flax is a very necessary article in one of their most important manufactures; the seed of this plant is sedulously sought for in America because it is superior to their own, or because it is inconvenient to raise it; but if they find it necessary, will they not be obliged to pay the price when increased by a small tonnage duty? Will gentlemen contend against me, that the citizens of the United States do not pay the taxes and duties laid by Britain on the articles we consume? They certainly will not do this. Why, then, do they contend that we are to bear the duty of tonnage paid on exportation? The advantages Great Britain derives from our commerce, besides its absolute necessity to her existence, are considerations too important for her to sacrifice for a paltry regulation of fifteen pence a ton upon her shipping, and this is all that the proposed discrimination subjects her to. You have heard it declared, that the number of British vessels are not lessened, although there is a duty of six shillings and eight pence per ton in some of the States. They still find it in their interest to pursue our beneficial commerce. I admit that a tax on tonnage increases the freight, but it is equally certain that the tax, in almost every instance, falls upon the consumer.

Duties on Tonnage.

Our commerce with Spain and Portugal is beneficial, and it may be proper to consider what effects our regulations are likely to produce, as they respect those Powers; but with England we risk nothing. As long as they find it in their interest to continue the American trade, there is no fear of their discontinuing it, and this will be the case as long as we consume her manufactures, and give her in return our produce, which enables her to extend her commerce to other parts of the world.

Mr. WADSWORTH.—I am opposed to all discrimination between foreign nations, unless I can discover some solid reason for the measure. We enjoy equal advantages, with respect to our trade, from those nations that are not in alliance with, as from those to whom we are linked by commercial treaty. Why, therefore, shall we give a preference that may be odious, and draw injurious restrictions upon our commerce? It is to Great Britain that we are indebted for a market for our lumber, our pot and pearl ash, our naval stores, rice, and tobacco; in short they take every thing we have to dispose of except our fish and oil. But our fish finds a better market in countries with whom the United States have no alliance, than in those of Powers in commercial treaty with us; the price is better, and we are better paid. But gentlemen are mistaken when they say that Britain cannot draw her supplies from another quarter. We have several competitors in her market for various articles, and it is the preference they give us in the duties and charges, that renders it unsuccessful on the part of our opponents. It is said that flaxseed cannot be obtained elsewhere; yet gentlemen must recollect that very small supplies, of this article were furnished by America during the war. Britain drew the deficiency from Holland. This proves that their dependence is not exclusively upon us for flaxseed. Is it good policy to deprive ourselves of the advantage which we possess, without a probability of acquiring greater? There is very little prospect of success in a commercial struggle with Britain, and I do not see any great benefits that arise from the trade of our allies that will warrant the sacrifice. It appears to me, that, by making the discrimination now in contemplation, we pay a compliment that is of very little consequence in the estimation of the nation in whose favor it is intended. They employ a very inconsiderable tonnage in the American trade, and those few vessels are all that can receive a profit from the regulations. Besides, it is admitted that the United States have not vessels enough of their own for the transportation of their produce; can it be good policy, then, to destroy a competition among foreigners for the remainder of our carrying trade?

If gentlemen will show me the advantages arising from our commercial connexions where we are bound by treaty, I will join them in a measure which is likely to produce similar effects on other nations; but, when I see no one interest that will be promoted by it, I feel diffident lest we do a substantial injury to the cause we attempt to support.

Mr. CLYMER appealed to the public acts of America for the sentiments of the people respecting a discrimination, from which it would appear that Britain was looked upon in commerce as a hostile nation. But it was the wish of all to increase the intercourse between France and the United States. The little direct trade carried on between that kingdom and America is favorable to us; that to Great Britain the contrary. We receive money for what we carry to France, with which our mercantile operations are increased: we are not paid with rum, as in our British West India trade. This is a fact of notoriety; it has become a subject of complaint in that country, that we take no returns in manufactures from her, as we do from a neighboring nation. These advantages, therefore, backed by the voice of the people, warrant a preference of the nature of what is now intended.

Mr. PAGE was sorry to trouble the House upon this occasion after so much had been said, and he would not have done it, if it had not been that he conceived it proper to notice some remarks which had escaped the gentleman who argued in opposition to the proposed measure. It had been said, that America obtained greater advantages from nations not in commercial alliance with us, than from those that were. He would leave this point to be settled by the gentlemen who had heard the facts stated on both sides, and turn to consider it in another point of view. The committee, when they had this report under consideration, endeavored to adopt a successful mode of raising a revenue. If a duty on tonnage will have this effect, we ought to agree to it; for, to what other subject of revenue can we go that will prove equally productive? It is therefore requisite that we lay this kind of tax; in so doing, if it is necessary to discriminate between our own citizens and foreigners, why is it not likewise proper to discriminate between our commercial friends and commercial enemies? If the policy is good in one case, it is so in the other. We must not only encourage our friends to continue in alliance, but hold out an advantage to those of whom we want a reciprocity. It has always been the practice of that very nation to discriminate who it is suspected will take umbrage at our doing it. Has not Britain laid heavy duties upon the wines of France, and lower on those of Portugal, in order to encourage the trade and commerce of their ally. They have, by this means, made France agree to receive their manufactures. It is the practice of wise nations to adopt regulations of this nature; and most undoubtedly, if any nation on earth has a right to expect a favorable regulation on our side, it is the one that, I may say, has given us the power to deliberate. I conceive such a regulation wise, just, and politic; the contrary policy I view as pusillanimous, founded in folly, injustice, and impolicy. For my part, I wish for greater discrimination than is now proposed. Instead of resting it here, I should have consented to have gone much further. I believe the price of freight has not risen in Virginia, though the British vessels are subjected to a tonnage duty of double the amount of what is now proposed. Something of this nature might give the merchants of America such maritime advantages, that our commerce would shortly be placed on a respectable footing. We might then expect a beneficial treaty to be formed with Britain; and it is my opinion, that if a decisive discrimination was made, we should scarcely pass the act before offers of that kind would be made.

Duties on Tonnage.

[H. or R.]

Mr. JACKSON.—I am in favor of a discrimination, but I like the idea thrown out by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) that the high duty commence its operation at a distant day; but I am not for a very great discrimination. Some gentlemen, who advocate this side of the question, have contended that Great Britain is obliged to receive certain articles from America; and, therefore, if we lay heavy duties upon transportation, they will fall upon the consumer. Now I must beg leave to mention a fact or two in point. In the State of Georgia we have a pretty high tonnage duty, but our produce falls in price. The rice, about two or three years ago, sold for thirteen or fourteen shillings; now it is difficult to procure nine shillings per hundred weight. This proves that these articles are not so necessary to the British subjects as to induce them to give what we ask; therefore, the gentlemen's arguments go too far, when they intend to prove that nation altogether dependent upon us. The prices for the Southern staples are generally lower than what they were before the war; and I am very apprehensive that a high tonnage will reduce them still lower. The tonnage of the State of Georgia is about 20,000 tons, of this, two-thirds are British. If the duty is laid so high as to prevent them from coming amongst us to transport our produce, what is to become of our planters? It is said that this measure will raise us into considerable maritime importance, by making a favorable discrimination. I admit that this may eventually take place, with prudent encouragement; but if, before we have got shipping enough of our own, we discard foreigners, we must injure the husbandman; the profits of his labor must perish upon his hands, for want of the means requisite to convey them to market.

If the tonnage duty is commenced at a distant day I shall favor the sum proposed; but if it is immediately to take place, I should think twenty or twenty-five cents a ton sufficient, and even this ought not to take place before December, 1790. Though I am a friend to discrimination, yet I am opposed to a high duty, until we have vessels enough of our own to answer the purposes of domestic navigation and foreign transportation.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I do not think the regulation in contemplation will embrace the object gentlemen have in view. The discrimination between our own vessels and foreigners is intended to increase the quantity of American tonnage. The discrimination between foreigners is also intended to increase the tonnage of our allies. But will this proposed measure have such effect? I think, for my part, that a preference of twenty cents per ton will not draw vessels belonging to those nations into this branch of commerce, so as to answer the purpose of supplying the deficiency in our means of transportation. If the preference is so small as not to induce their vessels to navigate for us, the means are not proportioned to the end; but if the regulation is to induce Great Britain to grant us reciprocity in commerce, and our trade is of such high importance to that nation, let us adopt measures more effectual than this small discrimination; let us say, that they shall receive no supplies from us but what are conveyed to them in our own bottoms. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FIRZMONGER,) says, it is not true that the freight will reduce the price to the farmer. He supposes the articles of tobacco and rice necessities, and whatever price they are held at must be given for them, and then the whole expense will fall upon the consumer. This proves too much, and consequently proves nothing. Suppose we lay twenty shillings per ton on vessels, it must enter into the price of tobacco and rice, and the articles must still be purchased; yet, if the price is increased, the demand becomes limited. A man does not consume so much when the price of an article is high, as he does when it is moderate; consequently, if the planter was to get his usual profit on what was sold, he would lose on all that remained on hand, owing to the limitation of the demand. The same reasoning holds good with respect to flaxseed, lumber, and potash; at the same time it will be well to consider, whether the increase on the freight will not be such as to prevent our sending them altogether.

The oil at one time imported into France is restricted at another. I am willing to enter into stipulations with that nation for the admission of the article; but, until something is done by treaty on this head, there is no security in the temporary regulations made by that or any other nation. I would not be understood to be against discriminating between ourselves and foreigners. No, sir, I admit the policy and propriety of such a measure, but I contend we ought not to discriminate between foreign nations. As for the claim of gratitude which has been urged, I think it but of small weight. If we are bound, I presume it is by treaty, and whatever we are so bound to do, I cheerfully concur in; but, if we are free, it never can be deemed want of gratitude to decline doing what will be injurious to our interests; it is what a nation has a right to expect from another. The gentlemen say they are sorry to discriminate between Spain and Portugal; they wish to favor these nations: the former has some claim also upon our gratitude; but it is a matter of certainty that those nations will receive an injury by the proposed policy, and it may draw down upon that part of our commerce very inconvenient and injurious restrictions. But say the gentlemen, no general principle can be adopted, and at the same time permit us to accept them. If this be the case, why pursue measures which have this fatal tendency, without any certainty of advantage from another quarter?

Great Britain would not enter into a commercial treaty with us, because she saw we had not power to perform our engagements. If this was the true reason for her declining to form a treaty, there is a high degree of probability, that, now the objection is removed, she may evince a disposition to be bound to us by a link of that nature which we wish. Is it prudent, then, at this time, to defeat the measure we aim at by a paltry regulation aimed against her of fifteen pence per ton? I conceive it is not, and hope the House will reject it.

Mr. MADISON.—I believe a few considerations that lie in a compass, will be sufficient to guide us in our determination on the present occasion. Although it is an old maxim, that trade is best left to regulate itself, yet, circumstances may and do occur to require legislative interference. The principles which have actuated us in laying duties on several articles of import are founded upon this necessity. Our commerce with France and Great Britain may be considered in the same point of view, the one is depressed beyond what its nature deserves, and the other enhanced beyond its due proportion. The justice of this remark is too flagrant to be disputed. A considerable quantity of our produce goes through Great Britain into France; does not this demonstrate that our commerce flows in an improper channel, and calls loudly on us to give it a different direction? I think the good policy of fostering the trade of France cannot be doubted; we must make the other nation feel our power to induce her to grant us reciprocal advantages. Gentlemen will not contend, that we ought to allow her every thing, and trust to her gratitude. They say it is a slender obligation; for my part, I have no hopes from that source; because I have all along observed her seizing to herself every advantage in commerce that presented to her view by all the ingenuity she could devise. Gentlemen admit, that we are now in a different situation from what we were when she declined entering into treaty with us, and they expect she will now come forward with generous offers. But permit me to ask gentlemen, if it is not the same thing whether we want the power or the will to compel them to do us commercial justice? Yet, do not the gentlemen's arguments tend to create an opinion that we have not the power? They caution us to be afraid of reprisals. If she really believes us to be afraid on this head, will she not act in the manner she has hitherto done when we really did not possess the power? When I hear remarks of this nature, the more convinced I am of the necessity there is of making a discrimination to convince her of our power, and make her see that her interest is concerned in being on terms of friendship with us; it will be the most likely way to obtain from her the advantages we contend for. I have no doubt in my own mind but that it will have this effect. Can it be expected that she will shut her ports against us, when she re-exports the greater part of what she takes from us, for instance tobacco? Will she refuse to receive this article, when she does not consume the tenth part of what she carries from the United States? Will she shut her ports to the raw materials necessary for her manufactures? I think her dependence, as a commercial and manufacturing nation, is so absolutely upon us, that it gives a moral certainty that her restrictions will not, for her own sake, be prejudicial to our trade.

Gentlemen who fear any ill effect upon the agricultural interests, apprehend it from a supposition that the discrimination will be high. Now I profess, it is not so much for a high duty as for the policy of the measure that I advocate it. I shall be content with a small preference, and surely no doubt can be entertained of its justice or propriety.

Mr. SHERMAN was opposed to the discrimination. In his opinion, the great principle in making treaties with foreign Powers, was to obtain equal and reciprocal advantages to what were granted, and in all our measures to gain this object the principle ought to be held in view. If the business before the House was examined, it would appear to be rather founded on principles of resentment, because the nation of Great Britain has neglected or declined forming a commercial treaty with us. He did not know that she discriminates between these States and other Powers who are not in treaty with her, and therefore did not call upon us for retaliation; if we are treated in the same manner as those nations we have no right to complain. He was not opposed to particular regulations to obtain the object which the friends of the measure had in view; but he did not like this mode of doing it, because he feared it would injure the interest of the United States.

Before the House adjourned, Mr. MADISON gave notice, that he intended to bring on the subject of amendments to the Constitution, on the 4th Monday of this month.

TUESDAY, May 5.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed to consider of, and report what style or titles it will be proper to annex to the office of President and Vice President of the United States, if any other than those given in the Constitution, and to confer with a committee of the Senate appointed for the same purpose, reported as follows:

"That it is not proper to annex any style or title to the respective styles or titles of office expressed in the Constitution."

And the said report being twice read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed to prepare an Address on the part of this House to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech, to both Houses of Congress, reported as follows:

The Address of the House of Representatives to George Washington, President of the United States.

SIR: The Representatives of the People of the United States present their congratulations on the event by which your fellow-citizens have attested the preference of your merit. You have long held the first place in their esteem. You have often received tokens of their affection. You now possess the only proof that remained of their gratitude for your services, of their reverence for your wisdom, and of their confidence in your virtues. You enjoy the highest, because the truest honor, of being the First Magistrate, by the unanimous choice of the freest people on the face of the earth.

We well know the anxieties with which you must have obeyed a summons from the repose reserved for your declining years, into public scenes, of which you had taken your leave for ever. But the obedience was due to the occasion. It is already applauded by the universal joy which welcomes you to your station. And we cannot doubt that it will be rewarded with all the satisfaction with which an ardent love for your fellow-citizens must review successful efforts to promote their happiness.

This anticipation is not justified merely by the past experience of your signal services. It is particularly suggested by the pious impressions under which you mean to commence your administration, and the enlightened maxims by which you mean to conduct it. We feel with you the strongest obligations to adore the visible hand which has led the American people through so many difficulties, to cherish a conscious responsibility for the destiny of republican liberty; and to seek the only sure means of preserving and recommending the precious deposit in a system of legislation founded on the principles of an honest policy, and directed by the spirit of a diffusive patriotism.

The question arising out of the fifth article of the Constitution will receive all the attention demanded by its importance; and will, we trust, be decided, under the influence of all the considerations to which you allude.

In forming the pecuniary provisions for the Executive Department, we shall not lose sight of a wish resulting from motives which give it a peculiar claim to our regard. Your resolution, in a moment critical to the liberties of your country, to renounce all personal emolument, was among the many presages of your patriotic services, which have been amply fulfilled; and your scrupulous adherence now to the law then imposed on yourself, cannot fail to demonstrate the purity, whilst it increases the lustre of a character which has so many titles to admiration.

Such are the sentiments which we have thought fit to address to you. They flow from our own hearts, and we verily believe that, among the millions we represent, there is not a virtuous citizen whose heart will disown them.

All that remains is, that we join in your fervent supplications for the blessings of Heaven on our country; and that we add our own for the choicest of these blessings on the most beloved of our citizens.

Said Address was committed to a Committee of the Whole; and the House immediately resolved itself into a committee. Mr. PAGE in the Chair. The committee proposing no amendment thereto, rose and reported the Address, and the House agreed to it, and resolved that the SPEAKER, attended by the members of this House, do present the said Address to the PRESIDENT.

Ordered, That Messrs. SINICKSON, COLES, and SMITH, (of South Carolina,) be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT, to know when it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

Mr. CLYMER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill for laying a duty on goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, which passed its first reading.

Mr. BLAND presented to the House the following application from the Legislature of Virginia, to wit:

VIRGINIA, to wit:

IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, Nov. 14, 1788.

Resolved, That an application be made in the name and on behalf of the Legislature of this Commonwealth to the Congress of the United States, in the words following, to wit:

"The good People of this Commonwealth in Convention assembled, having ratified the Constitution submitted to their consideration, this Legislature has, in conformity to that act, and the resolutions of the United States in Congress assembled, to them transmitted, thought proper to make the arrangements that were necessary for carrying it into effect. Having thus shown themselves obedient to the voice of their constituents, all America will find that, so far as it depended on them, that plan of Government will be carried into immediate operation."

"But the sense of the people of Virginia would be but in part complied with, and but little regarded, if we went no farther. In the very moment of adoption, and coeval with the ratification of the new plan of Government, the general voice of the Convention of this State pointed to objects no less interesting to the people we represent, and equally entitled to our attention. At the same time that, from motives of affection to our sister States, the Convention yielded their assent to the ratification, they gave the most unequivocal proofs that they dreaded its operation under the present form."

"In acceding to the Government under this impression, painful must have been the prospect, had they not derived consolation from a full expectation of its imperfections being speedily amended. In this resource, therefore, they placed their confidence, a confidence that will continue to support them, whilst they have reason to believe that they have not calculated upon it in vain."

"In making known to you the objections of the people of this Commonwealth to the new plan of Government, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a particular detail of its defects, which they consider as involving all the great and unalienable rights of freemen. For their sense on this subject, we beg leave to refer you to the proceedings of their late Convention, and the sense of the House of Delegates, as expressed in their resolutions of the thirtieth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight."

"We think proper, however, to declare, that, in our opinion, as those objections were not founded in speculative theory, but deduced from principles which have been established by the melancholy example of other nations in different ages, so they will never be removed, until the cause itself shall cease to exist. The sooner, therefore, the public apprehensions are quieted, and the Government is possessed of the confidence of the people, the more salutary will be its operations, and the longer its duration."

"The cause of amendments we consider as a common cause; and, since concessions have been made from political motives, which, we conceive, may endanger the Republic, we trust that a commendable zeal will be shown for obtaining those provisions, which experience has taught us are necessary to secure from danger the unalienable rights of human nature."

"The anxiety with which our countrymen press for the accomplishment of this important end, will ill admit of delay. The slow forms of Congressional discussion and recommendation, if, indeed, they should ever agree to any change, would, we fear, be less certain of success. Happily for their wishes, the Constitution hath presented an alternative, by admitting the submission to a convention of the States. To this, therefore, we resort as the source from whence they are to derive relief from their present apprehensions."

"We do, therefore, in behalf of our constituents, in the most earnest and solemn manner, make this application to Congress, that a convention be immediately called, of deputies from the several States, with full power to take into their consideration the defects of this Constitution that have been suggested by the State Conventions, and report such amendments thereto as they shall find best suited to promote our common interests, and secure to ourselves and our latest posterity the great and unalienable rights of mankind."

"JOHN JONES, Speaker Senate.
"THOMAS MATTHEWS, Speaker Ho. Del."

After the reading of this application, sons be properly weighed, unless it be done in committee? Therefore, I hope the House will agree to refer it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON thought it proper to let the application remain on the table, it can be called up with others when enough are presented to make two-thirds of the whole States. There would be an evident impropriety in committing, because it would argue a right in the House to deliberate, and, consequently, a power to procrastinate the measure applied for.

Mr. TUCKER thought it not right to disregard the application of any State, and inferred that the House had a right to consider every application that was made; if two-thirds had not applied, the subject might be taken into consideration, but if two-thirds had applied, it precluded deliberation on the part of the House. He hoped the present application would be properly noticed.

Mr. GERRY.—The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) told us yesterday, that he meant to move the consideration of amendments on the fourth Monday of this month; he did not make such motion then, and may be prevented by accident, or some other cause, from carrying his intention into execution, when the time he mentioned shall arrive. I think the subject, however, is introduced to the House, and, perhaps, it may consist with order to let the present application lie on the table until the business is taken up generally.

Mr. PAGE thought it the best way to enter the application at large upon the Journals, and do the same by all that came in, until sufficient were made to obtain their object, and let the original be deposited in the archives of Congress. He deemed this the proper mode of disposing of it, and what is in itself proper can never be construed into disrespect.

Mr. BLAND acquiesced in this disposal of the application. Whereupon, it was ordered to be entered at length on the Journals, and the original to be placed on the files of Congress.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in relation to the duty on tonnage.

Mr. JACKSON (from Georgia) moved to lower the tonnage duty from thirty cents, as it stood in the report of the committee, on ships of nations in alliance, and to insert twenty cents, with a view of reducing the tonnage on the vessels of Powers not in alliance. In laying a higher duty on foreign tonnage than on our own, I presume, said he, the Legislature have three things in contemplation: first, The encouragement of American shipping; secondly, Raising a revenue; and, thirdly, The support of light-houses and beacons for the purposes of navigation. Now, for the first object, namely, the encouragement of American shipping, I judge twenty cents will be sufficient, the duty on our own being only six cents; but if twenty cents are laid in this case, I conclude that a higher rate will be imposed upon the vessels of nations not in alliance. As these form the principal part of the foreign navigation, the duty will be adequate to the end proposed. I take it, the idea of revenue from this source is not much relied upon by the House; and surely twenty cents is enough to answer all the purposes of erecting and supporting the necessary light-houses. On a calculation of what will be paid in Georgia, I find a sufficiency for these purposes; and I make no doubt but enough will be collected in every State from this duty. The tonnage employed in Georgia is about twenty thousand tons, fourteen thousand tons are foreign; the duty on this quantity will amount to £466 13s. 4d. Georgia currency. I do not take in the six cents upon American vessels, yet this sum appears to be as much as can possibly be wanted for the purpose of improving our navigation.

When we begin a new system, we ought to act with moderation; the necessity and propriety of every measure ought to appear evident to our constituents, to prevent clamor and complaint. I need not insist upon the truth of this observation by offering arguments in its support. Gentlemen see we are scarcely warm in our seats, before applications are made for amendments to the Constitution; the people are afraid that Congress will exercise their power to oppress them. If we shackle the commerce of America by heavy impost, we shall rivet them in their distrust. The question before the committee appears to me to be, whether we shall draw in, by tender means, the States that are now out of the Union, or deter them from joining us, by holding out the iron hand of tyranny and oppression. I am for the former, as the most likely way of perpetuating the Federal Government. North Carolina will be materially affected by a high tonnage; her vessels in the lumber trade will be considerably injured by the regulation; she will discover this, and examine the advantages and disadvantages of entering into the Union. If the disadvantages preponderate, it may be the cause of her throwing herself into the arms of Britain; her peculiar situation will enable her to injure the trade of both South Carolina and Georgia. The disadvantages of a high tonnage duty on foreign vessels are not so sensibly felt by the northern States; they have nearly vessels enough of their own to carry on all their trade, consequently, the loss sustained by them will be but small; but the southern States employ mostly foreign shipping, and unless their produce is carried by them to market it will perish. At this moment there are not only rice and lumber, but five thousand hogheads of tobacco lying in the warehouses for want of shipping. Gentlemen may talk of raising a maritime force, and increasing the number of our commercial vessels; but what is to be done in the mean time with the products of agriculture? They must be laid up to rot in warehouses; they must wait till a future day before they can be disposed of; the poor planters are to suffer this inconvenience for a few years, to increase the building of ships. Persecuted as these men are by British tyrants, in the shape of creditors, we are about to impel them to certain destruction. Every artifice was used, every net was spread, to involve them in this dilemma. Courtied by luxury, which exposed all its charms to impassion their souls, and prompted on by the flattering terms of obtaining a gratification of their wishes by a long credit, these men have put themselves into the power of commercial harpies. At length, roused from their lethargy, they have made exertions to disentangle themselves. The sale of their produce has hitherto enabled them to avoid the most dreadful evils; but take this out of their power, and there remains nothing to save them from the loathsome dungeon, and their families from perishing for want of the common necessities of life. Then may the people of the State of Georgia have reason to repent the prompt and decided part they have taken in this second revolution. Disappointed in that relief which they expected from a general and efficient Government, they will only have to seek obscurity and a wretched existence in some remote corner of the land, despairing of ever obtaining hereafter the wonted comforts and enjoyments of life.

I shall just mention to the House one observation more, to show that the produce of the Southern States cannot bear a high tonnage duty. The value of rice, tobacco, and indigo, has fallen so much in foreign markets, that they are no longer worth the exportation. The merchants complain that they lose by those remittances; and they have now got into the practice of sending off specie; forty thousand dollars have been sent in one vessel. This is a daily practice, and we shall shortly have no specie left to pay our debts. The difficulty will be increased, as no money will remain to pay for the duties imposed on the articles imported. I hope the Government will not insist upon our walking before we are able to creep, or compel us to make bricks without straw. These are my sentiments on the present question; if they have weight, the House will agree with me in reducing the duty; but if the House persist in continuing the high rates agreed to in committee, I shall content myself with having done my duty by warning them of the danger.

Mr. Ames.—I hope the reduction moved for by the gentleman who has just sat down will not be agreed to; for I trust the House is not satisfied with the reasons offered in its support. A great deal has been now said respecting the jealousy entertained of the advantages given by this preference to some States; a great deal was also said before the committee adopted the measure. I do not think this doctrine of jealousy is natural to us. I know it has been cultivated by the British, and disseminated through the United States; they had their particular views in exciting such ideas; but I do not believe that because we have various we have opposite interests. Upon examination there will be found but few of our interests that clash with each other so much as to admit a well grounded jealousy. Nature has so arranged our circumstances, that the people of the several States pursue various employments which support each other. If one end of the continent is employed in manufactures and commerce, the other is attentive to agriculture; so far are they, therefore, from being rivals, that, both in a natural and political sense, they mutually are necessary and beneficial to each other's interests. I wish gentlemen, before they insist upon this jealousy, would point out the causes of its existence. So far from this being the case, I believe the individual interest of each part is compatible with the general interest; and that the public opinion is the same, is clearly demonstrated by the attachment professed by every part to remain in union—it is acknowledged that on this principle our existence as a nation depends.

This being the case, I do not listen with any great degree of concern to arguments founded on that cause. So far from surveying the affluence or ease of my Southern brethren with the jaundiced eye of jealousy, I contemplate their prosperity with ineffable satisfaction. I look with an equal eye upon the success of every State through the whole extent of United America. I wish their interests to be equally consulted; and, if I may judge of the feelings of the people, by those of their representatives on this floor, I may venture to say, there was never less reason to apprehend discord or envy than at this time. I believe the fact is so, because I feel it. I appeal with confidence to the gentlemen round me, whether they have not found the disposition of those who were suspected most to favor navigation, ready to concede what was asked for the encouragement of every other interest? Whether a like conciliatory conduct has not been observed by the advocates of manufactures? I ask gentlemen whether the language they have heard from the several parts of this House has not been much more congenial to their sentiments than they expected, and the measures pursued more coincident to their feelings than what they looked for? I believe, at the moment I am making this observation, the breasts of gentlemen beat in concert with it. I am sure my feelings accord most cordially in the sentiment.

I believe the encouragement of our navigation is looked upon to be indispensably necessary; its importance has never been denied. Now, I ask if gentlemen are inclined to support and extend our navigation, whether they are not willing to proportion the means to the end, and adopt measures tending to increase the quantity of American shipping? It has been often justly remarked, that the Constitution under which we deliberate originated in commercial necessity. The mercantile part of our fellow-citizens, who are the firm friends to an equal and energetic Government, hope the improvement of our navigation may obtain the attention of Congress; it is but justice that it be early attended to, and it will give general satisfaction to find it considered as an important object by the General Government. The most liberal of the friends of American commerce only wish for such regulations as may put our navigation on a footing with foreigners. If other nations have restricted our navigation by regulations or charges, we must restrict them by a tonnage, or some other duty, so as to restore an equality; but this will not be found to be the case in the present instance. The moderate and inconsiderable duty of thirty cents on foreigners in treaty, and fifty cents on others not in treaty, will not enable our vessels to go abroad with as much advantage as foreigners can come here; so that the proposed encouragement may perhaps fall short of procuring us a maritime strength equal to our national security.

Duties on Tonnage.

[H. or R.]

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Jackson) says, that five thousand hogsheads of tobacco are now rotting in the warehouses for want of ships to carry them to market. If this is the case, it proves we have depended long enough upon foreigners to supply us with the means of transportation; let us now make some provision that will prevent the like taking place again. If proper encouragement is now given, we may perhaps in a short time have enough of shipping to supply all the States. If the productions of another year must lie in the planters' hands, they will feel a greater loss and inconvenience than the payment of half a dollar additional freight per ton, if it was certain that they would be subjected to such a burden.—Judge from this circumstance whether there is a competition of interests in the United States. Does not the contrary appear to be the fact? Gentlemen will please to consider how unfavorable it is to commerce, to have the success of their business depend upon the caprice or mercy of any foreign nation. If your produce is to lie till they come to carry it away, you cannot be said to have the command of your property, or possess those advantages which the bounty of nature has given you. How much better is it to go with vessels of our own in search of a market, than to wait for others to take our produce away until it perishes on our hands? Let me ask gentlemen if they think the produce of Massachusetts would be sold if we were unable to seek a market for ourselves? Would foreigners come to New England in search of our whale oil and fish? No, foreigners are hostile to our fisheries; so far from encouraging us, by buying what we have for sale, they wish and labor to destroy our trade; their attempts are defeated by our ability to go abroad and seek a market for ourselves. This demonstrates clearly that, in order to extend the sale of our productions, we must have vessels of our own to find out a market, and be guided by actual experience to that which is best.

The observations of gentlemen tending to show that one end of the continent will suffer more by the regulation contemplated by the House than the other, are, I conceive, not well founded. The price of freight will equalize itself. If the people of Carolina or Georgia pay a high freight in consequence of the tonnage duty, the State of Massachusetts must pay the same, or her vessels will go to the southward in search of freight, so that the Eastern States have no peculiar interest in the measure. It has been suggested, that because Massachusetts has foreign vessels in her employ, she cannot transport produce for others—Massachusetts, by reason of that influence which Britain has, is obliged to receive some of her supplies in foreign bottoms, but this is only a proof that the evil requires a remedy. I might here easily draw a picture of the distress to which the eastern country is subjected for want of a protecting hand; her shipwrights are glad to work for two shillings and sixpence a day, or less, and less will not maintain them and their families. Their lumber is of no value, it lies rotting in the forests, for want of encouragement to frame it into ships; the other artisans are clamorous for employment, and without a speedy relief they will have to desert the country. I believe if this relief is extended to them, it will give a spring to their industry, and a little time will render them serviceable to their fellow-citizens in the South. They will find markets for their tobacco which is now rotting, and their valuable productions will be transported to all parts of the globe. From these circumstances, I am led to beg gentlemen to consider, that the improvement and extension of our navigation is one of the most important objects that can come before the Legislature; that there are abundant proofs that a regulation in favor of American shipping is absolutely necessary to restore them to an equality with foreigners; and if they are convinced with me of its importance and necessity, they will not think the sums agreed to in committee too high for the purpose of protecting the navigation of the United States.

Mr. Jackson.—I said, Mr. Speaker, that there was a considerable quantity of tobacco lying in our warehouses, for want of vessels to carry it off. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Ames) says, that if this is the case, it is time to take the staff into our own hands, and encourage the growth of American vessels. Yes, sir, but let us see the American ships, and then I will consent not only to fifty cents per ton, but to a total prohibition of foreigners. But I say again, do not compel us to make bricks without straw, nor oblige us to carry off our produce without shipping; if Massachusetts has not shipping enough for her own use, she can furnish none for the use of others.

Mr. Ames was obliged to the gentleman for his offer to exclude foreigners, but he did not wish to go so far. He had hoped that a shorter period than gentlemen seemed to contemplate, would be sufficient to improve the navigation of the United States, and expected every State as well as Massachusetts would be able to transport a great part of its own productions.

Mr. Burke.—Something has been said relative to a jealousy subsisting in the Southern States respecting the navigation interest; I shall, therefore, make an observation or two on that subject. So far as my own knowledge of that country goes, I believe the citizens look with indignation at the power which foreigners have over their commerce. So far from being jealous of the Eastern States, they look forward to some future day when their navigation will be secured to that part of the Union. They know that it possesses superior maritime advantages, and expect they will hereafter afford security to them. They know, that from the spirit and industry of the people of New England, they may derive commercial and agricultural benefits. This is also my own judgment on the point. I know they cannot now supply us with vessels to transport our produce, but I hope the time will shortly come when they will have the ability; in the mean time, when I consider how much the Southern staples are fallen in price, and the great debts due in that country, I must say, that I fear a heavy tonnage will be attended with very dangerous consequences. There are very few foreigners but British come among us, and a high duty laid upon their ships will fall severely upon the planters. The Southern people are willing to render any assistance to increase the maritime importance of the Eastern States as soon as they are able; if, therefore, a distant period is fixed for the commencement of the high duties, I shall be in favor of them; but if they are to take place immediately, I fear they will do a great deal of injury in the present deranged and calamitous situation of our country.

Duties on Tonnage.

Mr. GOUGH was glad to hear from the several parts of the House, that there was a disposition to give a preference to American shipping. This principle being fixed, it only remained for the House to ascertain the proper degree of encouragement to be given; the rate agreed to in the committee was not more than good policy required. The gentleman from Georgia fears that the people of his State will suffer for want of vessels, or pay a higher freight than their neighbors; but a high duty is not contended for in the first instance, it is only such a degree of encouragement with foreigners in our own carrying trade. The same gentleman has said, Massachusetts has not vessels enough for her own commerce, and therefore cannot furnish any for others; although Massachusetts employs 7 or 8000 tons of foreign shipping; yet it is supposed she supplied the other States with 30,000 tons. The circumstance of 5,000 hogheads of tobacco lying rot for want of vessels, when some thousand tons of ours are idle for want of employment, does not prove the want of shipping, so much as that the price of the article is too high for a foreign market. If the produce is held so high as not to bear the expense of transportation, the merchants who import will be obliged to send off money in payment. In order to remedy these inconveniences in future, it will be necessary to hold out sufficient encouragement for the construction of vessels. Perhaps it may be good policy to allow a moderate tonnage duty at this time, to be increased hereafter.

Mr. MADISON.—I believe every gentleman who hears the observations from the different quarters of this House, discovers great reason for every self upon the evident disposition which has been displayed to conduct our business with harmony and concert.

We have evinced a disposition different from what was expected to arise from the different interests of the several parts of the Union. I am persuaded, that less contrariety of sentiment has taken place than was supposed by gentlemen, who did not choose to magnify the causes of variance; every thing we have hitherto done, tends to make this evident. The importance of the Union is justly estimated by all its parts; the being founded upon a perfect accordance of interest, it may become perpetual. I know that the point before us has often been selected as a proof that there was an incompatibility of interest in the United States. On this opinion I beg leave to remark, that the difference in point of capacity in the several States to build ships and furnish seamen, is much less than has generally been supposed. From the extremity of the Northern States until we reach South Carolina, materials of all sorts for ship-building can be obtained in abundance from the bounty of nature; even Georgia abounds with materials of superior quality; although their population disqualifies them for ship-building at present, yet their advantages are such as to enable them in a short time to rival the most prosperous State. In the next place, I may remark, that so far as the encouragement of our own shipping will be given at the expense of the people of the United States, it will diffuse and equalize its operations in every part. The ships belonging to one place will, like the people, seek employment in another where better wages are obtained, and this, in its operations, will level any inequalities supposed to arise from legislative interference.

With respect to the particular article before the House, I do not think it requires the discussion that has been gone into. If we consider the small proportion of shipping belonging to nations in commercial alliance with the United States, a duty of thirty cents per ton will be found to affect, in a very small degree, the interest of any particular State; if it increases a supply from that quarter, the burden will lighten in proportion. With respect to the clause which follows, I have in view to make a proposition to obviate the complaints of the Southern States. I mean that the duty shall be light until the 1st of January, 1791, when it shall be increased; this will give a considerable opportunity for those States that are able, to make gradual preparations to fill up the vacancy that will be left by the withdrawing of foreigners. The more I have been able to collect and compare facts, with respect to American and foreign shipping, the more I am persuaded that it is in our power, in a very short time, to supply all the tonnage necessary for our own commerce. It was said, that the foreign tonnage consisted of two-thirds of what we employed; the facts before me warrant a result more favorable to the navigation of America. It appears from the returns of Massachusetts, that she employs in her commerce 76,857 tons of American, and but 8,794 foreign; New York, 55,000 American, and 30,000 foreign; Pennsylvania, 44,089 tons of her own vessels, and 28,012 belonging to various other nations; Maryland gives employment to 35,671 tons, the property of citizens of the United States, and 26,061 belonging to foreigners; Virginia employs rather more foreign vessels, namely, 29,567 tons, and less American, viz. 26,705; South Carolina has engaged in her trade 31,904 American, and 25,073 foreign; and Georgia employs but 6,500 American, and 13,500 foreign; so that, besides this latter, no State employs so great a proportion as two-thirds of foreigners. New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Delaware, I have not been able to ascertain, but I think there is good reason to believe, that the proportion in those States is considerably in favor of American vessels.

The tonnage employed in the seven States I have enumerated, amounts to 437,641 tons, of which 160,907 are all that is owned by foreigners. If I can draw any conclusion from this statement of facts, it is that we have a greater proportion of shipping than has been supposed. This circumstance, annexed to our capacity of increasing the quantity of our tonnage, gives us a favorable presage of our future independence.

It has been said that the Eastern States have not vessels to transport our produce. I believe, from a variety of circumstances, that the vessels of Massachusetts have not been so readily employed in the Southern commerce as could be wished. This will, perhaps, continue to be the case, except our own citizens carry on our trade. At present, it is almost exclusively in the hands of British merchants, and as long as their vessels are upon an equality with ours, they will naturally be inclined to give a preference to their own; but I hope to see this matter soon rectified, and the citizens of one State enabled to assist those of another, and receive mutual benefits and advantages. To accomplish this without doing an injury to any part of the Union, I would propose to reduce the duty only to 25 cents, and increase it at the end of the next year to 60 cents.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina).—I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that on the question of interest with respect to the navigation law, the interests of the Northern and Southern States are more at variance than gentlemen seem apprised of. In my opinion, it would be the interest of the Southern States to give a bounty upon tonnage. In the opinion of the gentlemen from the northward, it is proper to lay a heavy duty. To be sure, I must acknowledge the liberality of gentlemen in not going quite so far as their interest would seem to lead them, but I fear they go farther than will serve the interest of the Southern States. The State of South Carolina is in a very deplorable condition from the ravages of the late war; the inhabitants were mostly plundered of the conveniences and necessities of life; they had to incur considerable debts in consequence; but very heavy debts existed before the war, subject to an interest of 8 per cent. The State is also considerably in debt, the domestic debt alone amounts to a million sterling, and there will be no way to pay this off but by recourse to direct taxation. The State owes to foreigners about one hundred thousand pounds sterling, which must be paid in specie, and also raised by direct taxation. Under these circumstances, the people must endeavor to obtain the best price for their produce; any measure, therefore, that tends to diminish that price will add to their embarrassment.

Gentlemen tell us of the quantity of American ships we may expect, of the low price of labor, and the superabundance of materials to construct them; that they can probably be built at this time for half of what the British build theirs; yet they do not come much among us. Our foreign transportation is made principally in British vessels; indeed, we are at the mercy of foreigners in this particular, and unless they come to us we must be ruined; it would be unwise, therefore, to adopt a measure that would amount to a prohibition. The American tonnage employed in South Carolina has been stated at 31,904 tons, but it is to be considered that these are principally coasting vessels, carrying little or none of our produce, and that they enter eight or ten times in a year. This reduces the apparent quantity to a very inconsiderable actual amount, and leaves us more dependent upon foreigners than we appeared on the first view to be. When these circumstances are duly weighed, I hope gentlemen will not attribute it to a want of liberality in the Southern States, because they are not willing to go so far with them as to destroy the agriculture of their country.

I have some doubts in opposing my judgment to gentlemen who have better information; but, so far as I am able to form an opinion, I think the demand for the rice of South Carolina will depend upon the price, and that the freight which is paid for taking it to market will fall upon the shipper. Rice is carried to those countries where it will come cheaper than the grain used for bread. Great Britain takes considerable quantities of rice, but it is not for her own consumption; she seeks out markets of this kind, and disposes of it to a profit, to pay her circuitous freight. She will not be able to continue this traffic if she has to pay us half a dollar duty; for whatever is added to the freight must be taken off the commodity. The planter will have to lower his price, or the exportation must be cut off. If this be the case, it is evident that a duty on navigation is against the interest of South Carolina and all the agricultural States. I think we have already shown sufficient attention to the manufacturing States, by the impost duties which are agreed to. Gentlemen will please to remember that the revenue from most of the articles that are taxed will be drawn from the Southern States. We must give an increased price for our necessary supplies, or refrain from their consumption; or we must part with our productions at a less rate. This will be an evil we are unable to sustain in our present distressed condition. You will consider again, if the consumption of the imports is lessened, there will be less reason for British ships to come to us. If the quantity of tonnage is diminished, I need not repeat to the House the consequences. The British merchants will hardly send their ships in ballast to South Carolina for the sake of carrying our produce; the principal reason why we have the advantage of their trade is because we take their manufactures and give our produce in exchange. It is said we ought to encourage our allies to come among us and participate in our trade. I do not think the difference proposed between foreign nations can accomplish this object. Nothing less than a duty equal to a prohibition on British ships can do it. Our connections are kept up with them by the vast debts due to her merchants and factors; it is their policy to continue us in these commercial fetters. Year after year they import fresh cargoes, and give us credit for the articles we want, taking from time to time our produce in payment. Nothing, therefore, will be a complete remedy, unless you can prevent the consumption of British goods. I believe the people of South Carolina are willing to make sacrifices to encourage the manufacturing and maritime interests of their sister States; but I hope gentlemen will not press the matter too far, and while they are securing advantages to themselves bear too hard upon others. I wish, therefore, for their consent to reduce the tonnage on the vessels of our allies to twenty cents, and on British bottoms to thirty cents. But if gentlemen persist in keeping up the rate laid in the committee it will be injurious to the trade of the Southern States generally, and oppressive to the planters in particular, who have not yet recovered from the losses and misfortunes entailed upon them by having their country the seat of war. The distress of the inhabitants of South Carolina has been extreme; it has engaged them to pass a law of a questionable, not to say false policy. But the time is now come to prevent a repetition of the measure; yet their debts must be paid; and it is well known that they have not a farthing of specie circulating among them, by reason of a depreciated paper medium from ten to fifteen per cent. below par. How, then, can they ever look for ease or content but by getting a good price as a reward for their industry? If the Government prevent by this heavy tonnage duty, they must be answerable for the consequences.

Duties on Tonnage.

Mr. GOODRICH had no intention to injure the interest of the Southern States. He was sorry for their distresses, and wished every encouragement and protection should be given them. With a view, therefore, of obviating the inconveniences suspected by gentlemen, he would second the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) if the gentleman would bring it forward, relative to adding a distant day for the high duties to commence their operation.

Mr. BOWDITCH—I look upon this subject as of considerable importance to the prosperity and welfare of the United States; of considerable importance as it affects the interests of the individual States. Whenever I speak of trade, I must own that I feel as if I were out of my element. I can only form my opinion, and determine from such facts as are before me, and the information I get from gentlemen on the floor. I take it the object in view is to raise a revenue for the support of your Government, and that it must be obtained from one quarter or another; it must either come from an impost on goods, a duty on tonnage, or from direct taxes laid upon the citizens of the Union. We all seem to agree that, where it can be done with propriety, it is most eligible to take it from trade. Under these impressions, we agreed to an impost upon goods, wares, and merchandise. I believe there is no gentleman but would give up every restraint upon commerce, if it were possible to do so without encumbering it with protecting regulations. Then, with respect to the proposed duty on tonnage, it will be necessary to ask if it be reasonable in itself, and such as will, in an adequate degree, supply the wants of the Union, without adding too much to the embarrassments which trade labors under? For my part, I conceive the best evidence on this point the House is in possession of arises from the conduct of the different States throughout the Union. It will appear, by referring to their laws, that they have generally adopted the idea of discrimination, and often laid it upon the tonnage. Pennsylvania has laid a duty per ton on vessels of nations in treaty, and a much higher one on those who are not in treaty. Maryland has laid 1s. 8d. per ton on those in treaty, and 2s. 8d. on those who are not in treaty, except British. The British vessels pay 6s. 8d. besides two per cent. on goods imported therein, over and above what is paid by others. Virginia lays 3s. 6d. upon those in treaty, and 6s. 6d. their money, on the nations not in treaty, besides the addition of two per cent. ad valorem on all merchandise so imported. Carolina lays a duty of 2s. 9d. sterling upon British sugars, and 1s. 8d. only on those of other nations. This duty, both in principle and consequence, is the same as the one now under consideration. These duties upon the vessels of foreigners in alliance with us average about 2s. 6d. per ton; consequently, we are within the mark when we propose thirty cents, or a sum equal to about 2s. 3d. This being the case, I should conceive, if there be no further objection, that a duty of thirty cents was just and reasonable, and could not have a bad effect in any part of the United States. But gentlemen have stated objections from the peculiar circumstances of some of the States. These objections ought to be attended to, and seriously considered. The spirit of accommodation evinced by both sides of the House is really a subject of congratulation, and gentlemen will not press hard for a measure that militates against the interest of others. The State of South Carolina requires us to be tender, with regard to her, in this instance. She wishes to emancipate herself from the slavery in which, by adventitious circumstances, she is entangled.

Now, sir, I am of opinion that the true way to enable her to regain her strength and vigor would be to render her independent of the attendance of foreigners upon her. I think, too, that it might be done in a little time; because, under a small encouragement, our navigation would grow up, so that her sister States might supply her with vessels enough. With this assistance she would soon clear herself of her incumbrances. When she comes to consider the present regulation in this point of view, she will be satisfied with it, although it may seem to bear a little hard at first. To prove that these expectations are not chimerical, I need only mention the present situation of our India trade, a commerce of but yesterday, and yet there are no less than forty-seven sail of vessels, at this moment, on voyages to and from that country. If these go so far in search of freight, I should imagine employment nearer home would be more agreeable. I think nothing but an imposition on foreign shipping, equal to what the Americans sustain in other countries, can enable us to be a maritime nation; and, without this, the abundance nature has lavished upon us will be of little avail. But these advantages ought to be grasped at with caution. I would not materially injure any State by our regulations, if the object could be accomplished by other means. I am willing to go so far with the gentlemen as to reduce the duty to twenty-five cents, but to increase it hereafter in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON.) This, I take it, will furnish us with a considerable revenue; and as the quantity of foreign shipping decreases, the revenue will still be the same, by an increase of the rate of tonnage; it will also be serving the Southern States, which I am willing on every occasion to do, as far as good policy admits.

Mr. TUCKER.—It appears to me that we should rather study to give relief to the citizens of the United States than to add to their burdens. If we inquire particularly into the measure now before the House we shall find it will be very burdensome, and one that will bear unequally. It will be harder upon some States than on others, and some will not at all be affected by it. Those States that have ships of their own pay but six cents per ton upon what they use; others who have none are obliged to pay a much greater proportion towards the revenue, while it is a principle that all duties shall be equal. The exports of South Carolina are more bulky, and consequently employ a greater quantity of tonnage than the Eastern States. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) favored us with a statement of the tonnage employed in seven of the United States: it amounted to 437,000 tons. The proportion employed by South Carolina, by his statement, is about 60,000 tons; and this appears from the returns of the custom-house of the port of Charleston alone. There are other ports in South Carolina: the tonnage employed therein amounts to several thousand tons more than stated. This, too, was a report for the year 1787, since which time our exports have increased considerably. Certainly the quantity of rice made and exported last year is twenty or thirty thousand tierces more than was shipped the year before; of course there must be more shipping employed now than there was then. These considerations may justly be allowed to increase the proportion of the tonnage of South Carolina to 70,000 tons. Then is 70,000 tons to 437,000 the proportion by which she is represented in this House. The representation of that State is one-thirteenth part of the whole, but the revenue she is to contribute is in the ratio of a sixth or a seventh. Now, on this calculation, it appears she pays a tonnage duty nearly equal to double what could be required of her by direct taxation.

Gentlemen have shown themselves extremely tenacious whenever they apprehended their States were likely to suffer more from a regulation than others. I do not mean to reflect upon them for this conduct. They may suppose themselves better acquainted with the local circumstances and ability of their immediate constituents than other gentlemen are, and can foresee the probable effects better. Under these impressions they give opposition. They not only have a right to do so, but it is their duty, and they would be blamable if they did not. I do the same on this occasion, on the same principle.

It ought to be considered, further, that the States who have no shipping of their own, pay the duty to go out of their States, because the price of freight will be the same for American shipping as for foreign. The duty on the whole quantum will be paid, but a great proportion does not go into the public treasury; it goes into the pockets of the owners of American vessels.

It has been observed, that the exports of this country cannot be obtained from any other quarter, and it is inferred therefrom, that, however much we increase the price, it must be paid by the consumer. The weight of the observation has been in a great measure removed by the remarks of several gentlemen, but I do not think the inference is fairly drawn. It is a fact, that the merchants who have had this produce, have not been able to increase the demand: so far from it, in some years they have lost thirty or forty per cent. by the business. This, then, is a proof that the burden falls upon the planter, and not on the consumer. The quantity we send to market must be used: the price depends upon the quantity and demand. As a further proof, I need only mention, that last year there was more rice exported from South Carolina than in former years, and the price at Charleston fell from 14s. to 10s. per cwt.

By these observations, I have only attempted to show the effects of a general regulation; but if any discrimination takes place, and bears exclusively upon particular States, the measure most undoubtedly becomes more exceptionable. The discrimination on shipping will certainly raise the freight to the amount of the highest duty. Both American vessels and those of our allies will take advantage of the situation of South Carolina, and receive the same sum from as the British, who pay a considerable part of it into the treasury. From some accounts of the custom-house, it appears that the tonnage employed at Charleston amounts to 62,000 tons; add the tonnage of the other ports, as I said before, and it will be 70,000. Gentlemen have contended that two-thirds of our shipping are American. If their proportions are just, then South Carolina will have to pay the highest tonnage we lay on the whole 70,000 tons she employs. Consequently two-thirds of this sum are given as a bounty to American shipping; and but one-third goes into the treasury to increase the revenue. Then it appears that the object of the tonnage duty is not so much to raise revenue, as to give encouragement to the shipping of the other States. The Northern States will pay none of these burdens, if they export their produce in their own bottoms, or if it should happen that the owners of ships take the advantage of the high duty. The consequence will be, that they only pay a bounty to their own shipping, and the money does not go out of their State; but when it is paid by the Southern States, it goes for the benefit of others, out of the country, never to return.

The gentleman from Jersey (Mr. BOURNOR) has made some calculation of the tonnage duties under the former Confederation, and it appears to him from thence, that the States are willing to come into a tonnage duty nearly to the same amount of what is now proposed. That this is every where the case I deny. But admitting it, for argument's sake, to be as he has said, that all the States have laid duties of this nature, it only proves two things: first, that they were in a state of independence, at liberty to do what they pleased in their own ports; and secondly, that the duties or impost so collected continued in their treasury for their own use and convenience. It was a matter of no small consequence whether the supplies were obtained in this way or another, for it was only a transfer from one tax to another; it was paid to the State, and did not leave the country. The Southern States are willing to submit to the inconvenience of a general regulation of commerce; but let them not bear an undue proportion of the burden. They are willing to accede to something further for the encouragement of American navigation; twenty cents on one class of foreigners, and thirty on another, will give the shipping of the United States considerable advantages. These we are willing to lay. I hope gentlemen will not insist upon forty or fifty, because I think it really oppressive, and will certainly give displeasure to the Southern States.

Mr. BLAND hoped gentlemen would get more information, and be better prepared to determine the question to-morrow, when he expected the subject would be taken up again; at present it was growing late; it was high time to adjourn. He moved the adjournment, and the House agreed to it.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they had passed the bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths, with amendments, to which they desired the concurrence of this House.

WEDNESDAY, May 6.

JOHN VINING, from Delaware, appeared and took his seat. The bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A petition of Arthur Greer, of the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that he has invented a machine which he conceives has reduced to a certainty the discovery of the true longitude or departure from any given meridian north of the equator; and praying that an exclusive patent for his discovery may be granted him for the space of twenty-one years.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the House entered upon the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill for regulating the time and manner of administering certain oaths.

The following amendments being before them, to wit:

"That the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several States, who have been heretofore chosen or appointed, or who shall be chosen or appointed before the first day of August next, and who shall then be in office, shall, within one month thereafter, take the same oath or affirmation, except where they shall have taken it before; which may be administered by any person authorized by the law of the State in which such officer shall be held to administer oaths. And the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several States who shall be chosen or appointed after the said first day of August, shall, before they proceed to execute the duties of their respective offices, take the foregoing oath or affirmation, which shall be administered by the person or persons who, by the law of the State, shall be authorized to administer the oath of office; and the person or persons so administering the oath hereby required to be taken, shall cause a record or certificate thereof to be made, in the same manner as, by the law of the State, he or they shall be directed to record or certify the oath of office."

Mr. GERRY said, he did not discover what part of the Constitution gave to Congress the power of making this provision, except so much of it as respects the form of the oath; it is not expressly given by any clause of the Constitution; and if it does exist, must arise from the sweeping clause, as it is frequently termed, in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government or officer thereof." To this clause there seems to be no limitation, so far as it applies to the extension of the powers vested by the Constitution; but even this clause gives no legislative authority to Congress to carry into effect any power not expressly vested by the Constitution. In the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, provision is made, that the members of the Legislatures of the several States, and all executive and judicial officers thereof, shall be bound by oath to support the Constitution. But there is no provision for empowering the Government of the United States, or any officer or department thereof, to pass a law obligatory on the members of the Legislatures of the several States, and other officers thereof, to take this oath. This is made their duty already by the Constitution, and no such law of Congress can add force to the obligation; but, on the other hand, if it is admitted that such a law is necessary, it tends to weaken the Constitution which requires such aid; neither is any law, other than to prescribe the form of the oath, necessary or proper to carry this part of the Constitution into effect; for the oath required by the Constitution, being a necessary qualification for the State officers mentioned, cannot be dispensed with by any authority whatever other than the people, and the judicial power of the United States, extending to all cases arising in law or equity under this Constitution. The judges of the United States, who are bound to support the Constitution, may, in all cases within their jurisdiction, annul the official acts of State officers, and even the acts of the members of the State Legislatures, if such members and officers are disqualified to do or pass such acts, by neglecting or refusing to take this oath. He concluded his observations, by submitting to the House the propriety of appointing a committee of conference, to state to the Senate the doubts of the House upon this subject.

Mr. BLAND had no doubt respecting the powers of Congress on this subject. The evident meaning of the words of the Constitution implied, that Congress should have the power to pass a law, directing the time and manner of taking the oath prescribed for supporting the Constitution. There can be no hesitation respecting the power to direct their own officers, and the constituent parts of Congress; besides, if the State Legislatures were to be left to arrange and direct this business, they would pass different laws, and the officers might be bound in different degrees to support the Constitution. He not only thought Congress had the power to do what was proposed by the Senate, but he judged it expedient also, and therefore should agree to the amendment.

Mr. JACKSON—I believe this House, and the other branch of the Legislature, have the power, by the Constitution, to pass a law, obliging the officers of the State Governments to take the oath required by the Constitution that their States have adopted, and which has become the supreme law of the land. I believe the general opinion of the House inclines to favor this sentiment. It then only remains to examine the measure on the principle of policy. Here I must give my opinion. I believe, sir, that it is not time to bring it forward, that it is not expedient at present, because some jealousies exist respecting the jurisdiction of the Federal and State Governments. The States had better be left to regulate this matter among themselves, for an oath that is not voluntary is seldom held sacred. Compelling people to swear to support the Constitution, will be like the attempts of Britain, during the late Revolution, to secure the fidelity of those who fell within the influence of her arms, and, like those attempts, they will be frustrated; the movement the party could get from under her wings, the oath of allegiance was disregarded. If the State officers will not willingly pay this testimony of their attachment to the Constitution, what is extorted from them against their inclination is not much to be relied on. Besides, it argues a jealousy in the National Government, which can have no foundation. Can any thing show more friendly to the Union than adopting the Constitution, and sending us here to administer it? If we judge from these circumstances, there is good reason to believe that the State Governments will pay a proper attention to the duty enjoined upon them by the Constitution. I shall readily agree, if they do not pay this attention, that the National Legislature ought to exercise its powers to compel them; but they know the necessity there is for conforming to what the Constitution orders; if they neglect it, it becomes in some degree a relinquishment of their power in Government. No State Legislature can pass an act that will have the efficacy of a law. Suppose a judge on the bench were to condemn a criminal to die for an offence; the sentence could not be carried into execution, if the judge had omitted to qualify himself for the discharge of the duties of his office. In short, there would be a total stagnation of the Government, its vital powers would be suspended, until they were revived by the action of the Constitution. Besides, the Constitution partakes of the nature of a compact; it guarantees to the State Governments the principles of a republican government, conditionally, that the States conform themselves to what is declared in the Constitution; they must therefore take the oath directed by the Constitution, or infringe the compact; in which case, I apprehend, the guaranty is virtually withdrawn; this is another inducement for the States to perform their duty.

It is not necessary to press the measure at this time, because we see the States daily coming into those measures directed in the Constitution; when they thus voluntarily do their duty, where is the necessity of cramming an oath down their throats? For my part, I do not conceive, if a man is forced to take an oath, that he is bound to keep it; at least it is not generally believed to be so, for how often have we seen a man swear three or four times backward and forward during the late war? Oaths were then seldom kept longer than suited the convenience of the party; therefore I am against imposing them when we can possibly do without them; and in the present case we can, perhaps, better do without them.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I believe, Mr. Speaker, if there is any thing improper in making provision that the officers shall take an oath to support the Government, the fault cannot properly be charged upon us, because the provision is already made, and adopted by our constituents, and we are to suppose that some beneficial effects were intended by it; while we are reprobating the measure let us take care we do not fall under the censure, which the observation of the gentlemen last up brought to our view, of taking an oath, and neglecting to fulfil the duties enjoined by it. I believe, sir, that the persons who are to take this oath in conformity to the Constitution, will conceive themselves, after having taken such oath, under an obligation to support the Constitution. It has been said by one gentleman, that Congress have not the power to carry this regulation into effect. Only a few words will be necessary to convince gentlemen that Congress have this power. It is declared by the Constitution, that its ordinances shall be the supreme law of the land. If the Constitution is the supreme law of the land; every part of it must partake of this supremacy; consequently, every general declaration it contains is the supreme law. But then these general declarations cannot be carried into effect without particular regulations adapted to the circumstances. These particular regulations are to be made by Congress, who, by the Constitution, have power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry the declarations of the Constitution into effect. The Constitution likewise declares that the members of the State Legislatures, and all officers, executive and judicial, shall take an oath to support the Constitution. This declaration is general, and it lies with the supreme Legislature to detail and regulate it. The law is to supply the necessary means of executing the principle laid down; for how can it be carried into effect in any other manner? This explanation, I trust, convinces gentlemen that the power of enacting such a law exists in Congress. But whether it is good policy or not to do it, depends upon a variety of circumstances; for my own part, I think it prudent to make the necessary regulations for carrying into effect this part of the Constitution. I imagine some good effects were intended by the provision, nor can I think the feelings of the State officers will be injured by taking an oath to support the Government, when the people, in the language of the Constitution, have said they shall. Why should gentlemen suppose the members of the Legislature, or any public officer, have objections to take an oath, when the people have declared one shall be taken by them? I conceive there can be no rational objection on their part. I shall, therefore, be in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senate, trusting that good effects will arise from our making such a regulation.

Manner of taking certain oaths.

Mr. SYLVESTER.—I am an advocate for supporting the dignity of the House, and to me it appears somewhat inconsistent that we should change our sentiments, in order to conform to the amendment of the Senate, without knowing the reason upon which they have founded the proposed measure. No doubt, but sufficient reasons have occurred to them, but none have appeared to this House. If we are to follow the Senate in all the alterations they propose, without hearing reasons to induce a change, our time in deliberation is taken up unnecessarily. With respect to any member of this House who has not taken the oath, I concur that they are to pay obedience to what the authority of the Legislature may order of this head. Nay, I am equally clear that the power to regulate the members of the State Governments in taking the oath, is either lodged with the Congress of the United States, or no where. But it appears to me that the State Legislatures have a concurrent power with Congress in this regulation, for the officers of the General Government and State Governments are called upon in the same manner. "The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support the Constitution." These are the words of that instrument. The question, then, is reduced to its expediency, whether it is good policy to exercise the power or not? I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, if we exercise this power, it may be considered an interference with the State Governments. I would rather leave them to their discretion, trusting they would come forward and take the oath; it is unnecessary for us to intermeddle, if they will conform to what is directed by the Constitution. It appears to me most prudent that, till we see a disposition in the State Governments to neglect this duty, we do not, by law, oblige them to perform it. I wish the Government to go on gradually in administering the Constitution, and not give umbrage even to its enemies, by a compulsory act, when there appears no necessity for it.

I could not concur in the amendment proposed by the Senate, even if I considered it not inconsistent in the House to adopt a measure they had previously rejected, unless some good reasons were offered to show its propriety; not but if I have been mistaken, I am always ready to retract my error, upon better information.

Mr. SHERMAN was not afraid of being charged with inconsistency. He had voted against a similar clause when the bill was before the House, but he was convinced now of its propriety; he thought it more eligible to have a general provision for taking the oath, than particular ones. It also appeared necessary to point out the oath itself, as well as the time and manner of taking it. No other Legislature is competent to all these purposes; but, if they were, there is a propriety in the Supreme Legislature's doing it. At the same time, if the State Legislatures take it up, it cannot operate disagreeably upon them, to find all their neighboring States obliged to join them in supporting a measure they approve. What a State Legislature may do will be good as far as it goes; on the same principle, the Constitution will apply to each individual of the State officers—they may go, without the direction of the State Legislature, to a justice, and take the oath voluntarily. This, I suppose, would be binding upon them. But this is not satisfactory; the Government ought to know that the oath has been properly taken, and this can only be done by a general regulation. If it is in the discretion of the State Legislatures to make laws to carry the declaration of the Constitution into execution, they have the power of refusing, and may avoid the positive injunctions of the Constitution. As our power in this particular extends over the whole Union, it is most proper for us to take the subject up, and make the proper provision for carrying it into execution, according to the intention of the Constitution.

Mr. BOUNDWATER wished to remove the gentleman's objections arising from inconsistency. The clause that was rejected by the Committee of the Whole on this bill, contained a penalty for the neglect of taking the oath as prescribed; but the amendment of the Senate was not objectionable on that account, because it contained no such provision.

As to the policy or expediency of the measure, he entertained not the least doubt respecting it. The Constitution said only that the officers of Government should be bound by oath, leaving to Congress to say what oath. In short, it was the duty of the House, as had been well said by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LAWRENCE,) to detail the general principles laid down in the Constitution, and reduce them to practice.

He would enforce the expediency of the measure with one further remark. Several of the State Legislatures were sitting at this time, and had expressed a wish or expectation that such a regulation would be made by the General Government; if from principles of false policy the measure did not take place, the State Legislatures might neglect it also, and it was well known that their officers cannot act without it; hence the legality of their acts may be called in question, and give cause to a great deal of uneasiness and confusion.

The question on concurring with the Senate in their amendments to the bill was carried, with an amendment, that the members of the State Legislatures be directed to take the oath at their next sessions respectively.

The bill was, by order of the House, returned to the Senate as amended.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from New York, presented to the House an application, in the name and behalf of the Legislature of that State, addressed to the Congress of the United States; which being read, was ordered to be filed.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. SMITH's motion to reduce the tonnage duty on the vessels of foreign countries in alliance with the United States, from thirty cents per ton to twenty cents.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I rise against striking out thirty cents to insert twenty. Probably, Mr. Speaker, if the motion had been instead of twenty, to insert fifty, I should not have risen to oppose the motion. Thirty cents I consider rather too small than too large an encouragement to navigation. I am sorry to find, sir, that this subject has been considered in the light of an opposition between the two extremes of the continent; because I apprehend every individual in the United States is alike interested; it is the mark of an honorable system necessary to the good of the whole. However, if gentlemen still think that any part of this system of finance bears harder on one part than on another, I shall be more delicate in voting or using arguments to oppose them. But I will, with the liberty of the House, proceed to prove, that this part of our system does not bear so much harder upon one part than another, as gentlemen seem to think. In order to do this, I shall endeavor to examine the principles laid down by the honorable gentlemen who support the idea, that a tonnage duty will bear much heavier on the Southern States than on the Northern ones, previously making some observations on what has been urged by the gentlemen from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) and South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) concerning the poverty of those States. They, with great ingenuity, eloquence, and, I may add, candor, displayed the desperate situation of those States; but, can it be unknown to this honorable House, that other States are also very poor? There are, you know, Mr. Speaker, certain degrees of poverty. It may be difficult, without the proper documents, to ascertain the relative degree of poverty between one State and another. The two Southernmost States are said to be oppressed with an enormous public debt; so are all the other States. It is said, that they have great difficulty in getting their produce carried to market. It may be so, but does not the whole of the commodities of those States find their way to market? There are not only different degrees of poverty, but there are also two kinds of poverty, which I will just point out to the gentlemen. The one is the poverty of those States which have got valuable productions on hand that they cannot carry to market—the other is, the poverty of having nothing to carry there, or very little. I need not trouble myself with repeating which of these kinds is the best subject for taxation. However, as I do not conceive this present article was particularly intended to be a tax upon one part of the Union more than another, I shall not dwell longer upon this point, but proceed to observe, and endeavor to prove, that this is a tax upon foreigners only; a tax which foreigners are very able and willing to pay: that is, they will not forsake the trade on account of this tax being laid upon it. It has been observed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that the reason why British shipping get so much more freight than the vessels of the United States is, because of the debt which the Southern States owe to the people of Great Britain, and that those people are ready to receive their debts in produce, as soon as it can be got ready for them. This is just and kind of the citizens of South Carolina to use these means of extricating themselves from their difficulties; but I would ask the gentlemen, if they entertain any well founded apprehensions that the British merchants, for the trifling difference of the proposed tonnage duty, will neglect to call upon them, and collect in their debts in this manner? But if they had not this inducement, the duty is too inconsiderable to retard them from pursuing the profitable business of our carrying trade. Can it be thought, when we have so fair an opportunity to tax foreigners, that we should be acting the manly part to shrink from the experiment? I ask, would it be following their own example? Does the admiral to a participation in her carrying trade? Are we the carriers of our own produce into the West India islands, where they cannot make a shift to live without our assistance? Yet every person knows it would be our interest to go there, and we should be glad to have the privilege, on moderate terms, as well as Great Britain has, to trade to the Southern States; but, instead of a reciprocal advantage arising from our intercourse with Britain, she will not admit us into her ports in that quarter, upon any terms whatever. We cannot get from there even a single hoghead of sugar, while their ships get full freighted here. The British merchant cannot complain of a trifling duty of only one hundred tons and fifty dollars upon a vessel of three hundred tons; why, sir, it is so inconsiderable that it could not be felt, or hardly thought of. If we agree to this duty, we shall have something to give up to Britain when she is willing to enter into treaty with us for those advantages we mean to stipulate for in their West India trade. That is a profitable branch of business, and the people are ready to return to it as soon as they have it in their power. It is more profitable to our people than ever the carrying trade to the southward will be, because it is more in their way. But Great Britain will not be induced by a small temptation to favor our commerce; she is jealous of the profits arising from her carrying trade, and will admit none that she can help to participate in that business. We have now an opportunity of making our own terms, and have little more to do than take hold of the advantages which are, as it were, put into our hands.

It has been said, by another gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TUCKER,) that this is not a tax upon Great Britain, but a bounty in favor of our brethren of the Eastern States, who will get the money for two-thirds of the tonnage employed in America, from the planters and farmers who send their productions to market. Let us examine this point a little. Do not we all believe that the consumer pays the duty on every thing he consumes? This is a universal maxim, and although it may not be strictly true to the utmost nicety of calculation, yet it is generally true. Is the tax on molasses paid by the planter in the West Indies? By no means; it is a duty paid by the people who use it, either raw in substance, or distilled into spirit. No person can possibly conceive, that the duties we pay on merchandise imported, is a duty paid by the people of foreign countries from whence we get them; nor can they say that they are any more necessities of life than the rice, flour, iron, and lumber we ship to other nations.

Another idea is strongly insisted upon, that the duty in contemplation is too great a sacrifice to make in favor of the Northern States, that thirty cents is much too high a duty on the ships of our allies, or too great an encouragement to the Northern ship-building. In the first place, we are not laying a burden upon any particular part of the United States. If I understand the matter rightly, the duty is to pervade the whole, and if there be benefit arising from the measure, it may be taken by all. But it will encourage the ships of the Northern States, gentlemen say. I trust it will; but does not the effect of the benefit expand to every part? A system cannot be improper which, beside producing considerable revenue, operates beneficially on a great part of the community, without injury to any. Thus it is, that a duty on clothing is eligible; while it raises revenue it promotes frugality and industry; a duty on rum is said to improve the morals of the people, by lessening the consumption, therefore it is proper; though, by the by, I question whether the duty we have laid on spirits will lessen the consumption. The tonnage duty, beside raising revenue, gives encouragement to the industry of ship-builders; but this encouragement is not confined to Northern States, it may be participated in by the middle and Southern ones. But then it is said that the Southern States are not possessed of navigation. Why are they not? They certainly might become proprietors of ships if they thought proper. The crops they raise will purchase ships, if they have not the convenience for building them; if they make more profit by their produce than by ship-building, so much the happier are they, and so much the better able to contribute their share of the public taxes. From all of these considerations, I am induced to think, that the duty agreed to by the committee is rather too low than too high, at any rate it cannot be thought too high.

Mr. BLAND.—I am in favor of the lowest sum, although I am a friend of the proposed discrimination. I conceive, Mr. Speaker, that it is a most important duty incumbent upon the Legislature, to attend particularly to the interest of the agricultural part of the United States. I do not think we are prepared, at this early period, to give to commerce the high encouragement proposed by the resolution before you. The gentleman who was last up observed, that the British merchants would not be deterred by the tonnage duty from coming to take our produce in payment of their debts. He may be mistaken in this opinion; he should recollect the new Constitution makes treaties the supreme law of the land, and under that foreigners may recover, in the federal courts, the amount of their debts by a legal process; the severe execution of this law may enable them to obtain our produce even at a cheaper rate than what it now sells for. Independent of our want of tonnage to transport our commodities, we should feel considerable disadvantages; but being at the mercy of the British merchants for our transportation, the Southern States will suffer prodigiously by a duty on their shipping, as they will be forced to employ them, and to give them what they demand.

Gentlemen say, they have it in contemplation to raise revenue by a tonnage duty. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is but doubtful policy to lay a tax on commerce, and burden the agriculture of America. If you aim at expelling foreigners, I have serious apprehensions you will throw the trade of the Union into a species of convulsion that may prove dangerous. Is it proper, therefore, to risk a subject of such magnitude at present? If the policy of encouraging ship-building in the manner proposed was clear, it would be a different case; but there is even in this House a great contrariety of opinion on that point. From this circumstance, I conclude that the measure under consideration is of questionable policy. I should therefore be in favor of adopting some temporary system, in order to give time to the House to get information relative to the state of agriculture and commerce; for without a more perfect knowledge of those two interests, than we at present have, I believe our regulations will be imperfect, if not inexpedient.

Mr. JACKSON.—Are we of the Southern States to lose our agricultural advantages? If we cannot carry our produce to market, we are cut off from the means of paying our debts, or improving our country. This, in our deplorable situation, will unpeople our lands, for no State is in such a situation as Georgia and South Carolina. New Jersey suffered a great deal no doubt from the ravages of war, but were they so generally exiled, and their property laid in ruins? Are they at this moment warring on their frontiers? Have they heavy debts hanging over their heads? No, New Jersey cannot now be so distressed; she has successfully recovered, and her wounds are nearly healed over, while those of South Carolina and Georgia are deep and painful as ever. If our commerce is restrained, how are we to pay our debts? No merchant will take our produce, unless he can export and dispose of it to advantage. What will he do, then? Why, sir, the poor planter must be left to his mercy, and we know the tender mercies of the British nation to be cruel. If this is not experienced in the Eastern States, it is happy for them; but the iron hand of oppression is held over the Southern ones. I dread every thing that can increase its weight, fearful lest it check the operations of industry. The agricultural interest ought to be encouraged and protected, instead of depressed, being the principal and leading interest of the United States, requiring the serious attention of the Legislature, and we ought to be governed, on this occasion, by what will be most conducive to its support.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I consider this as a very important subject, Mr. Speaker; it is of considerable importance as it respects the State I have the honor to represent. Some gentlemen have seemed to suppose, that the duties we have imposed are favorable to commerce, and that we have done a great deal to befriend those engaged in that pursuit; but, sir, it is not true that an import is an encouragement to commerce, the direct contrary is the fact. Look at the revenue then which you are about to derive from that interest, and say, if it does not require some degree of protection in return. All that your merchants ask, or expect, for the sacrifices they make for the general good, is, that a preference be given to American shipping. The Representatives of the people will gratify them in this, if we can show that the support of their interest is intimately connected with the interest and welfare of their country. I do not know how it happens, that gentlemen give up the idea of revenue from this source; but to my mind, the revenue derived from a foreign tonnage will be very considerable, and paid by the people of other nations; for, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, I can demonstrate, that considerable quantities of our produce will go to a market where our vessels cannot go, and that the consumer, in such case, must pay the duties we lay on the ships that carry on that trade. I instance several articles so circumstanced on a former occasion; it will be unnecessary to repeat them to the House.

How it becomes contemplated by some gentlemen, that the tonnage duty on foreign vessels will be exclusively paid by the Southern States, I cannot tell; I think they are not well warranted in such a supposition. The calculation of the tonnage employed in America, as stated, and I believe it was stated from good authority, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) does not support the opinion. The foreign tonnage by that calculation is, Massachusetts, 8,000; New York, 30,000; Pennsylvania, 28,000; Maryland, 26,000; Virginia, 29,000; South Carolina, 25,000; and Georgia, 13,000; (I leave out fractional parts of thousands.) Now, if it is really as gentlemen suppose, but which I do not think, that the whole of this revenue falls upon the individual State where the duty is collected, where is the great inequality that has been spoken of? Look once more at what each contributes, and see if the proportion is so great as apprehended. But admitting the inequality, is its inconvenience to be compared to the great national advantages resulting from such encouragement?

It was said, by some gentleman on a former day, that a considerable part of the produce was lying upon hand for want of shipping to carry it off, and in the State where this is the case no tonnage duty exists. I do not know from whence the information came; but I doubt the gentleman was deceived in assigning the cause why the produce was left to perish in the warehouses. I believe, where it has, often happened that considerable loss has been sustained by purchasing articles at too high a rate, those people who have met with the misfortune are apt to decline giving a price for it. The gentleman, I think, acknowledged that the merchants concerned in shipping the rice of the Southern States, had met with a loss of from 20 to 50 per cent. on what they sent abroad. If this is the case, can any body suppose they will continue a trade with this evident disadvantage? The gentlemen from the tobacco countries may expect the same; the exporters of that article have suffered similar misfortunes. We ought not, therefore, to say that the reason why our produce remains on hand is, because there is no shipping to carry it off. Such things have happened when there has been no want of shipping. If the price of produce is greater at home than abroad, it would not be transported, if the vessels were doubly as numerous in our ports as they are. Yet gentlemen complain that the price of produce is too low. We have, since the peace, received very high prices for our produce; but I believe the average price is now generally higher than the average price before the Revolution. I remember tobacco was cheaper then than it is now. It is truly said, that the price of an article depends upon the quantity and demand; the first has increased very considerably, and the latter little, if any. The cultivation of tobacco has extended itself over South Carolina and Georgia. Before the Revolution there was scarcely any raised there. Gentlemen do not imagine, because the fertility of our lands, and the industry of our citizens, double the quantity of produce we have for sale, that the people of other countries shall consume double what is customary. A man can use but little more snuff or tobacco, if it is much cheaper than common, and I still say the consumer pays the price, although that price depends upon the quantity at market, and the demand for it.

It is apprehended by some gentlemen, that a foreign tonnage duty will fall exclusively upon the Southern States. We have seen this opinion not well founded; and the effect is supposed by them to be this. As they have no shipping of their own, they depend upon foreigners; that these will desert them because they cannot afford to pay fifty cents per ton; and of consequence the produce of those States must perish unsold. Let us examine and see how likely it is, that such consequences will result from the proposed measure. There is shipped to Great Britain annually, about 50 or 60,000 hogsheds of tobacco, of which the subjects in that kingdom consume about 13 or 14,000, the remainder is shipped to other countries. Tobacco pays a freight from here to England of from thirty to forty shillings—sterling per hogshed, beside commissions and charges of twenty shillings more; after this, the quantity re-shipped pays another freight before it reaches the country where it is consumed. Do gentlemen think the merchants of Great Britain would resign this lucrative trade, and the employment of so many thousand tons of shipping for the trifling duty of half a dollar per ton? What does three shillings and nine pence amount to on a hogshed of tobacco, or a cask of rice? On tobacco one shilling and six pence, and about one shilling on a cask of rice. Will this affect the agriculture and destroy the commerce of South Carolina or Georgia? Will it be equal to the burden which American vessels are subjected to in British ports? Sir, the amount of the light money alone in England is about twenty pounds sterling on our ships. They have innumerable advantages in their own ports over us, and they have exclusive advantages in our ports. They can take in freight for the British West India islands, and we cannot carry them a barrel of flour. The trade between America and that part of the British dominions is of the very first importance to that nation. Of the four millions gallons of rum imported into America, three millions five hundred thousand come from the British colonies. If we did not furnish a market for this article, it would be useless to them; but this is not the only advantage they derive from us, we furnish them with certain articles necessary for the existence of the colonies, which are either exclusively got here, or the price is so moderate that it is not worth their while to get them elsewhere. But some things are not to be got in any other country; a proof of this need hardly be adduced. You have seen the Northern colonies planted since the peace, to rival us in those supplies; but you see those colonies themselves dependent upon us, also, for necessities. During the last war, they paid in the islands fifteen pounds sterling per 1000 for hogsheds staves, Scanthing, boards, shingles, and staves, can only be got from America. Without these they can neither build nor cover their houses; they cannot procure casks for their produce, but if they could get them from any other, it would not be worth their while, because of the expense. Can gentlemen suppose Britain would forego the advantage of supplying us with 3 or 4,000,000 gallons of rum annually, and carrying in return the most valuable of our commodities? Would they be driven from our ports by such a paltry consideration as three shillings and nine pence, Pennsylvania currency, per ton, yet the revenue to us would be considerable, although the duty is but moderate. I look upon the measure as a wise and politic one, worthy of the Representatives of the United States. I do not believe any such dangers will arise from the execution of it as has been predicted; the burden will be unequal in a very small degree at first, and must soon equalize itself; therefore, in my opinion, not one of the objections made to it ought to have any weight on the minds of the members.

Before I quit the subject, I will add one further consideration. The United States can have no commerce without a Navy. Whenever a war shall break out, what a situation will this country be in? How are we to protect our trade? And upon the success of our commercial enterprises depends the sinews of our strength. If our commerce is ruined, our revenue from the impost annihilated, but if we increase our navigation, and add to the number of our seamen, we shall become respectable, and may be able to pursue our obvious interest in supplying the parties engaged with the superabundance of our soil, and enable us to stipulate for reciprocal advantages in the West India commerce. If we do not now, while we have time, improve our situation, two or three British frigates may prevent us from gathering these benefits hereafter. The decided advantages of having ships of our own to transport our produce, is too apparent to be much insisted upon. Every gentleman can see how the commercial and agricultural interests are blended in this case, and that the benefits conferred on the first reflect with great strength upon the last. I shall conclude, with repeating the expectation of the commercial part of your citizens. They ask a preference for their own ships, in order to restore the commerce of America, which was nearly ruined by the effects of the last war. They do not ask a high duty, a moderate one will suffice. I wish to fix in gentlemen's minds, that high duties are not advantageous to merchants, and therefore it is seldom that they are benefited by them. High duties require a considerable part of their capital in money, and the payments do not always come at the most convenient seasons; besides, they subject their operations to restraints, and are therefore injurious. I will not enumerate the advantages of the proposed measure as to the revenue it will raise, nor try to show the probable increase of shipping it will in a few years produce. I am satisfied with the equality of the duty, and its salutary effect as it respects the political, commercial, and agricultural interests of the United States, and shall therefore vote against any reduction that has been, or may be proposed.

Mr. BLAND.—I never am actuated by narrow or selfish principles, and I should suppose that gentlemen, though they differ with me in opinion, are actuated in a similar manner. The gentleman last up seems to doubt every information given to the House, in argument, except his own. In matters of calculation, I always pay a deference to informed and intelligent minds, and when a member speaks on the subject of commerce, I conclude he speaks with information; but he may err in a desultory calculation as well as others, and it does appear to me, that no member can be possessed of the proper data to form a judgment upon. Under this impression, I could wish we had not gone so early into a system of perpetuity. If we had adopted some temporary expedient to secure our main object, revenue, and then ordered the proper information to be laid before us from all parts of the Union, we should be able to walk with rectitude. I fear at some future day, when we review our proceedings, we shall be concerned to discover how much we have deviated from that path. I do not presume to say it is intentional in the House, because I believe every gentleman present is disposed to promote the general welfare; but it may arise from want of that full information and mature knowledge which the subject most unquestionably demands. No satisfactory impressions have been made on my mind how to vote on this occasion; yet I am anxious so to assimilate the interests of the two ends of the continent, as well as the intermediate parts, that the greatest possible degree of public good may be produced by the least degree of evil. The agricultural interest is the permanent interest of this country, and therefore, ought not to be sacrificed to any other.

Mr. BALDWIN.—After the subject has been gone through so fully, it remains for me to say but little. I should not have risen at all on this occasion, if it had not been to express my approbation of the proposition promised by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) respecting a small discrimination at present in favor of American shipping, and looking forward to a greater difference at a future day. I hope the decision will be in this way.

The question now before the House, is for the reduction of the tonnage duty on the vessels of foreign nations in treaty with us. I would then ask, if there is such an overbearing and preponderating influence, as to make them dangerous to the American navigation? So far as we are informed, the vessels of such Powers form but a small part of what are engaged in our commerce. Suppose, then, we reduce the discrimination between our own vessels and theirs; it will be an encouragement for more of them to come. And is it not desired by gentlemen that more of them should come? That they want encouragement for this purpose, is capable of complete demonstration. We see every day, the manufactures of those countries and the produce of this, which they require for their consumption, coming and going in vessels belonging to other nations. This circumstance forms a clear and evident proof that our commerce is not in its natural channel. The report makes a discrimination against them, of at least five times as much as the whole duty on American vessels amounts to. If the difference was double, or even treble as much at this time, it would give great encouragement, and not materially affect the revenue, and might be extended hereafter, so as to produce the effect which gentlemen aim at. Their object, if I understand them right, is not so much to give our shipping employment, for the present, as it is to induce the building of them in future, so as to lay the foundation for a marine. Then I take it, Mr. Speaker, their object will be better attained by the measure proposed by the gentleman from Virginia; that is, lowering the duty now, and increasing it two or three years hence; to which period we are compelled to look for those improvements in our navigation which seem to be wished by every gentleman on this floor.

Mr. AMES.—It has been said, that the duty on foreigners ought not to exceed more than two or three times what has been laid upon our own tonnage. I beg to remind gentlemen, it never was the intention of the House to impose any duty whatever on American shipping: the six cents that were laid upon a different principle. This being the case, gentlemen will not draw any inference from what was done, to favor what is yet to be done; where the principles are inconsistent, the comparison does not hold good.

Mr. GOODRICH.—The difference proposed is but a trifle in favor of foreigners; indeed the whole duty is but low; perhaps it may be best to be so. But I arose only to call on gentlemen to reflect upon the necessity there is of encouraging the American navigation, and see how much the Southern States are interested in the measure. Suppose, and it is no unlikely supposition, a war was to break out in Europe between any Power and the nation carrying on so much of our commerce: she could not send vessels without encountering a freight proportionate to the risk. In such a case, the gentlemen to the southward must look at home for the means of transportation. If it could not be got here, their produce must remain on hand; it could not be sent to market.

Mr. MADISON.—I do not differ with my colleague, (Mr. BALDWIN,) when he says that the agricultural interest ought not to be sacrificed. I consider every other interest as secondary; but yet some concessions ought to be made, in order to prevent the ruin of a very important concern. If the question was, which of the two should be destroyed by the preference we give, I should have no hesitation; but I believe both interests are compatible and consistent with each other. I do not consider this subject as it respects revenue; my great object is to provide a maritime defence against a maritime danger. I wish, in doing this, that the burden should be equally borne; but I do not think a small disproportion is a sufficient reason for rejecting the measure. The expedient I proposed will tend to lessen the inequality, and therefore I hope it will be agreed to. I shall move it, if the question for reducing now before the House is agreed to.

Mr. Ames declared himself against reducing the duty so low, and asked the gentleman what he meant to propose, for the present, on the vessels of nations not in treaty?

Mr. Madison replied, that he would move to reduce it from fifty to forty; but then he would make it sixty cents per ton, after December, 1790.

Mr. Paine said forty cents was really nothing; fifty was but a mere trifle. If gentlemen had attended to what had been said, they must see that such a reduction would render the whole nugatory. Ninety or a hundred cents would be very little after the time mentioned. Can gentlemen seriously believe that a small duty of fifty cents is too high, when they see the British ships paying double that sum every day in Virginia? He conceived the discriminating duty highly proper, and was decidedly in favor of it. If revenue were not obtained by this means, Congress would be obliged to have recourse to direct taxation. He need not tell gentlemen how much more injurious this would be to agriculture than a tonnage duty. Their long experience on this point would satisfy their feelings better than he could their judgment. He hoped every proposition for a reduction of the duty would be rejected by the committee.

The question was put for reducing the duty from thirty cents per ton to twenty cents, on the vessels of nations with whom the United States have formed commercial treaties, and passed in the negative.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, May 7.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, to know when it will be convenient for him to receive the Address of this House, reported:

That the committee had, according to order, waited on the President, and that he signified to them that it would be convenient to him to receive the said Address at 12 o'clock on Friday, at such place as the House shall be pleased to appoint. Whereupon,

Resolved, That as the Chamber designed for the President's receiving the respective Houses is not yet prepared, this House will wait on the President to present their Address in the room adjacent to the Representatives' Chamber.

On motion,
Resolved, That a Committee of three members be appointed to confer with any Committee to be appointed on the part of the Senate, in preparing and reporting joint rules to be established between the two Houses, for the enrollment, attestation, publication, and preservation of the acts of Congress; as also on the mode of presenting addresses, bills, votes, or resolutions, to the President of the United States.

The members appointed, were Mr. BLAND, Mr. THUMBULL, and Mr. VINING.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the duty on tonnage. The proposition was to lay a duty of fifty cents per ton on all vessels belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of all other Powers.

Mr. Madison moved to reduce it to forty cents, and at the end of the year 1790, to increase it to seventy-five cents. He was satisfied to go as far as seventy-five, because he expected, under such encouragement, a sufficient number of vessels for the whole commerce of America might be constructed. If he was not too sanguine in this expectation, the measure would be both safe and expedient.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland.—Both in Virginia and Maryland, British ships pay a higher duty than what is proposed; yet they continue to carry on an extensive trade in those States, which, in my opinion, proves those sums to be too low. American shipping derives considerable advantages from the regulations made in this respect by those two States. If that protection is withdrawn from them by the General Government, it will subject our commerce to very great inconveniences and absolute distress. I shall therefore be opposed to the reduction.

Mr. Ames.—The gentlemen from the Southward, who suppose their States most likely to be affected by a discrimination in the tonnage duty, have concluded their arguments with a candor which I conceive does honor to their patriotism. They declare themselves willing to encourage American shipping and commerce, though they do not join with us in the sum we think necessary to be laid on foreign tonnage to accomplish so important an object. If sufficient encouragement is given, and by our regulation American vessels are put on a footing with foreigners, I think we may flatter ourselves with the prospect of seeing our navigation immediately flourish. We have reason to expect a very considerable addition to our shipping in the course of one year. Experience has convinced us, that 25,000 tons can be built within double that period, by the town of Boston alone. The other ports in Massachusetts can furnish 37,000 tons, New Hampshire a considerable quantity, and if the other States furnish their proportion, we shall soon find ourselves independent of European nations for the transportation of our products. If forty cents are present, and the seventy-five cents in expectation, are thought a sufficient encouragement for the purpose, I shall not object to the motion.

Mr. Goodhue.—On the same principle, as expressed by other gentlemen, I should be willing to lower the duty, not only to forty cents, but to thirty-five, provided, at the end of two years, it was raised so as to answer the purpose intended; but I think, in that case, we ought to go to eighty or ninety cents. I am by no means an advocate for high duties in the first instance, if there is any probability of their being partially oppressive.

Mr. Fitzsimons.—If it is intended to increase the duty at the expiration of two years, it is certainly proper to reduce it in the interim; but I very much question such policy. The business of ship-building, I conceive, stands at this moment in want of the greatest encouragement in our power to give. If sufficient encouragement is given, at this time, to produce a quantity of shipping adequate to the demand, when we once are in possession of them the business will stand in need of no further encouragement. If the citizens of the United States were now in possession of a sufficient quantity of shipping, and had the ability to employ them, I conceive they would not stand in need of any encouragement whatever. But this is not the case, and therefore an encouragement is requisite. At the conclusion of the last war, we were left without shipping; and from our inability to carry on commerce, by reason of the oppression we were subjected to by foreign Powers, the building of vessels has made but slow progress in the several States. Hence it becomes necessary to give encouragement sufficient to induce merchants to vest a greater portion of their capital in this way. The proposed encouragement is not very high, and even under it, I should not expect a quantity of shipping would be furnished equal to the demand, in less than four or five years. It would be brought forward by slow and gradual degrees; they will continue, year by year, to increase them, until the number is competent to the demand. The business of ship-building being so relaxed, persons of that occupation have turned to other avocations, and some sensible advantage must appear, to induce them to return to their original profession. A proof of this is evidenced by the situation of Philadelphia. Before the Revolution, 5,000 tons of shipping were annually built in that city: last year the whole tonnage was but 1,300, so much has it declined there. If it revives from its present languishing condition, it must be by great fostering care and protection, and by slow and gradual degrees. It does not appear to me that fifty cents are more than necessary for its immediate encouragement. Gentlemen will be pleased to recollect that it is always in the power of Congress to increase it.

Yesterday, gentlemen seemed to think that encouraging our own vessels would injure the agricultural interest, because they cannot get British vessels to carry off their produce. I beg to remind them that a very considerable aid is furnished by the commercial to the agricultural interest, in finding markets for a considerable part of their produce, which British shipping does not carry off. It is well known, the vessels of that nation are prohibited carrying any salted provisions, more than they want for their ships' use. It is her policy exclusively to supply her dependencies with that article; so that none goes off but what is transported in our own vessels. I think, from the account of exports of our State for one year, 40,000 barrels of beef have gone abroad, and 100 tons of butter. These commodities could not have been exported, if we had not had ships of our own to send them in. Gentlemen see what an advantage results to agriculture from this one source alone. Since the merchants of America have opened a direct trade with India, which were scarcely known before last year. Six or seven hundred thousand weight of ginseeng was shipped, and we exported one hundred thousand weight the year before, which would never have been sent, had not our commercial exertions opened the way for a direct intercourse with that country. Advantages of a similar nature will be sought and found, when our navigation extends into its natural channels. The sooner we are enabled to do this, the better.

Gentlemen will recollect, on the article of hemp, immediate encouragement was contended for. It was not opposed by the commercial gentlemen in this House. But without encouragement is given to building and fitting out ships, the demand for hemp will be small; for very little advantage will arise from exporting it: the great market must be furnished by ourselves. Upon the whole, I conclude against the motion, believing our ship-building to need encouragement more at this time than it will at any subsequent period.

Mr. Jackson.—The gentlemen from Massachusetts have, I must own, behaved with liberality. One is willing to reduce the duty to forty cents, another gentleman is more liberal still—he is willing to go lower; but not so the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Maryland; they are actuated by other principles. They call to my mind a passage of scripture, where a king, by the advice of inexperienced counsellors, declared to his people, "my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, but I will add to your burdens." A steady pursuit of this counsel brought about the separation of his kingdom. These gentlemen want us even to go further. They bring forward calculations upon the moment, and pass them for information,—the mere calculations of yesterday,—and demonstrate thereby the propriety of their measures. They may consider some States of less importance than others, because they do not contribute the same quantity of revenue; but let them remember, the widow's mite is as good as the rich man's offering; so the mite of Georgia is equal to the revenue of Pennsylvania.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has mentioned the article of hemp: let him take example from the conduct of its friends. They liberally agreed to lessen the duty for the present, to increase it after the year 1790. What is the return remains for gentlemen to show?

Mr. PAGE was decidedly against any alteration. He thought the encouragement contended for was essentially necessary; but if it was not, the measure ought to be adopted, in order to avoid direct taxation. Any little inequality would soon subside, and the direct intercourse promoted by the regulation would compensate for any disadvantages it might occasion.

Mr. BURKE.—It has been observed, in the former part of the debate, that the people of the Southern States might buy ships, if they did not build them. There are none owned in Carolina: we are destitute both of ships and seamen, and unable to procure them; it would be folly in us, therefore, to burden them with duties. Though, it is true, that there are men there who live in affluence, are rich in lands and servants, yet I believe they are universally in debt. This may be fairly inferred from the laws they have made to favor debtors. It would take twelve years to enable people there to pay their State and private debts; they are therefore very unable to sustain any new burdens, especially when their produce is so fallen in price as not to pay the expense of cultivation. I do not say this is to be attributed to the want of vessels to carry it off, though there may probably be a great want in this respect; and if there is, gentlemen tell you they are unable to make up the deficiency. If this be the case, they ought to be contented with a moderate duty for the present; and as my mind is strongly impressed with the importance of encouraging the American navigation, I shall join them in doing something that may be productive of that effect.

Mr. MADISON.—As there is a great diversity of sentiment respecting the policy of the duty, I am very happy to find it is not prescribed by the geographical situation of our country. This evinces that it is merely difference of opinion, and not difference of interest. Gentlemen of the same State differ as much as gentlemen from the extremes of the continent. As no objection is made to giving some encouragement, we ought to endeavor to harmonize upon the quantum. I doubt very much if any proposition that can now be brought forward will coincide with the sentiments of this body more than the one that is before us. I am not anxious to reduce the encouragement too low, nor to throw to a very distant day the advanced rate intended by my modification of the measure; so gentlemen need not apprehend any evil to arise from its adoption.

Gentlemen who are opposed to giving sufficient encouragement to ship-building, ought to recollect an argument that was considered of weight in the case of encouraging manufactures. It is certain that manufactures have been reaped up by the fostering care of State Legislatures, displayed in the shape of protecting duties; but the people, by the adoption of this Constitution, have put it out of their power to continue them. The provision for the support of navigation, made by the several States, ought to induce us to suppose even a higher tonnage duty pleasing to them, at least in those States where a higher tonnage duty has been laid. Those States, not being able to continue their encouragement, expect that we will attend to their policy, and protect their citizens in the property they were led to acquire under the State regulations. If we disappoint them, they will suffer more than is consistent with good policy. I am not apprehensive that forty cents will be so low as to occasion any discontent.

It has been supposed, that the burden of this duty would particularly fall upon the planters of the Southern States. There may be some justice in the suspicion; but forty cents, I think, will not excite complaint from that quarter, when the advantages are properly considered. A maritime force is essentially necessary to the United States, and, in time of war, will be particularly employed in defence of the weaker part. South Carolina and Georgia, having neither seamen nor shipping, must depend upon the other States for their defence. If, therefore, the duty will promote this strength, it will render the Union respectable and safe, and ultimately favor their interest.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—Gentlemen have endeavored to persuade us, that a high tonnage duty will be beneficial to the Union; but I would as soon be persuaded to throw myself out of a two story window, as to believe a high tonnage duty was favorable to South Carolina. Gentlemen tell us that we are in great want of shipping and a navy—that sufficient encouragement for ship-building must be given before we can expect it; but I think, let the encouragement be what it may, many years will elapse before we have sufficient for the export of our commodities. I know Massachusetts cannot furnish us, because there are adventitious causes to prevent it. The course of the stream in which our navigation has so long flowed, cannot be altered in a day. The debts due from the merchants of that country to the British, will be an insuperable bar. Suppose they should send ships to transport our produce to a foreign market, they have no connexions abroad to transact their business, no house in a commercial line to employ in the sales. What are they to bring back in return? They must come in ballast; and will the mere transportation of our crop be a sufficient inducement to engage them to come here? If they had more shipping than they wanted, we should still labor under the same difficulty, and employ foreigners; because, the business is unchangeably in their hands, and the very moment the tonnage duty is increased, it will be an inducement to them to raise the price of freight.

It has been said, and justly said, sir, that the States which adopted the Constitution, expected its administration would be conducted with a favorable hand. The manufacturing States wished the encouragement of manufactures, the maritime States the encouragement of ship-building, and the agricultural States the encouragement of agriculture. Let us view the progress we have made in accommodating their interests: We have laid heavy duties upon foreign goods, to encourage domestic manufactures; we are now about to lay a tonnage duty for the encouragement of commerce; but has any one step been taken to encourage the agricultural States? So far from it, that all that has been done operates against their interest: every duty we have laid will be heavily felt by South Carolina, while nothing has been done to assist, or even encourage her or her agriculture.

Duties on Tonnage.

[H. or R.]

We have been told, that these measures will benefit the Southern States, because we want shipping and manufactures, and it would be better to take them from our friends than from strangers. We know the governing principle in trade to be interest; but leaving that out of the question, I believe there are causes existing which will prevent the introduction of the manufactures of the Northern States into the Southern ones; beside the long commercial connexion subsisting between South Carolina and Great Britain, there is another advantage she possesses over others: it is the custom of British merchants to send out their goods upon credit; they establish agents and houses to deal them out to planters as they are wanted, and take their crops in return. Now, without the manufacturers of Massachusetts, or any of the other States, pursue the same conduct, they would not be able to sell their commodities. It is well known, that we have not ready money there to pay down for the articles we want, credit being the established medium of trade in that country. Gentlemen must see that it would take much time and the strongest efforts to alter it, though I am sensible that we pay severely for the indulgence; yet the habit, being established, is hard to be broken.

If we are by custom or necessity obliged to take British goods, that nation will load them with heavy duties to counteract our policy. The manufacturing States will not feel this evil: the only method we have, sir, to extricate ourselves from our distress, is by the sale of our crops; any imposition laid upon tonnage will affect the price of them, and lessen our power to pay our debts, and thereby emancipate ourselves from the commercial fetters by which we are bound; until which time it will be impracticable for us to deal with any other country.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—There have been circumstances mentioned in the course of this debate, which I think may be useful in ascertaining whether the proposed duty of fifty cents on tonnage be too high or not. It appears that there is a duty in Georgia equal to 1s. 8d. sterling; in South Carolina, 1s. 3d. besides something on goods imported in foreign bottoms; in Virginia and Maryland it is much greater. How, then, can gentlemen from those States contend that the proposed duty is so much too high as to occasion the fatal consequences they foretell? When we consider the valuable produce of the Southern States, we are led to believe that the difference of ten cents per ton can make no material difference in the price. Will it materially affect the price of rice or tobacco? Neither of these articles would pay more than five cents per cask, if the duty should be reduced.

The duty, therefore, cannot be fairly said to be too high for the Southern States; it is not contended to be too high for the middle ones; it is not too high for us.

If we consider the subject as it relates to revenue, it will form a material object for our attention; if the duty be considered as a bounty to the maritime States, it will be admitted that it is our interest to increase our navigation.

The regulation proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, to increase the duty to seventy-five cents at the end of two years, may never take effect; before that period arrives, a treaty may be formed with the nation that is our great commercial rival. I am, therefore, in favor of a permanent regulation, rather than one holding out an encouragement that will never take place.

Mr. JACKSON.—The gentleman last up thinks the reduction of ten cents will not materially affect the Southern States, yet he supposes it will injure ship-building: how it can hurt one interest by being reduced, and not wound the other by its increase, I do not clearly understand; for my part, I do not see the weight of such arguments.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I consider the difference of ten cents to be too small for contention; the arguments of the gentlemen in opposition go as much against a duty of forty cents as against fifty.

Mr. PAGE.—I have heard all the arguments now brought against this measure, urged over and over again, when a tonnage duty was contended against in the same manner in Virginia. It was then merely a trial, but now we have the arguments resulting from experience in our favor. We find the British shipping still crowding our ports, although the tonnage duty is twice as great as is now proposed; and although the price of produce has fallen within that time, yet I am persuaded it must be attributed to other causes than this. Let the experiment be made with firmness, and I venture to say, it will turn out the same in other States as in ours. I acknowledge the gentlemen's arguments have weight, but they go against any tax whatsoever being laid on tonnage. But experience has demonstrated to us, that such a duty is attended with advantages; it will encourage ship-building, and render us independent for the transportation of our produce. Let, therefore, no suggestions of the kind that have been offered deter us from pursuing, with firmness and decision, the plan adopted by the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH.—If the gentleman who has brought forward this proposition had proposed thirty cents instead of forty, I should have agreed to the motion, because it would have destroyed the discrimination between the vessels of nations in treaty, and those not in treaty with us; but in every other point of view, I should be against a reduction. Foreign vessels will be better circumstanced under a duty of fifty cents, than American can free of duty. The charges on foreign bottoms in our ports are very small; there is not, I believe, a vessel of ours that goes to Europe, that does not pay, in light money and other charges, more than fifty cents per ton.

Duties on Tonnage.

Mr. MANISON.—The subject of discrimination is not now within our view; it has been decided by a great majority; I think there were not more than nine members against it. I do not mean, by the arguments that I have urged, to prove that the increase of tonnage has a tendency to raise the price of freight; all my object has been to quiet the apprehensions of gentlemen who hold that opinion. I do not think it will keep away foreign vessels from visiting us, nor increase the burden on our Southern commerce, so much as has been calculated; and even if it did, the extension of our navigation would be an adequate compensation. The price of freight before the late Revolution was higher than it is at present; perhaps it may be lower when ships are furnished in larger quantities.

Mr. TUCKER.—I fear the gentlemen who look for a sufficient quantity of shipping to answer the demands of our commerce in so short a space as two years, will find themselves deceived. I think, therefore, it would be improper to lay a high tonnage duty, commencing at that period, if it appears expedient, a future Legislature may give such encouragement, but they are not bound to perform our engagement. After they have seen the effect of the present regulation, they will be better able to judge of what is right in this particular than we can do. I am doubtful whether the measure would place the United States in a better or worse situation than a duty of fifty cents; a commutation of this kind, in order to save ten cents for two years, and admit an addition of twenty-five cents forever afterwards, appears a doubtful policy. At any rate, the Congress might feel themselves, in some degree bound to raise the duty to seventy-five cents, when their judgments might tell them it was inexpedient—they will then have cause to complain of our anticipation. I should, I think, rather be in favor of fixing a certain tonnage duty at present, and leave it to the consideration of a future Legislature, whether to increase it or not, according to the circumstances of the case. I think thirty cents as much as can be given, with propriety, at this time; considering the interest of the State I have the honor to represent, I believe it will bear harder on some States than on others, acting partially and not generally. When I speak of the State I represent, I would not be thought actuated by improper motives; I think every gentleman is bound to support, in a proper manner, the interest he is well acquainted with, and believes to be conducive to the general welfare. A great deal has been said respecting the duties that have been laid on tonnage in the Southern States. I begged the attention of the House, on a former occasion, to a striking difference there is in duties imposed by the State, for its own particular advantage, and what are about to be laid for the benefit of the United States. Every duty imposed, I consider as a tax on the inhabitants of South Carolina. If that tax is to bear harder on them than on other States, I pronounce it unequal and unjust. I consider the tax on tonnage in this light; but as I am willing to give encouragement to our navigation, so I shall not oppose a moderate duty on foreign vessels; as I also conceive a discrimination proper between those nations in alliance with us and those with whom we have no treaties subsisting, I am disposed to admit a larger sum than thirty cents; I would propose thirty-five, upon the express condition of reducing the duty already agreed to, to twenty or twenty-five, when a bill shall come forward founded upon the principles now agreed to.

The question was here put on Mr. MANISON'S motion, and lost.

The House then decided upon the original proposition, which being agreed to, it was

Resolved, That there ought to be levied on all vessels entered or cleared in the United States, the duties following, to wit:

On all vessels built within the United States, and belonging wholly to citizens thereof, at the rate of nine cents per ton.

On all vessels not built within the United States, but now belonging wholly to citizens thereof, at the rate of six cents per ton.

On all vessels belonging wholly to the subjects of Powers with whom the United States have formed treaties, or partly to the subjects of such Powers, and partly to the citizens of the said States, at the rate of thirty cents per ton.

On all vessels belonging wholly or in part to subjects of other Powers, at the rate of fifty cents per ton. Provided, That no vessel built within the United States, and belonging to a citizen or citizens thereof, shall pay tonnage more than once in any one year; nor shall any ship or vessel built within the United States pay tonnage on her first voyage.

Provided also, That no vessel be employed in the transportation of the produce or manufactures of the United States, or any of them, coastwise, except such vessel shall be built within the United States, and the property of a citizen or citizens thereof.

The same was, on a question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. HEISTER, and Mr. SENEY, do prepare and bring in the same.

FRIDAY, May 8.

The Speaker, attended by the members of the House, withdrew to the room adjoining the Representatives' Chamber, and there presented to the President of the United States the Address agreed to on Tuesday last, to which he returned the following answer:

GENTLEMEN:

Your very affectionate Address produces emotions which I know not how to express, I feel that my past endeavors in the service of my country are far overpaid by its goodness; and I fear much that my future ones may not fulfil your kind anticipation. Alas that I can promise is, that they will be invariably directed by an honest and ardent zeal; of this resource my heart assures me. For all beyond, I rely on the wisdom and patriotism of those with whom I am to co-operate, and a continuance of the blessings of Heaven on our beloved country.

The Speaker and members being returned into the House:

Mr. GERRY, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for collecting duties on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and the same was received and read the first time.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do procure one hundred copies of the said bill to be printed for the use of the members of this House.

On motion. Ordered, That the committee appointed on the 29th ultimo, to report an estimate of the supplies requisite for the present year, and of the net produce of the impost, as agreed to by the House, be authorized and instructed to collect early and authentic statements of the particular articles of foreign produce and manufactures annually imported into, and of all the articles exported from, the several States, and the value of such imports and exports; also, the number of vessels, both foreign and domestic, entered and cleared during that time, specifying their tonnage, and the nations to which they respectively belong; specifying, also, the exact numbers of each particular description of vessels of each nation, and the amount of tonnage of each particular vessel.

On motion. Resolved, That this House will, on Tuesday next, proceed by ballot to the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States.

Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

Mr. TUCKER.—As I am desirous of beginning with moderate duties, I deem it proper, at this stage of the business, to offer my reasons in support of this opinion, that, if it be the opinion of the committee, we may go uniformly through the list, and make the necessary reduction. I am opposed to high duties, particularly for two reasons: 1st, because they will tend to introduce and establish a system of smuggling; and, 2dly, because they tend to the oppression of certain citizens and States, in order to promote the benefit of other States and other classes of citizens. I cannot say I have a peculiar aversion to a high duty on distilled spirits; I may, therefore, be suspected of inconsistency in moving to reduce it; but I do it on the principle of a general reduction. If I do not succeed on the first article, I shall despair of succeeding on the others.

It appears to me that if we lay high duties on the importation of goods, a system of smuggling will be adopted before we can possibly make the necessary provision to prevent it. I take it, sir, that proper regulations respecting the collection is all our security against illicit trade. From a variety of circumstances, it appears to me, we shall not only be a long time in completing such a system, but, for want of experience, many of the regulations will be of a dubious propriety. Gentlemen will recollect we have an extensive sea-coast, accessible at a thousand points, and upon all this coast there are but few custom-houses where officers can be stationed to guard the collection of the duties; therefore, we labor under considerably greater disadvantages than a thicker settled country is liable to. I apprehend, if we consider the present state of our population, we shall conclude it impracticable to establish a sufficient number of custom-houses, on those parts of the coast most assailable, to render us perfectly secure in the collection of our duties. If it were practicable, the expense would be a formidable objection; it would require more revenue to support such a system than all we shall derive from the impost. But we know in Great Britain, where the duties are high, no expense is spared in the collection, yet smuggling is carried on to a very considerable amount; the risk run by this class of people is very great, the penalties are very severe, and the vigilance of the officers renders detection not very improbable. As this is the case, under the administration of a very powerful Government, I apprehend ours, which is only in its infancy, will be unable to prevent its taking place, otherwise than by a system of moderate duties. If we begin with laying them high, there will be an immediate temptation to engage in a system of smuggling, a system of which may soon be formed, so as to render our future efforts ineffectual; it is better to avoid the temptation, than to punish the evil. A man that is disposed to trade fairly, will be brought under the necessity of falling into the same practice, or giving up his business; for the higher the duty, the greater the advantage the smuggler has over the fair trader, being compelled by necessity to engage in a contraband trade, or to forego the means of a livelihood. Smuggling will be no longer dishonorable, no longer difficult, and none will be found opposing the practice; repeated efforts to corrupt will be successful among even the officers of your customs; they at first may resist the temptation, but when they find the practice general, their vigilance will wink at a contraband trade, and smuggling will be considered as a matter of course. They will consider the reward given them for being out of the way as a benefit to which they are entitled. For these reasons I shall be against a system of high duties, and because I fear there is danger of a system of smuggling being introduced before proper arrangements are made to prevent it; or if we had time to make such arrangements, they must inevitably be ineffectual.

The other reason for which I am opposed to high duties on enumerated articles is, because it tends to the oppression of a certain description of citizens and particular States, in order to promote the advantage of other States and other citizens. The State I have the honor to represent will be injured by such duties, yet that State requires relief rather than additional oppression. We may very well know, that there are several States that do not import those articles, consequently they do not contribute their proportion to the support of the Union. On the principle of lessening the inequality, if the motion I now make shall be seconded and approved by the committee, I will go on to make a reduction on most of the articles, beginning with this; so as to have them on a lower scale than that we have at present before us. It was with a view to bringing about this measure, that I voted for a high duty on molasses, when that article was first before us. If the duty on West India rum is reduced, I shall be willing to make a proportionable reduction on molasses. When this list of duties came before the House from the Committee of the Whole, I found the scale was adhered to, and was therefore under the necessity of voting as I did, for the highest sum rather than the lowest. In doing this, I was actuated by a desire of having some security of the Eastern members for the general reduction which I wish to bring about. I was convinced by their arguments, that a high duty on molasses is oppressive to the poor. I do not wish to add to their burdens; on the contrary, I should be glad to exempt them from taxation altogether, if it was in my power; but this, I apprehend, cannot be done: they must be taxed in proportion to the other citizens. An impost duty on articles of importation will affect the poor of every State, provided they consume the goods brought from foreign countries. I could not answer for my conduct, if I did not agree to a heavy tax upon the Eastern States, when I found the Southern ones taxed in that proportion. If the gentlemen of Massachusetts think the duty on molasses bears too heavy on their State, they may remedy the evil by agreeing to a general reduction. If they insist that the burden operates unequally and oppressively, it is not the fault of us, who are compelled to the measure by a similar imposition on the consumption of our State.

H. or R.]

Duties on Imports.

I would observe further, that a high duty not only tends to the encouragement of smuggling, but it likewise raises in my mind, a scruple respecting the allowance of a drawback, as I conceive every drawback becomes an additional encouragement to smuggling. In many instances, I fear it may be found, that the drawback will amount to more than all the duties paid in the States which are entitled to it. Considering the situation of the States of North Carolina and Rhode Island, which are not in the Union, their contiguity to the other States will increase the facility with which smuggling can be carried on; it will be easy to import articles from Europe and the West Indies into their ports, and send them by land, or even water, to the adjacent States. When these are smuggled into the United States, they may be re-exported and entitled to receive a drawback, although the revenue was not collected upon the importation. If we agree to moderate duties, it will be much easier to regulate our system on this head; if our revenue is found not to be quite so productive as gentlemen calculate upon a system of higher duties, which, by the by, appears to me to be very unlikely, we shall be better able to judge what we can do after a trial, than we can possibly at present; at any rate, it will be but a small loss; whereas, by a large scale, we may throw the whole Union into confusion, and there will be no remedy by which we can recover what we have now in our power; for a reduction of duties, when they are once laid, is productive of the most serious consequences. Having, therefore, a strong impression upon my mind, that we hazard a great deal in imposing high duties in the first instance, I should not have been satisfied with having done my duty, if I had not stated my doubts and difficulties to the committee; but having done this, I shall content myself with their decision, be it what it may.

On motion, the further reading of the bill was postponed. Adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 9.

JEREMIAH VAN RENSSLAER, from New York, appeared and took his seat.

The bill for collecting duties on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The following communications were received from the Senate by Mr. Otis, their Secretary.

Ordered, That, when a message shall come from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and shall be announced by the doorkeeper, the messenger or messengers, being a member or members of the House, shall be received within the bar, the President rising when the message is by one member, and the Senate also when it is by two or more. If the messenger be not a member of the House, he shall be received at the bar by the Secretary, and the bill or papers that he may bring shall there be received from him by the Secretary, and be by him delivered to the President.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Senate have disagreed to the report of a committee appointed to determine what style or titles it will be proper to annex to the office of President and Vice President of the United States, if any other than those given in the Constitution; and have appointed a committee to consider and report under what title it will be proper for the President of the United States in future to be addressed, and confer thereon with such committee as this House may appoint for that purpose. The Senate have also appointed a committee to view and report how the rooms in the City Hall shall be appropriated, and to confer with any committee this House may appoint for that purpose.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States. Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

Mr. TUCKER.—The observations I made yesterday were intended to apply generally against a system of high duties. As to the particular article of spirits, I have no objection to a high duty being laid upon it, provided it can be strictly collected; for I do not wish to give encouragement to the consumption of that article, though, I fear, no duty we can lay will tend much to discourage it. I thought that if it was the general opinion of the House to lessen the duties, it would be a saving of time to discuss it on a motion to reduce the first article. I repeat the observation, that high duties are improper, because they are impolitic, and likely to defeat the object of revenue; less will be collected on them than on moderate ones. If it be considered as an encouragement to manufactures to lay heavy duties on enumerated articles, it is a tax on one part for the emolument of another. Five per cent. upon all articles imported would raise a considerable revenue, and be a sufficient encouragement to manufactures, especially if we add to this five per cent. the expense of freight and other charges of importation on foreign goods. The five per cent. in the bill is to be collected on the value of the goods at the time and place of importation; the value of goods within the United States is twenty-five per cent. more than they cost in Europe; adding this, therefore, to the other advantages, and it will be a considerable encouragement; but, besides all this, there are many articles made here as cheap, and cheaper, than they can be imported. Gentlemen who have given us this information, know the fact to be so in their respective States; in them, therefore, the operation of the measure would be just and politic, but it does not apply with the same force as it respects South Carolina and some other States. Although in Boston and Philadelphia they can manufacture certain wares cheaper than they can import them, yet they are not brought at the same price to Charleston; hence the operation is unequal and a partial tax upon us. Another thing to be considered is, even if these articles could be furnished us at home as cheap as we get them from abroad, whether we should have equal advantages? If a cargo of nails were to be sent to Carolina, I would be glad to know how we are to purchase it? Would the makers of shoes be content to go there and retail them? If they would, they might be brought there; but I apprehend, if they have not established connexions in that country, they could never be disposed of. Can they expect the planters to come in a body, and take off their goods upon their arrival? It is not even expected that they could; it must be left to them to judge, whether they do not purchase them in a better way by taking them upon credit, and paying for them in their crop. Gentlemen will not pretend to say that we do not know our own interest, and therefore they will teach us. These reasons will not go down with the people; they will take to themselves the right of judging what is most conducive to their interests. Gentlemen cannot argue from the fact, that we do not consume the articles made within their States, as readily and willingly as those imported from abroad, merely because we do not wish to encourage them. Facts prove the direct contrary; we have shown a disposition to encourage articles from their States, which can be made in our State in great abundance. I will mention a few of them, although it may appear disgraceful for South Carolina to take from any country what she can furnish herself. We have imported to the city of Charleston vegetables for table use, which we can raise as well as any part of the world; yet no complaint was made by the agricultural interest of that State, that we imported foreign productions to their prejudice; no duty was imposed to discourage the use of them; all we considered was, whether they came cheaper when brought from abroad than when raised at home, concluding the cheapest to be the best.

On the same principles that are now urged, our citizens might have contended that we should impose a duty on all articles which could be produced at home. No imposition on the importation was laid in order to encourage the productions of our country; the same principle ought to have induced us to lay a duty on the importation of flour. We make but little of that; our constituents consume rice in place of it. It might have been said, that a heavy duty should have been laid in order to prevent the interference with our staple commodity. The planters should have said, we will compel you to eat rice, and after being some time in the habit, you will find you like it as well as we; indeed, this argument might be extended to a measure calculated to oblige the other States to use rice in their daily food. It might be said, that it was necessary in order to give encouragement to the productions of the Southern States, but I believe such arguments would have had no weight if they had been used; yet they are similar to what have been brought forward by gentlemen for the encouragement of domestic manufactures.

Mr. SPEAKER, if gentlemen are content with moderate duties, we are willing to agree to them and give every reasonable encouragement in our power, but we cannot consent to very great oppression. I once more wish that gentlemen will consider great duties as imposing a heavier burden upon the Southern States, as they import more, the other less; and the sum we pay towards the revenue must be in proportion to our importation. I therefore move, in order to begin with the first article, that distilled spirits be reduced six cents per gallon.

Mr. JACKSON seconded this motion, and would assign his reasons for it, but they had been so fully stated by the honorable mover.

Mr. AMES.—I wish the committee may consider, with the attention the subject demands, whether the duties are too high or not? It is hardly possible, I own, to contemplate this subject as a practical question. We shall find it necessary to consider attentively, before we proceed any further, what the objects of our Government are; having discovered them, we are to consider whether the proposed measure will answer the purposes intended. I believe, in every point of view that we can possibly consider it, the subject of revenue will be thought to be one of the primary objects to which the power of Government extends. It has long been apprehended, that an ill administration of the new Constitution was more to be feared, as inimical to the liberties of the people, than any hostility from the principles of the Constitution. Of all the operations of Government, those which concern taxation are the most delicate as well as the most important. This observation applies to all governments. Revenue is the soul of Government, and if such a soul had not been breathed into our body politic, it would have been a lifeless carcass, fit only to be buried. I would wish this soul might be actuated by rational principles, that, in establishing a revenue system, we might go on a superior principle to that which has heretofore been the governing principle in the United States; that we might consider what was most adequate to the object. The nature of the revenue system in this Government is to the last degree important; for want of the soul, the late Government was found utterly incapable of invigorating and protecting industry, or securing the Union; therefore these seem to be the great objects which we are to accomplish. I consider the present question as a direct application to the principles of the Constitution; it will either support or destroy them. If the revenue system should fall with oppressive weight on the people, if it shall injure some in their dearest interests, it will shake the foundation of the Government. However the newspapers may stand your friends, and trumpet forth panegyrics on the new Constitution, if your administration does not give satisfaction, you will find all ineffectual that they can do, whilst the people are against you. This being admitted, the Government will not push their regulations too far; they will consider the weaknesses and prejudices of the individual members of the Union. When they lay a tax, they will consider how far it is agreeable to them, and how far the measure is wise in itself. If it is said the article to be taxed is a luxury, and the Government is zealous to correct the vice, they will be careful they do not do it in too severe a manner; the principle would be capable of great expansion: all the enjoyments of social life are luxuries, and, as objects of revenue, we ought to set a price on the enjoyment, without suppressing their use altogether. Neither ought we to consider what the article in this point of view is able to pay, so much as what we may reasonably expect to collect from it.

I believe various opinions are entertained on this subject. I have been told, the sentiments of some respectable merchants favor high duties, but I know there are as respectable gentlemen, whose judgment and information are much to be relied upon, decidedly of the contrary opinion, who think that we are treading upon ice; that if we impose these high duties at this time, we are doing an irreparable injury to our country; to that opinion I am myself inclined. I do apprehend very great inconveniences will result from pursuing these measures. I fear the collection would be insecure, your laws not be executed, and, of consequence, your Government fall into contempt. In collecting a revenue, I would determine with accuracy what might be expected; but in case of high duties, no calculation can be made; it rests with the self-interest of individuals to determine what shall be paid. Notwithstanding all the observations which gentlemen have made, to show the probability of collecting the duties with certainty, I have still very serious doubts, and if the Government cannot collect the revenue, the system is not worth supporting. Government is founded in necessity, its powers are to check the unruly sallies of self-interest; to restrain which requires an unwearied attention in every department of Government. It can hardly be thought good policy, therefore, to incite them, by great allurements, to violate the laws, to which mankind are naturally too prone. Now, we know that there are but two ways to prevent the perpetration of fraud upon the revenue, arising from an impost upon the importation of merchandise; one is, to lay the duties so low as not to offer an inducement to smuggling; the other is, by increasing the impediments and risk, so as to counterbalance the temptation. The checks and precautions ought to amount to a complete evidence that the law cannot be evaded, otherwise we not only suffer a loss of money but of reputation also. Taking it upon this principle, I am at a loss to imagine how gentlemen can suppose they can collect thirty or forty per cent. on the value of goods imported, unless our laws are better constructed than the laws of other nations. In those countries, where the best regulations have been adopted upon the experience of ages, it is found impossible, in cases of high duties, to prevent illicit trade; how can we, then, who have not that experience, nor a more nervous Executive, expect to raise forty per cent. in the first instance? For my part, I despair of it. What grounds have gentlemen for entertaining such ideas? Do they think there is any thing in our local situation to enable them to make sure work of it? They have told us, that the Governments of the Southern and Middle States heretofore collected the duties with tolerable certainty. I admit it, because there are natural causes existing there rendering the collection practicable; but there are no such causes to the Eastward. The Chesapeake and Delaware are the two great avenues through which the navigation must enter into those countries; the other avenues are few, and may be easily guarded. Add to this another consideration, that their trade is principally carried on in large vessels, and by foreigners; their citizens are generally concerned in agriculture. These circumstances compounded operate thus. If they are subjected to high duties, strangers have less knowledge of the country, and are without the connexion necessary to insure success to smuggling; besides, the people, considering the money as coming out of the pockets of foreigners, are more desirous of having it paid with certainty, than they would probably be if it was demanded of their friend and neighbor. But let us consider the situation of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. The foreign shipping employed in their trade is very inconsiderable, consequently the motive which operates in Virginia will be insensibly felt in those States; but the citizens of Massachusetts are generally a commercial people, the greater proportion along the coast are engaged in commerce. Perhaps, if I thought so highly of State honors as the subject demands, I might be concerned at being obliged to speak the truth; but the duty I owe to the Union induces me to forego every consideration of that nature. If I am under an impression that your laws will be unpopular, and left without that support from the people necessary for their due execution, I must come forward and warn you of the danger. From the experience we have had of the opposition of our people to the British acts of Parliament, because they were either unjust or unpopular, I am led to fear, if the same opinion is entertained with respect to our ordinances, that they will be defeated in a similar manner. The habit of smuggling pervades our country. We were taught it when it was considered rather as meritorious than criminal; therefore we have just reason to apprehend their success in evading the public impositions, although the temptations should be small.

The State of Massachusetts has a prodigious extent of seacoast, of near one thousand miles in length, indented with innumerable bays and rivers, forming the finest, most accessible, and secure harbors in the world. It must be impossible to guard them all, even if our population was crowded; add to this, that there are two thousand sail of vessels, large and small, coming in and going out constantly. If this statement is true, I ask gentlemen whether a law can be enforced that is repugnant to the judgment, feelings, and interests of so large a proportion of the people, possessing every possible advantage to elude your grasp? The former Government, with a watchful vigilance and anxious desire, endeavored in vain to seize this object. The State Government, instituted by the people themselves for their particular benefit, have hitherto been unable to execute laws of this nature. If the same cause for evasion exists under the General Government, will it not produce the same effect? I know of no peculiar power residing in us that the State Governments were not in the possession of at the time they made unsuccessful efforts to obtain revenue by a system of high duties: what, then, do we expect? The merchants are to associate, and form a phalanx in our support; private honor is to be called in aid of public measures. If this is done, what then? I have no doubt of the virtue and patriotism of many of these gentlemen; the most respectable merchants will disdain to smuggle; but there will ever be found a band of inferior characters, I care not what you call them, infamous parasites, ready to defraud your revenue by evasion, or any other means in their power. These men will get the business into their hands, and being under no restraint of honor or virtue, rob you by secret means of the great essential to the well-being of the Government. It will become impracticable to support it by other means, and we shall stand a monument of imbecility to future ages.

If gentlemen will consider how large a revenue may be drawn from the commerce of this extensive and fertile country, they will know the value of the stake they play for, and not risk it at a single cast. If we begin with laying moderate duties, it will redound to our honor, and give our constituents a confidence in the Government. When this shall be well established, and when they find themselves happy under its benign influence, they will be bound by an interest arising from experience, as well as by principle, to support you. Under these manifestations of mutual regard, the duties may increase as the wants of Government demand, without exciting clamor or complaint. If my principles are right, and they rest upon the sure basis of experience, it will not be enough that gentlemen say our duties will probably be collected; they must go further, and demonstrate that there cannot be a reasonable doubt entertained of our success. The magnitude of the object we risk demands as great a degree of certainty as to its effects as the nature of the case will admit. If a heavy impost is the least beyond what the powers of Government can reach, a punctual collection of the difference in the duties will not compensate for the hazard we engage in.

I submit it to gentlemen to say, whether there is any other reason for laying high duties but what arises from pecuniary considerations? If there be not, and it is well known that a moderate duty realizes as much revenue as a high one, gentlemen will concur in the reduction. It is easy to determine by experience, that it will be agreeable to the citizens; if so, it will bring them in individually to the aid of the Government, which they will learn to venerate and obey. How much better is this than holding out temptations for men to enrich themselves and beggar your treasury, to trample on your laws, and despise the Government itself?

Mr. MADISON.—The right understanding of this subject is of great importance. The discussion has been drawn out to a very considerable length on former occasions. The chain of ideas on which the subject is suspended, is not very long, nor consists of many links. The present Constitution was framed to supply the defects of the one that has preceded it. The great and material defects of it are well known to have arisen from its inability to provide for the demands of justice and security of the Union. To supply those defects, we are bound to fulfil the public engagements; expectation is anxiously waiting the result of our deliberations; it cannot be satisfied without a sufficient revenue to accomplish its purposes. We cannot obtain the money any other way but by taxation. Among the various objects of this nature, an impost on merchandise imported is preferable to all others, and among the long list of articles included in the bill, there is not one more proper for the purpose than the article under consideration. The public sentiment has strongly pointed it out as an object of revenue. I conceive, therefore, that it will be our duty to draw from this source all the money that it is capable of yielding. I am sure that it will not exceed our wants, nor extend to the injury of our commerce. How far the powers of Government are capable of going on this occasion, is matter of opinion; we have had no direct experiment of what can be done under the energy and popularity of the new system; we must recur to other sources for information, and then, unless the circumstances are alike, the comparison may not be true. We have been referred to the experience of other nations; if that is to guide us on this subject, I am sure we shall find precedents for going much further than is now proposed. If I do not mistake the calculations that I have seen of duties on importation, they amount to more on an average than fifteen per cent.; the duty on ardent spirits in all nations exceeds what is in contemplation to be laid in the United States. I am sensible that the means which are used by those nations to ensure the collection, would be odious and improper in this country; but I believe the means which this country is capable of using, without exciting complaint or incurring too much expense, would be as adequate to secure a duty of fifteen per cent. as the powers of any other nation could be to obtain ninety or one hundred per cent. If we consult the experience of the United States, it does not admonish us that we are proceeding too far; there are duties now under collection, in some States, that amount nearly to the same as those we have in contemplation. A duty collected under the feeble operation of the State Governments, cannot be supposed beyond our powers, when those duties have been collected by them, with feeble powers, but under a competition, not to say opposition, of the neighboring States. I am led, from a knowledge of these circumstances, to believe that when we have established some general rule, and have the co-operation of all the members of the Union, we shall be able to do what is proposed by this bill, better than any one State could execute it with its separate strength. If we consult the opinion of the merchants, we shall not find them a very sure guide. Merchants do not pretend to infallibility; but if they did, they have given a proof to the contrary, by their difference of opinion on this subject. Gentlemen of that profession, both within these walls and out of doors, have been as much divided on this point as any other description of men. I believe them to be the best informed as to the probable effects of an impost system, but they are not exempt from the infirmities of human nature. We know there is an essential difference between the interest of merchants and the interest of commerce; we know there may be distinctions also between the interest of commerce and of revenue; and that in some cases we must sacrifice the one to the other. I am not sure that we are not under the necessity of doing both in the business before us. It is barely matter of opinion what revenue the General Government will be able to draw from the system now proposed. This being the case, I have endeavored to make up mine, from the best materials in my power. I pay great respect to the opinions of mercantile gentlemen, and am willing to concede much to them, so far as their opinions are regulated by experience; but if I am to be guided by this information, it will not lead me to agree to the reduction of the duties in the manner contemplated for. It is said, that if we reduce at all, we must go through the whole. Now I doubt whether the duty on the article of rum exceeds that proportion which pervades the long list before us. It does not amount to more than thirty per cent., while some other articles stand at forty; some articles again that are not enumerated, but which fall within the general mass at five per cent., are more likely to be introduced clandestinely than this article, if it stood at fifty per cent. I am sure, if we reduce the whole system in the manner now proposed, all the duty we shall be able to collect will be very incompetent to what the public necessities demand. We must turn our eyes, then, to some other source that will fill up the deficiency. There are but two objects to which, in this dilemma, we can have recourse—direct taxation and excises. Direct taxation is not contemplated by any gentleman on this floor, nor are our constituents prepared for such a system of revenue; they expect it will not be applied to, until it is found that sufficient funds cannot be obtained in any other way. Excises would give particular disgust in some States, therefore gentlemen will not make up the deficiency from that quarter. I think, upon the whole, it is better to try what will be produced by a plan which is favored by the public sentiment. This will give a support to our laws equal to the greatest energy of a strong execution. The citizens of America know that their individual interest is connected with the public. We shall then have the strong motive of interest acting in favor of the Government in a peculiar manner. But I am not inclined to trust too much to this security. I would take in the aid of the best regulations in our power to provide; these, acting in concert, would give a moral certainty to the faithful collection of the revenue. But if gentlemen notwithstanding will persist in contending against such a system, and cannot offer us a substitute, we must fail of the primary object for which the Government was created. If upon experience we find that the duties cannot be safely collected, it may be proper to reduce them; but if we get them too low in the first instance, and they do not yield a sufficiency to answer the just demands of the public creditors and the expenses of Government, the public reputation must suffer.

I need not inform gentlemen we are surrounded with difficulties; they are seen on every side; but they appear as few and as surmountable on the side of the bill, as they do in any other part of the prospect. If we give way on this article, we are to do so upon all others. It is not for any reason peculiar to Jamaica spirits that the reduction is moved for; hence, I conceive, if gentlemen meet with success in opposing this duty, we shall be reduced to a system inadequate to our wants, and thereby defeat the chief object of our appointment. Mr. BLAND.—I join with the gentlemen who are disposed to lower the duties. Although I feel the necessity we are under of raising revenue, as much as any other gentleman possibly can, yet I think we ought to deliberate fully upon the means before we adopt them. It is demonstrable, nay, it is self-evident, that laying high duties, in the first instance, will beget smuggling; and I fear our regulations respecting the collection, will prove the impracticability of defeating the practice. But when we come to consider the subject in another point of view, I trust such a system will be found unnecessary. The enumerated articles in this bill are very numerous; they are taxed from fifty per cent. downwards; the general mass pays five per cent. The calculations made by the late Congress, who no doubt maturely considered the subject, found a list of eight articles only, and those at one-fourth, or one-fifth of the rate now proposed, would produce a revenue of nine hundred and fifteen thousand six hundred and fifty-six dollars annually.

When we add to this calculation a circumstance of notoriety, the increase of our importation, we shall find that we levy, or mean to levy, greater sums than the public necessities require. There will not be found specie enough within the United States to pay the duties: four times the rate of what the former Congress recommended will produce three millions six hundred thousand dollars. The enumeration is four times as great also; hence we may infer that the amount will reach thirteen or fourteen millions. At least, we shall be convinced that we are upon too high a scale. But where is the necessity of raising the impost to this degree? There are other means of revenue, and such as will not give disgust. We have already proposed a duty on tonnage; there is the Post Office, and some other things which the ingenuity of Government can devise, and is entitled to, for the purpose of revenue; if it is therefore unnecessary to levy such oppressive taxes, what other pretext can be set up for adopting the system? Independent of every other consideration, this ought to induce us to lower them. But there are other and weighty considerations; but as they have been well urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ARES,) I shall not touch upon them. It is said that it is merely matter of opinion whether they are too high or not; if so, let us be careful not to venture too far on such ground. It will be much better to reduce it in the manner proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, and increase it hereafter, than strain the measure too high at present.

Mr. SHERMAN.—After this subject had been debated in a Committee of the Whole, and then in the House, upon the report, and every argument that could be thought of had been urged, both on the general and particular amount of the duties proposed, and the probable effects of a deduction, I did not expect to have heard the same debate take place again. Gentlemen have a large field to display their abilities in, but I do not think it contains any new matter that will induce a single gentleman to alter his opinion on the subject. The great object is to raise a sum of money adequate to supply our wants; and let us dispute as we will about the mode, the fact is it must be raised. The people have sent their representatives here for this purpose; it is for their benefit that we raise the money; and not for any peculiar advantage to ourselves; the objects are to pay the debt, and to provide for the general welfare of the community. The first of these objects I take to be, that we pay our debts. There are very many meritorious characters who furnished us with essentials in the hour of imminent danger, who, from the imbecility of our former Government, have not been able to get even the interest of what they loaned us. I believe it is the first wish of the people throughout the United States to do justice to the public creditors, and to do it in such a manner, that each may contribute an equal part according to his abilities. We have very considerable arrears due on this account, upon not only the domestics but foreign debt; there are several instalments not yet discharged, and considerable of the interest not yet paid. No statement can be made of the expenses of Government, so as to ascertain what quantity of revenue will be demanded on that head, but saying that they will be much the same under this Government as the former, and we shall have occasion for a very considerable sum to defray the expenses. I believe we are not able to make a very accurate calculation of what the system proposed in the bill will yield. The late Congress contemplated a million of dollars from this source, which, in aid of the requisition, they supposed sufficient for the purpose of paying the instalments of the national debt and interest; but that sum alone will now be found very short of what is wanted, without the aid of direct taxes. It is very material that we lay the burden as equal as possible, in whatever mode we pursue to obtain revenue: a great deal of care has been taken in distributing the proportion with equity; I apprehend, therefore, that we shall not be able to make it much more equitable by any alteration than it is at present. I think, also, that the people will pay more freely a duty of this nature than they will in direct taxes. If gentlemen prevail in getting the duties lowered to what the late Congress proposed, they will find themselves obliged to have recourse to direct taxation for a million and a half, or two millions of dollars. It then only remains for us to consider, whether it will be more agreeable to the people to reduce the impost in this manner, and raise the deficiency by direct taxes. If these duties are to be considered as a tax on the trading part of the community alone, they are improper; but this, I believe, is not the case; the consumer pays them eventually, and they pay no more than they choose, because they have it in their power to determine the quantity of taxable articles they will use. A tax left to be paid at discretion must be more agreeable than any other. The merchant considers that part of his capital applied to the payment of the duties

Duties on Imports.

[MAY, 1789.]

the same as if employed in trade, and gets the same profit upon it, as on the original cost of the commodity.

As to the tax on distilled spirit, it will be felt as little as any other whatever; and from this source we are to expect a very considerable proportion of the revenue. If we attend to what every body says abroad, we shall have a great deal to do, for there is a great variety of opinion. I have received information from a gentleman of knowledge and experience on this point, and he says that it is his opinion, and the general opinion of those about him, that the duty on distilled spirits is too low by one half: the same are the sentiments even of the importers of this article. The duty on it cannot be said to be unequal, as it has been contended on other articles; it is pretty generally consumed throughout the United States. The State I belong to is at a considerable distance from the West Indies, yet she consumes no inconsiderable quantity, much more than I wish she did. The gentleman from South Carolina seems to suppose that the duty will bear harder upon his State than upon others. I cannot think it will be the case; but if they consume more, they should agree to a high duty, in order to lessen the consumption. As to the subject of collection, they refer us to what was done under the Government of Britain: in my opinion the comparison does not hold good. It was thought lawful by the people of America to evade those duties, because they were unconstitutionally laid; they were not represented in the Parliament of Great Britain, and it is a principle that taxation is founded upon representation. As to the collection of the State duties since the peace, I think the Governments have labored under greater disadvantages than the United States will under this system; the duties that were collected by them went into the treasury of the particular State into which the goods were imported; the people who consumed those goods in other States, thought it a peculiar hardship to pay into their funds what they thought ought to belong to the United States. The great embarrassment arose from this inequality; under the present system, each State will pay alike, and will be alike benefited.

One gentleman has observed, that there is not money enough to pay all the duties imposed in this bill; but is it not as easy to introduce money as merchandise? When there is a demand for it, the merchants will bring it in, for they can as well bring less of a commodity and more money; so that, if this should take place, the objection will be done away. It is in this way that we must be supplied with cash, because we have neither gold nor silver mines to draw it from; if we get it, it must be imported and will be imported, if it is more advantageous than the importation of other articles.

I think we ought to rely a great deal on the virtue of our constituents; they will be convinced of the necessity of a due collection of the revenue; they will know that it must be done in this way, or it will be by direct taxation. I believe the people will prefer this mode of raising revenue, and will give all the assistance in the execution of the law that is in their power; and as the mercantile part of the people will see that it is equally laid, though it may be something higher than the States have hitherto required, they will submit themselves to our ordinance, and use their influence to aid the collection. I know there will be some characters concerned in an illicit trade, acting without principle, but I think we can restrain them. If there is a degree of infamy attached to the wretches concerned in smuggling, and the practice is detested by the community, a man will scarcely be able to carry on such trade with advantage. It appears to me, therefore, that we had best let the system remain as it is; the duties are reasonable, and will operate as equitably on the people at large as practicable; it will, at the same time that it raises revenue, tend to enrich the country, by promoting the industry and economy of our citizens.

Mr. WHITE.—When this system first came before the committee, I was opposed to enter into an enumeration, because I supposed much time would be taken up in the discussion, which would be an absolute loss of revenue, perhaps to a greater amount than the difference between the duties of such a system and the one proposed by the late Congress; but as it was thought proper by the committee to proceed in the way that we have done, it would be presumption in me to say, that the duty on every article has been perfectly digested and properly laid, but I believe every article stands as well as can be upon the information we are in possession of. I believe very few, if any, of the articles can be disapproved of. The gentlemen last up has anticipated every thing that occurred to me on the subject. The question appears to turn upon this point, whether the duties can be collected or not? For my part I have no doubt but they can. It has justly been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. AMES) that money is the soul of government; that, without such a soul, government cannot exist; then it will be necessary that we obtain this vivifying principle. The most popular mode of doing it is by way of impost, and I believe it was a prevailing motive with the people to adopt the new Constitution. I am satisfied in my own mind that it will be the most agreeable and least oppressive of any mode in our power; if a popular measure could be effected without law, what may we not expect from the co-operation of both? Before the Revolution, a private commercial combination regulated the importations between America and Britain. If any man was suspected of an infraction of the non-importation agreement, his conduct was strictly watched; if his guilt was discovered, he was published and held up to the world as an enemy to his country. Something like this may be expected to take place now; because every man is convinced of the importance and necessity of enforcing the revenue laws of the Union. This, in addition to our legal establishments, will give an efficacy to public measures which other countries are unacquainted with.

Duties on Imports.

[H. of R.]

The Eastern States cannot be viewed in the odious light which is reflected upon them on account of their former conduct. That they combined in a system of smuggling was accident; it does not belong to their patriotic spirit; they are, I flatter myself, the friends of good government; they know the value of union, and would do nothing from principle to injure the general welfare. At the time when they defeated the machinations of a British Parliament to effect their ruin, they looked upon the measures not only as oppressive, but unconstitutional and unjust, and the man who opposed them with vigor and success was regarded as his country's friend. But the contrary will now be the case, and the man who shall aim at the destruction of his country by frauds on her revenue will be considered her greatest enemy. The man who can stab to the vitals and spill the heart's blood of the Government (for money is the vital principle) must be base indeed. These circumstances will make a deep impression on every mind, and each will furnish his individual aid to obtain the full and due execution of the law. If this spirit prevail, and become general, there will be no difficulty in carrying the regulation into operation.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—I have listened with an anxious desire of hearing something important on the question which now agitates the committee; but I must say that nothing of that kind has reached me. There has not a single argument been used this day but what has been urged before. After this remark it will not be expected that I should take up the time of the committee by making a reply to what I conceive has been fully replied to already. But as much has been said respecting the public opinion on the amount of the duties, I must beg them to excuse me a few words on that point.

With respect to the opinion of commercial men—and I live in a State where commerce is pretty well understood and pursued, a State whose imports are as great as any in the Union—from that quarter I have received information differing essentially from what has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts; so far are they from complaining of them in that State, that they think them rather low; they have no doubt as to the collection. Having heard the same sentiment from other quarters, I think, so far as the commercial opinion can be ascertained, I may venture to assert it is in favor of the duties agreed to. The particular article of spirits is peculiarly fitted for raising a considerable duty; it is of small value, great bulk, and general consumption. These are circumstances which make the revenue certain and important. If gentlemen believe rum an irresistible temptation at fifteen cents per gallon, they must imagine several articles charged but five per cent. ad valorem equally so, because they can be smuggled with greater profit and less risk of detection. A man can carry on his shoulders valuable goods subjected to a duty of five times as great an amount as what is charged upon a hoghead of rum. A pound of Hyson tea at two shillings is a greater incentive to smuggling than a gallon of rum at fifteen cents; yet I do not remember to have heard gentlemen contend against the duty on teas on that account. If revenue is to be raised by way of impost, we must select those articles that are least liable to become objects of illicit trade. I believe a proper attention has been paid to this point, and am, therefore, well satisfied with the list contained in the bill.

A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLEND) has said that the present scale of duties will raise a revenue of 13,000,000 dollars. If he is well founded in his opinion, most certainly the duties ought to be reduced, because it is a much larger sum than the wants of the Union require; but I cannot flatter myself into such a belief; thirteen millions of dollars is too great a sum to be expected, even if all the powers and exertions of Congress were drawn into action. But let us examine what may be the wants of the United States during the current year. The expense on the civil list cannot be estimated with accuracy for want of an establishment of the various departments; but it will probably equal the expense of the late Congress, if you conceive the members of the Legislature to be paid but of the Federal Treasury; add to this the sums stated to be arrears by an estimate I have seen from the Board of Treasury, it will amount to four millions five hundred and ninety-seven thousand dollars; then the instalments of the foreign debt, together with interest on the same, and interest on the domestic debt, for which provision remains to be made, will probably increase it to eight millions of dollars. Now, if gentlemen apprehend we shall raise more revenue than that sum within the current year, it will operate as a strong motive upon them to vote for the reduction of the duties; and if gentlemen suppose that the duty is so high upon rum as to convince them it will inevitably be evaded, it will be a sufficient argument to induce them to vote for the present motion.

The collection of our revenue has been compared to the collection of Great Britain; but she collects four shillings sterling per gallon on West India rum, six times as much as we have agreed to, and yet I believe a very unimportant quantity of Jamaica spirits is smuggled into that kingdom. The smuggling trade is mostly carried on from France and the Netherlands, in small vessels, where the risk and insurance is inconsiderable. I believe large vessels are very seldom concerned in such contraband trade, because they hazard more than overbalances every consideration of profit resulting from success. The circumstances of America and Britain are different; America is remote from commercial nations, and European goods that are made dutiable by this law must generally be imported in vessels of considerable value. If the owner attempts to save a part of the duties, or evade the laws, he will risk the whole, for, I trust, Congress will not neglect any security that may be derived from sufficient penalties upon the violators of the law. For my part, I have no doubt but the revenue will be faithfully collected; but certainly there are many other articles more liable to objection on this account than rum, yet there was no adverse argument urged against them: therefore I suppose the committee were satisfied with them as they stand. Mr. Ames.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania set out with informing us that nothing new had or could be offered on the subject; yet you found, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman had a good deal to say, which I thought new and much to the purpose. As to applying the observation to myself, in common with the advocates for low duties, I shall decline it, only noting that the long discussion which the subject has had would restrain me from rising on this occasion more than any remarks of the nature made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and Connecticut; but I am actuated by higher motives than a regard to my own feelings, otherwise I should come reluctantly forward to press arguments which the committee may be fatigued with listening to. But I feel such strong impressions on my mind, with regard to the effects our impost law is likely to produce, that I cannot pass it over with a silent vote. I must admonish gentlemen that the events, which may result from our present measures are of the most alarming nature. When I was up before, I endeavored to show the degree of power the Government could exercise without being charged with an ill administration.

I shall now proceed briefly to consider the arguments used in reply to what has been advanced by the advocates for moderate duties. I believe it is a good rule to judge of the strength of a cause by the arguments used to defend it; and here I must take the liberty of saying that the gentlemen on the other side of the question have adduced not one to support their opinion that has carried conviction to my mind. I consider that, by a decision of this question, the good which the new Government is expected to produce may be rendered problematical. Though I am fully impressed with the necessity there is for revenue to supply the public expenses, yet I cannot believe we are likely to obtain more by heavy duties than by temperate ones, and it is to this point that my arguments tend. I do not believe that in either case we shall procure fully sufficient to supply the public demands. If we have to procure eight millions of dollars, I venture to say not near the half could be raised by an impost system; but admitting that it could by a high scale of duties for the first year, it could not be done in the subsequent ones. Now, I regard this as a permanent system of revenue rather than a productive one; if it is laid high, you will find your collection annually diminish. Now, will any Government take such measures in gathering in its harvest as to ruin the soil? Will they rack-rent their tenants in such a manner as to deprive them of the means of improving the estate? Such can never be the policy of this enlightened country. We know, from the fundamental principles of republics, that public opinion gives the tone to every action of the Government—the laws ought to correspond with the habits and manners, nay, I may almost add, wishes of the people.

Well, Mr. Chairman, we are told a tax upon rum is popular; I will agree with the gentleman; but still a high duty will induce people to run it, and though the consumer may pay the tax without complaining, yet it will go into the pockets of individuals who defraud your revenue. Gentlemen have complained that we do not offer a substitute for what we find fault with. I will endeavor to explain a system I would place in the room of this. I would reduce the duties generally so low as to hold out no encouragement to smuggling; in this case it is more than probable the amount of the impost at the end of one year would exceed the collection under the present rate. By giving this proof of moderation and wisdom, we should obtain the public favor and confidence; the Government would be acquiring strength, its movements would be more certain, and we could in every subsequent year extend the system and make the whole productive; then it would be in the power of Government, by aids, to improve our agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. Our imports are now very great; by the increase of our commerce we shall probably find our revenue produce twice as much seven years hence as it can be expected to do at present.

The duty on West India rum is moderate and popular, say gentlemen; it is not the interest of Massachusetts that it should be reduced; so I am arguing against the interest of the State I have the honor to represent. The higher the duty on West India rum, the more country rum will be posited in my hands if I were to be actuated by a local motive of this nature. The higher the duty, the more officers must be multiplied, the more guards must be employed, the more troops must be kept in pay, for the suppression of clandestine trade. Under high duties, the people will pay much, the Government receive little. Will they not, then, justly complain of the useless burdens you have imposed? Useless I call them, unless Government have in contemplation to make them conducive to oppress and injure their constituents. If you punish severely the breach of your laws, will not the people combine against them? Will it not be an additional source of dissatisfaction, that the attempts to relieve them are unsuccessful? If gentlemen consider this subject seriously, they will see cause to be alarmed. Who, in this case, can you apply to for support? Not to the people, they want an alleviation of their miseries; you have, then, nothing left but the impotency of a Government not sufficiently matured to support itself.

Gentlemen say that the funds to be produced by the proposed impost are insufficient for the public demands; if so, why not stop somewhat shorter? If we must have recourse to some other mode of obtaining revenue, let us divide the burden, and not destroy one means will not it too heavily; if we do, the other means will not only have its own proportion to sustain, but the accumulation of its weakened fellow. Or, do gentlemen suppose they will clear the United States of incumbrances by one effort? They do not. Why are we to grasp at so much in this way? It would be much better to call in the aid of other taxes and excises, than, by overloading, depress one of the most capable and valuable funds in our possession. Under the British Government, they have excise, stamp duties, impost, malt, and land-tax, from which to defray their expenses; why should we endeavor to do that with a single fund, when we have more in our power?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Fitzsimons) has mentioned the great probability there is of getting a great duty from this article, because the consumption is more extensive in the United States than in any other part of the world; but this circumstance will furnish a strong inducement to smuggle. He says there is but a small quantity of rum smuggled into England. Gentlemen no doubt consider that Great Britain is an island well watched; her cutters and custom-house boats are ever on the look-out; but, with all these guards, and the advantage of her insular situation, she is unable to prevent smuggling.

It has been remarked, that under the State laws, experience has taught us that such duties as the bill has in contemplation can be collected; and the gentleman says, if they be collected under the State laws, they can be collected under this Government. If they have been able to collect high duties in Virginia, it is because their trade is confined to enter at one channel. But it is not so with the Eastern States; there every attempt to raise high duties has proved ineffectual; and the universal opinion there is, that five per cent. would be more productive of revenue than fifty. This is not mere matter of opinion, as has been said, but is demonstrable from facts.

The principle of taxation is to produce the greatest sum of money with the greatest ease to the community. If a gentleman in trade has on hand a cargo of rum, he is able to afford it at a less price than the person who imports it subject to these duties; therefore, the latter will be under the necessity of smuggling, or storing his commodities, for he cannot afford to sell at a loss. A gentleman has mentioned, that if we do not succeed in the collection of these duties, we may lower them. But will any gentleman say, that if we lose our duty by the establishment of a system of smuggling, we shall not continue to lose after the law shall be repealed, and a lower rate of duties is imposed? If gentlemen depend upon this fund alone, I think they ought not to strain it too much; though I do not know why we should not take to our aid an excise duty; it certainly is not unpopular as it respects the distillation of spirits. If I were an enemy to the Constitution, I should be an advocate for high duties; because it would disgust the people, and render the Government unpopular; but, as I am a sincere friend to the Government now established, and desire its perpetuity, I am against any measure which I think will endanger its existence.

Mr. Madison.—Let us compare the probable amount of the revenue proposed to be raised by this system, with what is raised in Great Britain, and we shall be apt to infer that they are not so oppressive as gentlemen seem to insinuate. Taking the highest estimate that I have heard mentioned, and it will not produce three millions of dollars. The population of the United States exceeds three millions of souls, hence the tax does not amount to one dollar per head. Great Britain, on the highest estimation, does not contain eight millions of inhabitants, and has an annual revenue to provide of thirteen millions sterling. It is true she has recourse to other means beside an impost for the purpose of obtaining such a revenue; but those other means are certainly more objectionable in that country, and would be much more so here. Each individual of that kingdom pays eight times as much as is required by the United States; now, where is the propriety of making a comparison between them?

Mr. Baldwin asked if the Government of the United States of America was four or five times worse to be administered than the Governments in Europe? Whether the public opinion was four or five times more unfavorable to such an administration? If these questions are answered in the affirmative, then the inferences which gentlemen have drawn of the impracticability of collecting the duties laid in the bill, are just. But this is not allowing the General Government the common chance of executing its laws. If it were the wisest Government on earth, it might be allowed a chance of doing one quarter of what others perform. If we find by experience, that we are too weak to execute a system which is so much easier than other nations have adopted, it may be proper to alter it. We shall be better able to judge how far we are likely to succeed, when the bill for the collection of the revenue is brought forward. Such a bill is now in the hands of a committee, and it is to be hoped, when they report it, it will be found sufficient to insure the collection; till then, it will be best to continue the rate as it stands.

Mr. Bourne.—When we consider the arguments of gentlemen on both sides of this question, we shall find they do not differ so much as, on a superficial view, gentlemen may be led to imagine. It is agreed, that a revenue must be obtained adequate to our wants; but some gentlemen think we shall not receive a greater sum because we lay a high duty; in this opinion I am with them. I think the present is a favorable time to lay an impost duty, and expect very considerable aid from the public spirit; but I am in favor of a low duty, because I would do nothing to check that spirit. If we lay high duties, and a man finds smuggling the most profitable business he can follow, we shall have to contend with private interest. If we lay a light duty of thirty or forty per cent., the temptation will be too strong for resistance, and the sum collected may not amount to ten per cent. on the whole importation; whereas, if we lay twenty or fifteen per cent., the whole may probably be collected, and the treasury be better filled, because it does not hold out so strong an inducement to evade the payment of the duties. Another objection has been stated which is of great weight: a system of high duties will necessarily engage us in a system of drawbacks. If we are forced into this measure, it will be a great injury to the revenue.

We ought also to consider the inconvenience to which high duties will subject our merchants. It is a common case in America that our mercantile capitals are limited. Gentlemen engaged in commerce can ill spare so large a proportion in the payment of duties.

It has been mentioned by gentlemen, that Great Britain collects four shillings sterling per gallon on rum; yet she is exposed to great difficulties in obtaining it. But I ask gentlemen, whether Great Britain ever laid such a high duty in the first instance as we are about to impose? I believe they did not: they began, I apprehend, with moderate duties, and increased them as circumstances authorized, when the people became habituated to the imposition. This is the very principle I wish to adopt, and show the world that our conduct is founded in wisdom, propriety, and experience. If we shall discover our mistake in laying high duties, and are driven by necessity to reduce them, such measures will operate to the injury of the fair trader; whereas, if we increase them by degrees, it will be rather favorable to their interest than otherwise; at all events, it will injure none.

If a sense of the committee could be obtained on a general reduction of ten or fifteen per cent. on the rate the articles now stand at, I should be glad to vote in favor of such a motion; but I could not approve of reducing the article of rum alone, because I do not think it charged out of proportion with the others.

Mr. JACKSON differed from his colleague, (Mr. BALDWIN.) He thought, although the British laid four shillings on rum, they did not collect it; and that their custom-house establishments were so expensive as to leave a mere trifle for the net produce of the impost duty. If America employed such a host of revenue officers as to secure the payment of high duties, there would be very little left, after compensating their services, to supply the federal treasury.

Mr. WADSWORTH desired gentlemen to consider that the citizens of the United States owned vessels as well calculated for smuggling as any that were employed between the Netherlands and England; therefore, they had little more security against smuggling than Great Britain.

Mr. JACKSON.—It was well observed by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. WADSWORTH,) that America has vessels well adapted for smuggling: I can declare it from my own knowledge, to be the fact. It is not, Mr. Chairman, the large vessels coming off long voyages that we are to apprehend danger from; it is our coasters, small vessels constantly coming in and going out; these can run goods from foreign ports adjacent to the United States; they are best acquainted with the unfrequented parts, where they can deposit their cargoes with safety, and will make use of these advantages to defraud your revenue.

With regard to the equity of the impost system, I conceive direct taxation will be more equitable. We, in the Southern States, shall then pay in proportion to our numbers; but under this law we shall contribute much more.

Gentlemen talk of improving the morals of the people by taxation. For my part, I conceive revenue has nothing to do with the morals of the people; therefore such considerations, have no weight on my mind. All that I contemplate is, drawing as much money as we can with equity; and here I believe more can be obtained by a less impost than by a greater; therefore, I am in favor of reducing the duties. It will likewise be more honorable to the Government to begin gradually and win the affections of the people, rather than disgust them by oppressive measures; for, if we lose their confidence, we lose our power and authority.

Mr. GERRY.—It appears to me, that gentlemen place their arguments on the name of high duties, rather than on principle; for if they were certain that the energy of Government would effect all they aspire at, then it would follow, that we have nothing more to do than to name the sum we want. But if these ideas are not well supported, the superstructure they have raised upon them must fall to the ground. The energy of your Government depends upon the approbation of the people. No doubt the citizens of the United States will support the Government they have adopted, so long as they approve the measures it pursues, but no longer. Gentlemen trust much, on this occasion, to the co-operation which they expect from their constituents; but I would wish them to examine this argument. These duties are to be collected from the several States into which certain goods are imported. If the people of Massachusetts shall conceive any particular duty peculiarly oppressive on them, they will seek to evade it. This opens a door for smuggling all the other articles.

I conceive gentlemen to be mistaken with respect to the effects which high duties will produce on the mercantile interest. I think there cannot be a doubt but they will be obliged to smuggle; if they mean to continue their business, their capital will be insufficient for the purposes of commerce and the payment of high duties. Gentlemen will not draw knowledge from the experience of Great Britain; therefore, it is unnecessary to adduce her example. But let us see what we are taught by the practice of our own States. Massachusetts drew a very considerable revenue from an impost; she lately tried to increase it by doubling the duties; but, instead of doing so, they found the revenue lessened, and they were obliged to alter what they had so injudiciously attempted. I am willing to suppose with gentlemen, that the Government is invested by the Constitution with sufficient energy to carry any regulation of this kind into effect; but is this the time to try the energy of your Government, when your commerce is struggling with every kind of difficulty and embarrassment? Formerly, our merchants were able to extend their operations by the means of an established credit in Britain; but unfortunately this is no longer the case. How, then, is it possible they can continue their trade when you lop off another part of their capital? Besides, as was said by the worthy gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BEARD,) there is not money enough in the United States to pay the duties. I believe it is well known, that our commerce is greatly distressed by the universal want of specie; there has not been less in circulation for many years than there is at this time. Gentlemen who have property cannot convert it into money; then how will the merchant be able to raise cash for the payment of duties equal to thirty or forty per cent. on his capital? These are serious and alarming circumstances, and such as prove to my mind that commerce was never less able to bear a high impost than at present, nor ever stood in greater need of the fostering hand of Government for its support. If gentlemen are convinced of the truth of these observations, and they are so notorious that they cannot have escaped the knowledge of any one, they will see the necessity of turning their attention to the encouragement of navigation and trade, rather than think of drawing an oppressive revenue from them.

When gentlemen compare these duties with those collected in Great Britain, they ought to consider that the mercantile capital in this country bears no kind of proportion to the capital of that kingdom. When gentlemen tell us that England raises four times as much by way of impost, do they not know that the capital engaged in the commerce of that nation is ten times as great as in America? If they admit this, then it follows that we cannot pretend, with equal ease, to levy a quarter of what is there collected.

I do not pretend to deny the necessity we are under of raising revenue, or that an impost is the most certain and agreeable means in our power; but I contend against straining the duties so high as to make them burdensome, and occasion the establishment of a clandestine trade, which will prove destructive of the end we aim at.

Mr. MADISON submitted, whether the burden would not operate more on the Southern States than the Northern. The duties could be collected in the Middle States, this was proved by the experience of some years; for they had collected in those States, in many instances, duties nearly equal to what were proposed. In the Eastern States, it was the interest of the manufacturers to see the duties were well collected; they had been imposed to favor their interests. The distillers would exert themselves in aiding the Government to collect the duty on foreign rum, because it particularly interfered with country rum; from hence he concluded that the impost could be collected with tolerable certainty even in that country most convenient for carrying on a clandestine trade.

Mr. AMES contended that it would be the particular interest of one set of men to evade the payment of the duties. As mankind was governed by interest, it required all the attention of the Government to prevent a breach of the law; because, when the banks and bulwarks of defence were once broken down, the full tide of clandestine commerce would overflow the country. Gentlemen recollected the circumstances which attended the depreciation of the late Continental money. Some persons, from motives of interest or necessity, first made a distinction between it and specie, and although every exertion was made by the patriotic among our citizens to prevent the alarming evil, yet every thing was insufficient; they were at length obliged to acquiesce in measures they could not prevent. This was the case on that occasion, and will be the case whenever our laws or regulations run counter to private interest.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. AMES) has said, that because we cannot raise the whole sum necessary to supply our wants, we should be content to stop half way. I know we shall not be able to obtain money enough by the impost to pay off our whole debt, but then I wish to raise as much as possible in this way. I believe the people are able to pay as much as the necessities of the Government require; if they are not, we shall never restore the public credit, which is one of the chief ends of our appointment. I believe they are not only able but willing to contribute sufficient for this purpose. The resources of this country are very great if they are properly called into action; and although they may not be so great as those of Britain, yet it should be remembered, that nation has occasion for twelve times as much revenue as the United States.

Gentlemen have had recourse to popular opinion in support of their arguments. Popular opinion is founded in justice, and the only way to know if the popular opinion is in favor of a measure, is to examine whether the measure is just and right in itself. I think whatever is proper and right, the people will judge of and comply with. The people wish that the Government may derive respect from the justice of its measures; they have given it their support on this account. I believe the popular opinion is in favor of raising a revenue to pay our debts, and if we do right, they will not neglect their duty; therefore, the arguments that are urged in favor of a low duty will prove that the people are contented with what the bill proposes. The people at this time pay a higher duty on imported rum than what is proposed in this system, even in Massachusetts; it is true it is partly laid by way of excise, but I can see no reason against doing it in this way as well as the other.

The article of molasses is a good deal used in that country, but I do not think it so much a necessary of life but that every citizen could live without it; and I believe the people would be very well contented to contribute their proportion of the public expenses by a small duty on that article. Those who consume foreign luxuries are generally able to pay for them. When gentlemen have recourse to public opinion, to support their arguments, they generally find means to accommodate it to their own; the reason why I think public opinion is in favor of the present measure is, because this regulation in itself is reasonable and just.

Some gentlemen think a system of moderate duties will be capable of improvement; every subsequent year they may be increased, and so become more and more productive. If we were on the eve of a war, in which it is presumable our expenses would increase, such policy might be proper; but as we want it only to pay a certain debt, the demand will decrease, and we shall have less occasion for an increase of revenue.

I think if we should not support public credit now we have the ability, the people will lose all confidence in the Government. When they see public bodies shrink from their duty, what can be expected but they will neglect theirs also? It cannot be for the interest of the people of the United States that they should continue to pay a high interest, and suffer an accumulation of the principal of the national debt till some distant period. Will any gentleman assure us that the people will then be better able to pay it off than at present? Have they any certain evidence that we shall grow richer as we delay the establishment of our credit and the payment of our debts? I think they have not; therefore it is best to get out of debt as fast as possible, and while we have the command of funds amply sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—It has been intimated by gentlemen in favor of high duties, that it will limit the consumption of foreign articles; if this be the case, the quantity imported will be lessened; if it is our object to raise revenue, it is certainly unwise to destroy the object from which the revenue is to be collected. It is supposed the amount of the duties will be insufficient to answer the public wants; and yet the public creditors have great expectations from this resource. Let us therefore be careful how we destroy it; if revenue is our primary object, and the other considerations but secondary, we should do nothing to operate against that principle.

Mr. MADISON.—It does not follow, because it will in some degree limit the consumption, that we ought not to lay a high duty on rum; if it has that effect, it will be an ample compensation for the loss of revenue; but probably, as we extinguish our debt, we shall have the less occasion for the revenue itself.

Mr. GOODRICH.—The object of the committee is to raise revenue, I take it. This would, perhaps, be best done by reducing the duty, but I am not inclined to reduce it so low as some gentlemen seem to desire; it may be reduced a few cents, and therefore I move to insert ten instead of twelve.

The question was taken for striking out the twelve cents, as it stood in the bill, on all spirits of Jamaica proof, imported from the dominions of nations in alliance with the United States, in order to leave it blank, to be filled up hereafter.

The House divided on the question; 19 in favor of the motion, and 26 against it. So it passed in the negative. Adjourned.

MONDAY, May 11.

A committee, consisting of Messrs. WHITE, SCOTT, and STURGIS, was appointed to confer with the committee appointed by the Senate, to view and report in what manner the rooms in the City Hall shall be appropriated.

ON TITLES.

The House took into consideration the message from the Senate, communicated on Saturday last, respecting the disagreement of the Senate to the report of a joint committee, on the subject of annexing titles to the offices of President and Vice President.

Mr. PARKER moved a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That this House having, on Tuesday last, adopted the report of their committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, stating, "That it is not proper to annex any style or title to the respective styles or titles of office expressed in the Constitution; and having, in their Address to the President of the United States, on Friday last, proceeded to act pursuant thereto, deem it improper to accede to the proposition made by the Senate, as communicated by their order of the 9th instant, for appointing a committee to confer with a committee of this House, in considering and reporting under what title it will be proper for the President of the United States in future to be addressed.

Mr. PAGE seconded the motion, observing, that in his opinion, the House had no right to interfere in the business; the Constitution expressly prescribed the power of Congress as to bestowing titles. He did not conceive the real honor or dignity of either of these situations to consist in high sounding titles. The House had, on a former occasion, expressed their disapprobation of any title being annexed to their own members, and very justly too. After having so fully and explicitly declared their sentiments against such measures, he thought it behooved them to be explicit with the Senate. Indeed, he felt himself a good deal hurt, that gentlemen on this floor, after having refused their permission to the Clerk to enter any more than their plain names on the journal, should be standing up and addressing one another by the title of "the honorable gentleman." He wished the practice could be got over, because it added neither to the honor nor dignity of the House.

Mr. LEE approved of the appointment of a committee to confer with a committee of the Senate, as the mode due to the occasion; but he was against adding any title.

Mr. TUCKER.—When this business was first brought before the House, I objected to the appointment of a committee to confer with a committee of the Senate, because I thought it a subject which this House had no right to take into consideration. I then stood single and unsupported.

ported in my opinion, but have had the pleasure to find since, that some gentlemen on this floor agree that I was right. If I was then right, I shall, from a stronger reasoning, be right now in opposing the appointment of another committee on the same subject. The joint committee reported that no titles ought to be given; we agreed to the report, and I was in hopes we should have heard no more of the matter. The Senate rejected the report, and have now sent us a resolution, expressive of a determination to give a title, to which they desire our concurrence. I am still of opinion that we were wrong in appointing the first committee, and think that we shall be guilty of greater impropriety if we now appoint another. What, sir, is the intention of this business? Will it not alarm our fellow-citizens? Will it not give them just cause of alarm? Will they not say, that they have been deceived by the convention, that framed the Constitution? That it has been contrived with a view to lead them on by degrees to that kind of government which they have thrown off with abhorrence? Shall we not justify the fears of those who were opposed to the Constitution, because they considered it as insidious and hostile to the liberties of the people? One of its warmest advocates, one of the framers of it, (Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania,) has recommended it by calling it a pure democracy. Does this look like a democracy, when one of the first acts of the two branches of the Legislature is to confer titles? Surely not. To give dignity to our Government, we must give a lofty title to our Chief Magistrate. Does the dignity of a nation consist in the distance between the first magistrate and his citizens? Does it consist in the exaltation of one man, and the humiliation of the rest? If so, the most despotic Government is the most dignified; and to make our dignity complete, we must give a high title, an embroidered robe, a princely equipage, and finally, a Crown and hereditary succession. Let us, sir, establish tranquility and good order at home, and wealth, strength, and national dignity will be the infallible result. The aggregate of dignity will be the same, whether it be divided among all, or centred in one. And whom, sir, do we mean to gratify? Is it our present President? Certainly, if we expect to please him, we shall be greatly disappointed. He has a real dignity of character, and is above such little vanities. We shall give him infinite pain; we shall do him an essential injury. We shall place him in a most delicate and disagreeable situation; we shall reduce him to the necessity of evincing to the world his disapprobation of our measures, or of risking some diminution of that high reputation for disinterested patriotism which he has so justly acquired. It is not for his gratification; for, whose, then, are we to do this? Where is the man among us who has the presumption and vanity to expect it? Who is it that shall say—for my aggrandizement three millions of people have entered into a calamitous war; they have persevered in it for eight long years; they have sacrificed their property, they have spilt their blood, they have rendered thousands of families wretched by the loss of their only protectors and means of support? This spirit of imitation, sir, this spirit of mimicry and apery will be the ruin of our country. Instead of giving us dignity in the eye of foreigners, it will expose us to be laughed at as apes. They gave us credit for our exertions in effecting the Revolution, but they will say that we want independence of spirit to render it a blessing to us.

Mr. TRUMBULL moved for the appointment of a Committee of Conference, to consider on the difference which appeared in the votes of the two Houses upon the report of the joint committee.

Mr. BURKE hoped the House would express their decided disapprobation of bestowing titles in any shape whatever; it would be an indignity in the House to countenance any measures of this nature. Perhaps some gentlemen might think the subject was a matter of indifference; but it did not appear to him in that light. The introduction of two worlds which he could mention into the title of these officers, would alter the Constitution itself; but he would forbear to say anything further, as he had a well-grounded expectation that the House would take no further notice of the business.

Mr. GOODRICH thought the conference unnecessary, because the House had not only adopted the report of their committee, but proceeded to act in pursuance thereof.

Mr. SENEY joined the last gentleman in sentiment, and thought it an unnecessary waste of time to give the subject any longer discussion.

Mr. MADISON.—I may be well disposed to concur in opinion with gentlemen that we ought not to recede from our former vote on this subject, yet at the same time I may wish to proceed with due respect to the Senate, and give dignity and weight to our own opinion, so far as it contradicts theirs, by the deliberate and decent manner in which we decide. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I do not conceive titles to be so pregnant with danger as some gentlemen apprehend. I believe a President of the United States, clothed with all the powers given in the Constitution, would not be a dangerous person to the liberties of America, if you were to load him with all the titles of Europe or Asia. We have seen superb and august titles given, without conferring power and influence, or without even obtaining respect. One of the most impotent sovereigns in Europe has assumed a title as high as human invention can devise; for example, what words can imply a greater magnitude of power and strength than that of High Mightiness? This title seems to border almost upon impiety; it is assuming the pre-eminence and omnipotence of the Deity; yet this title, and many others cast in the same mould, have obtained a long time in Europe, but have they conferred power? Does experience sanction such an opinion? Look at the Republic I have alluded to, and say if their present state warrants the idea?

I am not afraid of titles, because I fear the danger of any power they could confer, but I am against them because they are not very reconcilable with the nature of our Government or the genius of the people. Even if they were proper in themselves, they are not so at this juncture of time. But my strongest objection is founded in principle; instead of increasing, they diminish the true dignity and importance of a Republic, and would in particular, on this occasion, diminish the true dignity of the first magistrate himself. If we give titles, we must either borrow or invent them. If we have recourse to the fertile fields of luxuriant fancy, and deck out an airy being of our own creation, it is a great chance but its fantastic properties would render the empty phantom ridiculous and absurd. If we borrow, the servile imitation will be odious, not to say ridiculous also; we must copy from the pompous sovereigns of the East, or follow the inferior potentates of Europe; in either case, the splendid tinsel or gorgeous robe would disgrace the manly shoulders of our chief. The more truly honorable shall we be, by showing a total neglect and disregard to things of this nature; the more simple the more Republican we are in our manners, the more rational dignity we shall acquire; therefore, I am better pleased with the report adopted by the House, than I should have been with any other whatsoever.

The Senate, no doubt, entertain different sentiments on this subject. I would wish, therefore, to treat their opinion with respect and attention. I would desire to justify the reasonable and republican decision of this House to the other branch of Congress, in order to prevent a misunderstanding. But that the motion of my worthy colleague (Mr. PARKER) has possession of the House, I would move a more temperate proposition, and I think it deserves some pains to bring about that good will and urbanity, which, for the despatch of public business, ought to be kept up between the two Houses. I do not think it would be a sacrifice of dignity to appoint a Committee of Conference, but imagine it would tend to cement that harmony which has hitherto been preserved between the Senate and this House; therefore, while I concur with the gentlemen who express, in such decided terms, their disapprobation of bestowing titles, I concur also with those who are for the appointment of a Committee of Conference, not apprehending they will depart from the principles adopted and acted upon by the House.

Mr. WHITE did not approve of a Committee of Conference, because the House had already determined the question by unanimously adopting the report of the joint committee. He did not think that it was worth while having the subject longer contested; he was satisfied both the spirit of the Constitution and the spirit of the people disapproved of titles.

Mr. BLAND would be careful of giving umbrage to the Senate, because he wished that the unanimity and moderation which subsisted between the two Houses might continue. He considered the present as a very proper opportunity for the appointment of a Committee of Conference. The two Houses had disagreed on the report of their committees; it was proper, therefore, that they should mutually assign their reasons, in order to bring about an agreement to the same resolution. He hoped, therefore, that such a committee would be appointed, though he had no expectation that the House would give up an opinion they so justly and decidedly entertained respecting titles.

Mr. PARKER wanted to know what was the object of gentlemen in the appointment of a Committee of Conference? The committee could only say that the House had refused their consent to annexing any titles whatever to the President and Vice President; for certainly the committee would not descend into the merits of a question already established by the House. For his part, he could not see what purpose was to be answered by the appointment of such a committee. He wished to have done with the subject, because while it remained a question in the House, the people's minds would be much agitated; it was impossible that a true republican spirit could remain unconcerned when a principle was under consideration, so repugnant to the principles of equal liberty.

Mr. SHERMAN thought it was pretty plain that the House could not comply with the proposition of the Senate. The appointment of a committee on the part of the House, to consider and determine what style or title will be proper to annex to the President and Vice President, would imply that the House meant that some style or title should be given. Now this they never could intend, because they have decided that no style or title ought to be given; it will be sufficient to adduce this reason for not complying with the request of the Senate.

Mr. JACKSON wondered what title the Senate had in contemplation to add dignity or lustre to the Presidential Chair. For his part he could conceive none. Would it add to his fame, to be called after the petty and insignificant princes of Europe? Would styling him His Serene Highness, His Grace, or Mightiness, add one title to the solid properties he possessed? He thought it would not; and therefore conceived the proposition to be trifling with the dignity of the Government. As a difference had taken place between the two Houses, he had no objection to a conference taking place. He hoped it might be productive of good consequences, and that the Senate might be induced to follow the laudable example of the House.

Mr. MADISON was of opinion that the House might appoint a Committee of Conference without being supposed to countenance the measure. The standing rule of the House declared, that, in case of disagreeing votes, a Committee of Conference should be appointed. Now, as the case provided for in the rule had actually happened, he inferred that it was proper to proceed in the manner directed by the rules of the House. The subject was still open to discussion, but there was little probability that the House would rescind their adoption of the report. I presume gentlemen do not intend to compel the Senate into their measures; they should recollect that the Senate stand upon independent ground, and will do nothing but what they are convinced of the propriety of; it would be better, therefore, to treat them with delicacy, and offer some reasons to induce them to come into our measure. He expected this would be the result of a conference, and therefore was in favor of such a motion.

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

Mr. SENEY intended nothing disrespectful to the Senate, but he conceived, after having adopted the report of the committee, it would derogate from their own dignity, to rescind a unanimous resolution; and for what other purpose could a conference be appointed by the House? They must certainly suppose that there might be ground for changing their opinion. Nothing of this kind appeared to him, and therefore he was of opinion it would be a useless consumption to waste any more time about it.

Mr. CLYMER thought that there was little occasion to add any title either to the President or Vice President. He was very well convinced, by experience, that titles did not confer power; on the contrary, they frequently made their possessors ridiculous. The most impotent Potentates, the most insignificant Powers, generally assumed the highest and most lofty titles. That they do not indicate power and prerogative is very observable in the English history; for when the Chief Magistrate of that nation bore the simple style of His Grace or Highness, his prerogatives were much more extensive than since he has become His Most Sacred Majesty.

Titular distinctions are said to be unpopular in the United States; yet a person would be led to think otherwise, from the vast number of honorable gentlemen we have in America. As soon as a man is selected for the public service, his fellow-citizens, with liberal hand, shower down titles on him—either excellency or honorable. He would venture to affirm there were more honorable esquires in the United States than in all the world besides. He wished to check a propensity so notoriously evidenced in favor of distinctions, and hoped the example of the House might prevail to extinguish that predilection which appeared in favor of titles.

Mr. PAGE—If I thought the motion made by my colleague in the least degree disrespectful, I should not have seconded it. I would be the last man on this floor to treat that worthy body with disrespect; but I believe it cannot be construed to have such a meaning. If we were to let the resolution lie on the table, it would not be disrespectful. But what is the object of the motion? Simply to inform the Senate that we cannot rescind a resolution adopted in consequence of the report of a joint committee. If the conduct of either House is in the least degree disrespectful, (though I do not conceive it is,) the body who declined adopting the report, after knowing the sense of the other to be in its favor, is the most so.

But on what are a committee to confer? Not upon what title shall be bestowed, because we have no right to enter on the subject; and here I must tell gentlemen I differ from them, when they think titles can do no harm. Titles, sir, I say, may do harm, and have done harm. If we contend now for a right to confer titles, I apprehend the time will come when we shall form a reservoir for honor, and make our President the fountain of it. In such case, may not titles do an injury to the Union? They have been the occasion of an eternal faction in the kingdom we were formerly connected with, and may beget like inquietude in America; for I contend, if you give the title, you must follow it with the robe and the diadem, and then the principles of your Government are subverted.

Mr. LEE moved the previous question as the best mode of getting rid of the motion before the House: he was supported by a sufficient number. And on the question, Shall the main question be now put? it passed in the negative; and so the motion was lost.

On motion, it was Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join with such committee as the Senate may appoint, to confer on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, upon the report of their joint committee, appointed to consider what titles shall be given to the President and Vice President of the United States, if any others than those given in the Constitution. Messrs. MADISON, PAGE, BENSON, TRUMBULL, and SHERMAN, were the committee elected.

IMPOST BILL.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States. Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

The question on laying a duty on molasses being under consideration:

Mr. TUCKER—Notwithstanding I am anxious for a reduction of the duties on all the articles in the bill, yet my vote on molasses will be regulated by what the committee shall determine in other cases, as I do not conceive it to be out of proportion. If a general reduction takes place on the other articles, I shall be disposed to make a reduction on this article; but as mine is but a single vote, gentlemen may not be inclined to favor my proposition for a general reduction, in order to gain my assent to a reduction on this particular article.

Mr. GOODHUE was of opinion that the duties were too high for collection; but he did not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TUCKER) that the duty on molasses was rated in proportion to the other articles, and therefore the question, whether molasses shall be reduced or not, did not depend on a general reduction, but on its own bottom; if it was rated too high for collection and proportion, the committee would agree to reduce it.

Mr. FARRISMORE expected the gentleman from South Carolina would vote in the manner he had pledged himself; he had promised to vote for reducing the duty on molasses if the committee reduced the duty on other articles; now, as they had decided against a reduction, he hoped the gentleman would be in favor of the duty on molasses, as it stood in the bill, and not vote in the manner he had promised.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. TUCKER.—The gentleman last up has certainly misunderstood me. I made no promise. I said my vote would depend upon the reduction of the other articles, but I was indifferent as to rum; I did not consider the State I represented as being either particularly benefited or injured by a duty on rum; and therefore did not urge any arguments in favor of reducing that article, more than I thought it might be proper to preserve the ratio, as fixed by the House, between the several articles. If gentlemen think rum can bear a high duty, and be safely collected, I have no objection to letting it remain. But there are some articles that bear heavily and unequally upon South Carolina; now, I think it my duty to vote in such a manner as to prevent her from bearing an undue proportion of the tax to be collected; I am, consequently, obliged to vote for a high tax on articles used in other States, (if my State is highly taxed,) however unequally it may fall. I shall therefore vote so as to endeavor to oblige other States to bear their true proportion of the aggregate sum. I wish to defer any determination on the article of molasses until we have gone through the other articles, that I may know how to vote on this. If gentlemen think my single vote of no consequence, they may proceed; but I may think the duty too high on molasses, and may be disposed to make it five cents, or less, if a reduction is made in the other articles; but I would not be understood to pledge myself for any particular sum.

Mr. AMES thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FITZSIMONS) had misunderstood the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TUCKER) respecting his pledging himself to vote in favor of molasses. He believed the gentleman from South Carolina incapable of making any improper accommodation either on this or on any other occasion; the subject had never been mentioned to him, nor he believed to any body else, much less could the gentleman's intention be the result of bargain or compromise. For his own part, he would never consent to such a degradation of his rights as a member of the House, as to stipulate for the exercise of his opinion.

Mr. TUCKER.—If the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FITZSIMONS) supposes that I have bargained to vote for or against any measure, he does me wrong; and if he charges me with such actions, I desire he may state his reasons and explain himself. I did not hear perfectly what he said when he was up before, and therefore did not refute any improper construction he might have put on my arguments.

Mr. FITZSIMONS had no difficulty in declaring his meaning. He understood, when the article of rum was under consideration, that the gentleman held out a promise to vote for the reduction of the duty on molasses if the committee would agree with him in reducing generally. This promise was not made in a private manner; it was made by the gentleman in his place. He could not recite the particular expression of the gentleman, but he understood from it that the gentleman pledged himself to reduce the duty on molasses, if the gentlemen from the Eastern States would join him in a general reduction.

Mr. TUCKER.—I expressed a wish for a general reduction to take place throughout the whole system; but I never made a promise with regard to a reduction of any particular article.

Mr. SENEY observed, that the discussion of molasses had been deferred when the subject was last before the House, in order to give time for a full investigation; but he conceived that no such reason now existed, in favor of its lying over, and therefore hoped the House would proceed to decide upon it.

Mr. AMES was willing to proceed to the consideration of that subject; he did not wish it deferred to the end of the list, that it might be held over them in terrorem; there were several articles in the list, which he did not conceive to be taxed too high for collection, or out of proportion with others, therefore it was likely they would not be reduced. If this was the case, the reduction would not be general, and the gentleman from South Carolina might not think it his duty to favor the reduction of molasses. He wished every article to stand upon its own bottom. If molasses was too high, the committee would lower it; if not they will continue it at the rate it is, and the business would be done with. If the committee were disposed to proceed, he was ready to take up the subject.

Mr. CARROLL saw no reason for postponing the business at this time. When the subject was suspended on a former occasion, several gentlemen from Massachusetts were absent on business, but it was surely unnecessary now to have any delay. After the repeated discussions it had undergone, he was satisfied gentlemen were prepared for a decision, and he hoped the question might be taken, and the committee proceed to get through the business. Gentlemen should consider the daily loss which the revenue sustained by the delay of this bill; he cautioned them against considering overmuch, and letting slip the opportunity they now had to supply the public wants.

Mr. WADSWORTH would not go over the old ground; and enumerate all the reasons why a reduction of the duty on this article should take place. He satisfied himself with saying it was out of proportion, and too high ever to be collected with certainty; he wished the committee to lower it to three or four cents, and apply to an excise for the deficiency, not conceiving an excise on distilled spirits to be inconvenient or unpopular.

Mr. AMES was sensible that any further discussion of the present subject was unpleasant, nay, it was painful to the committee; but he had such impressions on his mind in regard to its importance, that he must trespass on them again. On all subjects demonstration is desirable, but there is only one science capable of complete demonstration. Many other sciences admit of differ-degrees of demonstration; but of all the sciences on earth, the science of politics is the least capable of affording satisfactory conclusions, while it is the one that, from its importance, requires the greatest degree of certainty; because when we are to consider those things which relate to the welfare of nations, it is of consequence, and nothing can be more desirable than that we adopt just principles in order to come at proper conclusions. In this science it is dangerous to adopt the visionary projects of speculators, instead of principle. We ought to be cautious, therefore, in selecting the information upon which we form our system.

[MAY, 1789.]

Duties on Imports.

[H. of R.]

He trusted to make it appear in the course of his arguments, that the propriety of the particular measure under discussion depended upon local knowledge, and yet it would be found of national concern. He believed it could be clearly proved to be as much the interest of one part as of another to have the duty reduced.

It was laid down as a principle, that all duties ought to be equal. He believed, if gentlemen gave themselves time for consideration, they would not contend this duty was equal. He said he had made some calculations, which demonstrated the inequality to a very surprising degree. The tax operated in two ways: first, as a tax on a raw material, which increased the price of stock and narrowed the sale; and second, as a tax on an article of consumption. It required the every part of the Union to render the duty equal in its operation; but no gentleman contended that the consumption or distillation was equal. The gentleman from Virginia said, on a former occasion, that Massachusetts would not contribute her proportion of the national revenue, because her exports were not equal to the Southern States, and of consequence her imports are less; but if this fact is examined, it will be found that she does export in full proportion with the Southern States. Examine her custom-house books and you will find it; but Massachusetts is greatly concerned in navigation, and the wages of her seamen ought to be added to the amount of the profits of her industry. Then if we consider her consumption, we shall find it in proportion to five more moderate than the opulent citizens of Virginia or Carolina, yet they have not such a number of blacks among them, whose living is wretched, consequently the average consumption per head will be nearly the same. The fact is, that all taxes of this nature will fall generally in proportion to the ability to pay.

Laying a heavy duty on molasses incurs the necessity of allowing a drawback on country rum. By this system we may lose more revenue than we gain; any how, it will render it very uncertain. It is a question of some importance, whether it would not be beneficial to the United States to establish a manufacture, which would be very lucrative. But waiving that consideration, he would ask gentlemen, if there was any propriety in taxing molasses in its raw state with a duty intended to be laid on rum? Certainly this had better be by way of excise. In this mode the revenue would escape fraud by smuggling, which would otherwise be unavoidable. The tax was such a temptation, being thirty per cent upon its value, that no checks could prevent a clandestine trade being carried on.

Without the molasses trade is continued, the fishery cannot be carried on. They are so intimately connected, that the weapon which wounds the one will stab the other. If by such measures as these we ruin one of the most valuable interests of the United States, will not the people have a right to complain, that, instead of protecting, you injure and destroy their pursuits? He did not mean to say that the people would form unwarrantable combinations; but their exertions to support the Government will be damped; they will look with chagrin on the disappointment of their hopes; and it will add to their vexation, that they have been deceived under the most flattering appearances; for who could conceive that a Government, constructed and adopted in the manner this has been, could ever be administered to the destruction of that welfare which it was formed to support?

He recommended experience as the best guide, and said, that it was decidedly against high duties, particularly on molasses; and concluded with appealing to the justice and wisdom of the committee for a determination on this subject.

Mr. CARROLL would not take up the time of the committee with saying a word on the main subject, but begged them to consider of how much importance it was to the Union to get this bill into operation. If every article was to be again debated in the manner it had already been, he could see no end to the business. Unless gentlemen could advance some new and weighty arguments, he thought the time mispent in recapitulating those that had been unsuccessfully urged twice or three times before.

Mr. MADISON thought the arguments against the duty were inconsistent. He believed the gentlemen in opposition had not replied to an observation he had made, and which was of great force on his mind. The gentlemen all say, that a heavy duty will ruin the distilleries and fisheries, and the people concerned in them; yet they profess themselves willing to lay the same duty, but in two forms instead of one. Now he would be glad to know if the distilleries and fisheries would not be precisely in the same situation, let which would take place?

On motion, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 12.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the petition of Jedediah Morse, stating that he has, at great labor, expense, and risk, compiled and published a geographical and historical treatise of the United States, entitled "The American Geography, or a View of the present Situation of the United States of America," embellished and illustrated with two original maps, and praying that an exclusive right may be secured to him of publishing the same for a limited time. Also, a petition of a number of the citizens of the State of New Jersey, whose names are thereunto subscribed, in opposition to a petition of sundry other citizens of the said State, complaining of the illegality of the election of Representatives from that State returned to serve in this House.

Mr. CUYLER, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to take proofs of the facts stated in the petition of David Ramsay, suggesting that William Smith, elected a member of this House, within the State of South Carolina, was at the time when he was elected, ineligible, by reason that he had not been seven years a citizen of the United States, reported as follows:

That Mr. SMITH appeared before them, and admitted that he had subscribed, and had caused to be printed in the State Gazette of South Carolina, of the twenty-fourth of November last, the publication which accompanies this report, and to which the petitioner doth refer as proof of the facts stated in his petition; that Mr. SMITH also admitted that his father departed this life in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy, about five months after he sent him to Great Britain; that his mother departed this life about the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty; and that he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court in South Carolina in the month of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four.

The Committee also report the following counter proofs, produced by Mr. SMITH, viz: Printed copies of the following acts of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, viz: An act, entitled "An act to oblige every free male inhabitant of this State, above a certain age, to give assurance of fidelity and allegiance to the same, and for other purposes therein mentioned," passed the twenty-eighth of March, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight; an act, entitled "An act disposing of certain estates, and banishing certain persons therein mentioned," passed the twenty-sixth of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two; an act, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act, entitled 'An act for disposing of certain states, and banishing certain persons,' passed at Jacksonburgh, in the State of South Carolina, on the twenty-sixth day of February, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two," passed in March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three; an act, entitled "An act to confer the right of citizenship on aliens," passed the twenty-sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four; also, an ordinance of the Legislature of the said State, entitled "An ordinance to encourage subjects of foreign States to lend money at interest on real estates within this State," passed the twenty-sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four; a certified copy of an extract from an act of the Legislature of that State, entitled "An act for raising and paying into the public Treasury of this State, a tax for the uses therein mentioned," passed the ninth of September, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine; and a printed copy of the constitution of South Carolina; also a certificate from John Edwards and William Hort, Commissioners of the Treasury of that State, under their seal of office.

Ordered, That the said report lie on the table.

The House, according to the order of the day, proceeded by ballot to the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of Joseph Wheaton.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee appointed to confer with any Committee from the Senate, respecting the future disposition of the papers in the office of the late Secretary of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message, from the Senate, informed the House, that they had appointed a Committee to confer with the Committee of this House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the subject of titles.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAGE in the Chair, on the Import bill.

The article of molasses being still under consideration:

Mr. AMES wished to reply to the observation made yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia. Does that gentleman, said he, recollect, if we lay an excise, we prevent the burden from being imposed upon the poor for their subsistence, as molasses, in the raw state, will be lightly taxed? In the next place, it is more favorable to the importers of that article than the impost; it does not require so large a proportion of their capital to be advanced in payment of duties, nor do they run the risk of bad debts, because it may be so regulated that the retailer shall secure the duty. Another reason is, it will save the expense of a numerous host of custom-house officers, waiters, &c. These considerations proved, that if the excise was no better than an impost, it was no worse; and as the duty would be better collected, and give less reason for smuggling, which, above all things was dangerous to the revenue, it was sufficient to warrant the committee in giving the excise duty a preference.

Mr. GOODHUE would not trouble the House long on the subject; but begged leave to repeat the manner in which the molasses trade was connected with the fisheries, and the fisheries with the navigation; that, if the first is injured, the other two are wounded through its side. About three-fifths of all the fish that are put up for that market, are of an inferior quality, and would not sell elsewhere. The French would not permit us to carry them there, but because we take their colonies send the molasses to France, lest it interfere with their brandy. Now, any impediment to the exportation of molasses, will prevent the exportation of fish; if we cannot export the fish, for what purpose shall we continue our fisheries? And if they are given up, how are we to form seamen to man our future navy?

Mr. MADISON said his mind was incapable of discovering any plan that would answer the purpose the committee have in view, and not produce greater evils than the one under consideration.

Duties on Imports.

[H. or R.]

He thought an excise very objectionable, but as no actual proposition for entering into such a system was before the committee, he forebore to say any thing further about it. He admitted an excise would obviate in part some of the difficulties; but he did not think the answer given to his argument altogether satisfactory; yet there was another argument he urged on a former occasion remaining unanswered—it was, that, at this moment, the fisheries, distilleries, and all their connexions, were laboring under heavier duties than what is now proposed; true, the duty is collected in a different mode, but it affects the consumer in the same manner. The gentlemen have said, to be sure, that the duty is evaded; but if half is collected, it will amount to more than six cents per gallon.

It is said that a tax on molasses will be unpopular, but not more so than a tax on salt. Can gentlemen state more serious apprehensions in the former than the latter case? yet the committee did not forego a productive fund, because the article was a necessary of life, and in general represented for people to complain of the oppression of Government, have not the citizens of the Southern States more just ground of complaint than others? The system can only be acceptable to them, because it is essentially necessary to be adopted for the public good.

Gentlemen argue, that a tax on molasses is unpopular, and prove it by experience under the British Government. If this is to be adduced as a proof of the popularity of the measure, what are we to say with respect to a tax on tea? Gentlemen remembered, no doubt, how odious this kind of tax was thought to be throughout America; yet the House had, without hesitation, laid a considerable duty upon it. He did not imagine that a duty on either of those articles, was in itself objectionable; it was the principle upon which the tax was laid that made them unpopular under the British Government.

It is said that this tax is unjust; now, he had not a single idea of justice, that did not contradict the position. If it be considered as it relates to rum, he was certain the consumers of foreign rum paid a larger proportion of revenue into the Treasury than the consumers of country rum; they paid more than equal distributive justice required; if it was considered as it respected molasses, there would appear no injustice. Molasses was consumed in other States; but if it was not, sugar was used in its stead, and subjected to a duty full as high as that on molasses. But dismissing both these considerations, and even admitting the whole weight to fall on the Northern States, it would not be disproportioned, because, in the long list of enumerated articles subject to a high duty, they imported few or none; indeed, the articles were pretty generally taxed for the benefit of the manufacturing part of the northern community; see loaf sugar, candles, cheese, soap, &c. He hoped gentlemen would not infer from this observation, that he thought the encouragement held out by the bill to manufactures improper; far from it; he was glad to see their growing consequence, and was disposed to give them every aid in his power. From this view of the subject, he was inclined to adhere to the bill, and not make any reduction.

Mr. GERRY hoped the committee would not consider the subject as finally decided; he thought it deserving of further investigation, and expected the committee would be satisfied of the propriety of making some reduction. He felt a concern at being obliged to extend the discussion, but his duty impelled him to oppose a measure, he conceived injurious to his country.

He meant to consider the subject in two points of view: First, he would begin by premising, that the business of finance was a business of difficulty and delicacy; in Europe, it is considered in this light, and requires to be conducted by the most able and enlightened men. In America, we had hitherto but little experience in this science, and perhaps not more than one man is qualified to fill such an important station as financier; surely, then, Congress ought to be well assured of the justice and propriety of the principle they adopt; they ought to have sufficient understanding and information to be able to demonstrate that their calculations are right. But we are defective in documents to guide us on our way, we are going onward blindfolded, and have seriously to apprehend evils from every step. Nations who are well informed on these points by the experience of ages, never attempt to lay a duty, in the first instance, so high as we propose to do; they begin with small impositions, in order to try what the article will bear, and how far the people are disposed to sustain the pressure in that particular part. They also have in view the certainty of the collection; if they find all these circumstances manageable, then they gradually increase the duty until the imposition becomes equal to what the article will bear. But he had forgot himself; he ought not to touch upon this point, because gentlemen are above deriving advantages from experience; although we are a young Government, yet to be established, we are enumerating and laying duties that could only be proper after many years experience. Now, admitting these duties to be proper some years hence, was it not impolitic in Congress to load the people immediately upon getting the power of doing it, and burdening them in a heavier manner than they ever experienced even under the British Government?

Gentlemen had contended that a duty of six cents per gallon on molasses was just and equal; for his part, he could not discover, with all the exertions his mind was capable of making, how gentlemen prove this to be the case; it appeared to him partial and oppressive.

The principle laid down in the Constitution for an equal distribution of taxes was, that they shall be apportioned among the several States, according to their respective number of inhabitants. This principle is made positive as it respects direct taxes; but he thought the equality ought to extend itself to every possible case. The power possessed by the House, with regard to revenue and the power of making all necessary laws, enabled the General Government to exist independent of subordinate associations; but if they were inclined to annihilate the State Governments, yet it would be their interest to attend to the advantages of the community, and administer their power so as not to make it burdensome and oppressive. Now, he wished to know what principle of justice authorized the committee to lay a duty of six cents on molasses? Unfortunately for Massachusetts, she imports a greater quantity than the whole Union besides. This makes her interest stand alone, and her representatives are left to labor the point, knowing the ill effect it will have upon their constituents. Under these circumstances, it is necessary to pay particular attention to the justice of the measure; gentlemen should consider that, in such cases, there is danger of interest prevailing over equity and policy. Certainly, if the measure is pursued, we shall discover this effect in the end.

Gentlemen have considered the arguments brought against this duty as standing upon local ground, advocating the local interest of Massachusetts. He would examine this position. It is the interest of a majority of the people of that State, that as much revenue should be drawn from molasses as possible. I say it is the interest of the State, for their interest is divided between the landed and commercial; the landed interest predominates, and it was always supposed that the commercial bore a greater share of the public burden than it ought. The conduct of the State of Massachusetts ought to be esteemed by us as the best guide to discover how far our commercial regulations, as they respect that State, are consistent with policy, if she furnishes the best example. Can we find that she ever imposed a duty of six cents per gallon on molasses? Not a single instance can be produced where she raised revenue from this article. If they then never laid a duty upon it, and they were disposed to get every thing in their power from commerce, we must conclude that if it could have been laid, they would have done it. It is not the landed citizen, if he might use the term, who consumes molasses; it is the inhabitants of the sea coast; the former had the power, and they were interested to lay such a tax, it might therefore be expected they would have done it, if they had not been convinced it would have destroyed the fisheries and navigation of the State.

Now, he wished to know upon what principle the committee would proceed to lay a tax which the State Government had considered as injudicious. Was it to make them bear a due proportion of the public expense? Gentlemen had intimated that it was just for this reason, but what was the true state of the question? Massachusetts consumed of every article as much as other States, according to her numbers. If the returns of the custom-house were examined, this would be found to be the case. If the gentlemen from Georgia, Carolina, or Virginia, contend that we do not consume as much, and the result of an impartial inquiry is that we consume more, what reason can be offered why we should be exposed to the full operation of this high duty on molasses? Is it because it falls exclusively upon the Eastern States to pay such extravagant duties? Certainly gentlemen will not insist upon this principle. If Massachusetts pays her proportion on other articles, we will never consent to add 120,000 dollars more, when all the rest of the Union will not pay half the sum.

The gentleman from Virginia told us, that Virginia exports more than Massachusetts. I think three times as much. This was a secret never known till the gentleman had disclosed it. When gentlemen want a position to support their arguments, they assume the commerce of their States to be very small, and hence a heavy tonnage duty ought not to be laid, lest they should be ruined altogether; but if they are to prove the quantum of revenue they contribute, their commerce is magnified, and becomes three times as great as the commerce of the most commercial State in the Union. He thought gentlemen ought to be consistent in their facts and arguments, but he believed such an opinion was without foundation. How, said he, do gentlemen ascertain this to be the case? He had examined the subject with considerable attention, but could find no ground for such a supposition; the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Madison] had enumerated a number of articles which were imported into Virginia. They were mere trifles, candles and soap. He would wish to know, if the duty on hemp and cordage did not amount to more than all such articles taken together. But the articles of which gentlemen complain can be bought among them as cheap as they can in the Eastern States, allowing only for freight. If they must have European goods, it is to be presumed they suppose them of better quality, and ought to pay in proportion.

If it was admitted that a duty of six cents was a reasonable one upon rum, why will gentlemen choose a mode of levying it, which the State avoided for fear of ruining their commerce? But gentlemen are afraid of an excise, because it is unpopular; rather than run any risk on this account, they would put to the hazard one of the most essential interests of the United States, he meant the fisheries and navigation; but after all, we shall be under the necessity of having recourse to an excise, because this source of revenue will be insufficient for the public wants. The deficiency must be made up either in that way or by direct taxation. He did not think gentlemen would prefer a capitation tax to an excise; for his part, he would choose the latter.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) cannot see how an impost on molasses can affect the distilleries and fisheries. After having been repeated over and over again, it would be unnecessary that he should dwell on this point. But every one could see the connexion; if we do not import molasses, we cannot carry on our distilleries nor vend our fish; and it will be impossible to import molasses under such heavy duties, at least the future importation will be limited to two-thirds of the present, because the demand will be in proportion to the increase of price, and the merchant will not have capital to import more than two-thirds of his usual quantity.

Duties on Imports.

[H. OF R.]

He would not reiterate the arguments respecting the fisheries; it was well known to be the best nursery for seamen, the United States had no other, and it never could be the intention of gentlemen to leave the navigation of the Union to the mercy of foreign Powers. It is of necessity, then, that we lay the foundation of our maritime importance as soon as may be, and this can be done only by encouraging our fisheries. It is also well known that we have a number of rivals in this business desirous of excluding us from the fishing banks altogether. This consideration of itself is sufficient to induce a wise legislature to extend every encouragement to so important a concern. In any regulation they make, by which it can be effected, they ought to be sure of the ground on which they go.

It appeared to him, that six cents would have the most ruinous consequences to the general interest; he therefore hoped gentlemen would agree to reduce it, if not so as to place it among the ad valorem articles, at least down to two cents. However, as the committee are not prepared to say the particular sum proper to be laid, he hoped they would agree to leave it a blank, to be filled up at some future stage of the business.

The question was now taken on striking out six cents, and passed in the affirmative: ayes 24, noes 22.

Propositions were severally made for filling up the blank with two, three, four and five cents; five being the highest was first put and agreed to: ayes 25, noes 23.

The committees proceeded to consider the subsequent articles; but not having time to go through the whole, they rose, and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 13.

Mr. THATCHER presented a petition from the merchants and traders of the town of Portland, in Massachusetts, stating that the proposed duty on molasses will operate injuriously on New England, and praying that the article may remain free from duty.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The petition of John Fitch, of Pennsylvania, was presented, stating that he is the original discoverer of the principle of applying steam-power to the purposes of navigation, and has obtained an exclusive right therein for a term of years, in the States of Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, and praying that his rights may be secured to him by law, so as to preclude subsequent improvers upon his principle from participation therein, until the expiration of his granted right. Referred to a committee, consisting of Messrs. HUNTINGDON, CADWALADER, and CONTEE, to report thereon.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Import Bill, Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

Mr. AMES moved to insert china, crockery-ware, and gunpowder; he thought them articles of luxury.

Mr. FITZSIMONS desired the gentleman to change the expression from crockery to earthen and stone ware, which being done, the committee agreed to insert china, earthen, and stone ware, at seven and a half per cent. ad valorem, but negatived gunpowder. The committee afterwards added looking-glasses and brushes.

Mr. PARKER moved to insert a clause in the bill, imposing a duty on the importation of slaves, of ten dollars each person. He was sorry that the Constitution prevented Congress from prohibiting the importation altogether; he thought it a defect in that instrument that it allowed of such a practice; it was contrary to the Revolution principles, and ought not to be permitted; but as he could not do all the good desired, he was willing to do what lay in his power. He hoped such a duty as he moved for would prevent, in some degree, this irrational and inhuman traffic; if so, he should feel happy from the success of his motion.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, hoped that such an important and serious proposition as this would not be hastily adopted. It was a very late motion for the introduction of new subjects. He expected the committee had got through the business, and would rise without discussing any thing further. At least, if gentlemen were determined on considering the present motion, he hoped they would delay it for a few days, in order to give time for an examination of the subject. It was certainly a matter big with the most serious consequences to the State he represented; he did not think any one thing that had been discussed was so important to them, and the welfare of the Union, as the question now brought forward; but he was not prepared to enter on any argument, and therefore requested the motion might either be withdrawn or laid on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN approved of the object of the motion, but he did not think this bill was proper to embrace the subject. He could not reconcile himself to the insertion of human beings as an article of duty, among goods, wares, and merchandise. He hoped it would be withdrawn for the present, and taken up hereafter as an independent subject.

Mr. JACKSON, observing the quarter from which this motion came, said it did not surprise him, though it might have that effect upon others. He recollected that Virginia was an old settled State, and had her complement of slaves; so she was careless of recruiting her numbers by this means; the natural increase of her imported blacks was sufficient for their purpose; but he thought gentlemen ought to let their neighbors get supplied, before they imposed such a burden upon the importation. He knew this business was viewed in an odious light to the Eastward, because the people were capable of doing their own work, and had no occasion for slaves; but gentlemen will have some feeling for others; they will not try to throw all the weight upon those who have assisted in lightening their burdens; they do not wish to charge up for every comfort and enjoyment of life, and at the same time take away the means of procuring them; they do not wish to break us down at once.

Duties on Imports.

He was convinced, from the inaptitude of the motion, and the want of time to consider it, that the candor of the gentleman would induce him to withdraw it for the present; and if ever it came forward again, he hoped it would comprehend the white slaves as well as black, who were imported from all the jails in Europe; wretches, convicted of the most flagrant crimes, were brought in and sold without any duty whatever. He thought that they ought to be taxed equally with the Africans, and had no doubt but the constitutionality and propriety of such a measure was equally apparent with the one proposed.

Mr. TUCKER thought it unfair to bring in such an important subject at a time when debate was almost precluded. The committee had gone through the impost bill, and the whole Union was impatiently expecting the result of their deliberations; the public must be disappointed, and much revenue lost, or this question cannot undergo that full discussion which it deserves.

We have no right, said he, to consider whether the importation of slaves is proper or not; the Constitution gives us no power on that point; it is left to the States to judge of that matter as they see fit. But if it is a business the gentleman is determined to discourage, he ought to have brought his motion forward sooner, and even then not have introduced it without previous notice. He hoped the committee would reject the motion, if it was not withdrawn. He was not speaking so much for the State he represented as for Georgia; because the State of South Carolina had a prohibitory law, which could be renewed when its limitation expired.

Mr. PARKER had ventured to introduce the subject after full deliberation, and did not like to withdraw it. Although the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHERMAN) had said, that they ought not to be enumerated with goods, wares, and merchandise, he believed they were looked upon by the African traders in this light. He knew it was degrading the human species to annex that character to them; but he would rather do this than continue the actual evil of importing slaves a moment longer. He hoped Congress would do all that lay in their power to restore to human nature its inherent privilege, and, if possible, wipe off the stigma under which America labored. The inconsistency in our principles, with which we are justly charged, should be done away, that we may show, by our actions, the pure beneficence of the doctrine we hold out to the world in our Declaration of Independence.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the principles of the motion, and the principles of the bill, were inconsistent; the principle of the bill was to raise revenue, the principle of the motion to correct a moral evil. Now, considering it as an object of revenue, it would be unjust, because two or three States would bear the whole burden, while he believed they bore their full proportion of all the rest. He was against receiving the motion into this bill, though he had no objection to taking it up by itself, on the principles of humanity and policy; and therefore would vote against it if it was not withdrawn.

Mr. AINS joined the gentleman last up; no one could suppose him favorable to slavery; he detested it from his soul; but he had some doubts whether imposing a duty on the importation would not have the appearance of countenancing the practice; it was certainly a subject of some delicacy, and no one appeared to be prepared for the discussion. He therefore hoped the motion would be withdrawn.

Mr. LIVERMORE was not against the principle of the motion; but in the present case he conceived it improper. If negroes were goods, wares, or merchandise, they came within the title of the bill; if they were not, the bill would be inconsistent. But if they are goods, wares, or merchandise, the five per cent. ad valorem will embrace the importation, and the duty of five per cent. is nearly equal to ten dollars per head; so there is no occasion to add it even on the score of revenue.

Mr. JACKSON said, it was the fashion of the day to favor the liberty of slaves. He would not go into a discussion of the subject; but he believed it was capable of demonstration that they were better off in their present situation than they would be if they were manumitted. What are they to do if they are discharged? Work for a living? Experience has shown us they will not. Examine what has become of those in Maryland; many of them have been set free in that State. Did they turn themselves to industry and useful pursuits? No, they turn out common pickpockets, petty larceny villains. And is this mercy, forsooth, to turn them into a way in which they must lose their lives; for when they are thrown upon the world, void of property and connexions, they cannot get their living but by pilfering. What is to be done for compensation? Will Virginia set all her negroes free? Will they give up the money they cost them, and to whom? When this practice comes to be tried there, the sound of liberty will lose those charms which make it grateful to the ravished ear. But our slaves are not in a worse situation than they were on the coast of Africa. It is not uncommon there for the parents to sell their children in peace; and in war, the whole are taken and made slaves together. In these cases, it is only a change of one slavery for another; and are they not better here, where they have a master, bound by the ties of interest and law, to provide for their support and comfort in old age or infirmity, in which, if they were free, they would sink under the pressure of woe for want of assistance?

He would say nothing of the partiality of such a tax; it was admitted by the avowed friends of the measure; Georgia, in particular, would be oppressed. On this account, it would be the most odious tax Congress could impose.

Mr. SCHUREMAN hoped the gentleman would withdraw his motion, because the present was not the time or place for introducing the business. He thought it had better be brought forward in the House, as a distinct proposition. If the gentleman persisted in having the question determined, he would move the previous question, if he was supported.

MAY, 1789.]

Duties on Imports.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MADISON.—I cannot concur with gentlemen who think the present an improper time or place to enter into a discussion of the proposed motion. If it is taken up in a separate view, we shall do the same thing at a greater expense of time. But gentlemen say that it is improper to connect the two objects, because they do not come within the title of the bill; but this objection may be obviated by accommodating the title to the contents. There may be some inconsistency in combining the ideas which gentlemen have expressed, that is, considering the human race as a species of property; but the evil does not arise from adopting the clause now proposed; it is from the importation to which it relates. Our object in enumerating persons on paper with merchandise, is to prevent the practice of actually treating them as such, by having them in future forming part of the cargoes of goods, wares, and merchandise to be imported into the United States. The motion is calculated to avoid the very evil intimated by the gentleman.

It has been said that this tax will be partial and oppressive; but if a fair view is taken of this subject, I think we may form a different conclusion. But if it be partial or oppressive, are there not many instances in which we have laid taxes of this nature? Yet are they not thought to be justified by national policy? If any article is warranted on this account, how much more are we authorized to proceed on this occasion? The dictates of humanity, the principles of the people, the national safety, and happiness, and prudent policy, require it of us. The Constitution has particularly called our attention to it; and of all the articles contained in the bill before us, this is one of the last I should be willing to make a concession upon, so far as I am at liberty to go, according to the terms of the Constitution or principles of justice. I would not have it understood that my zeal would carry me to disobey the inviolable commands of either.

I understood it had been intimated, that the motion was inconsistent or unconstitutional. I believe, sir, my worthy colleague has formed the words with a particular reference to the Constitution; any how, so far as the duty is expressed, it perfectly accords with that instrument. If there are any inconsistencies in it, they may be rectified. I believe the intention is well understood, but I am far from supposing the dictum improper. If the description of the persons does not accord with the ideas of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) and his idea is a proper one for the committee to adopt, I see no difficulty in changing the phraseology.

I conceive the Constitution, in this particular, was formed in order that the Government, whilst it was restrained from laying a total prohibition, might be able to give some testimony of the sense of America with respect to the African trade. We have liberty to impose a tax or duty upon the importation of such persons, as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit; and this liberty was granted, I presume, upon two considerations: The first was, that until the time arrived when they might abolish the importation of slaves, they might have an opportunity of evidencing their sentiments on the policy and humanity of such a trade. The other was, that they might be taxed in due proportion with other articles imported; for if the possessor will consider them as property, of course they are of value, and ought to be paid for. If gentlemen are apprehensive of oppression from the weight of the tax, let them make an estimate of its proportion, and they will find that it very little exceeds five per cent. ad valorem; so that they will gain very little by having them thrown into that mass of articles; whilst, by selecting them in the manner proposed, we shall fulfil the prevailing expectations of our fellow-citizens, and perform our duty in executing the purposes of the Constitution. It is to be hoped, that, by expressing a national disapprobation of this trade, we may destroy it, and save ourselves from reproaches, and our posterity the imbecility ever attendant on a country filled with slaves.

I do not wish to say any thing harsh to the hearing of gentlemen who entertain different sentiments from me, or different sentiments from those I represent; but if there is any one point in which it is clearly the policy of this nation, so far as we constitutionally can, to vary the practice obtaining under some of the State Governments, it is this. But it is certain a majority of the States are opposed to this practice; therefore, upon principle, we ought to discountenance it as far as is in our power.

If I were not afraid of being told that the representatives of the several States are the best able to judge of what is proper and conducive to their particular prosperity, I should venture to say that it is as much the interest of Georgia and South Carolina as of any in the Union. Every addition they receive to their number of slaves, tends to weaken and render them less capable of self-defence. In case of hostilities with foreign nations, they will be the means of inviting attack, instead of repelling invasion. It is a necessary duty of the General Government to protect every part of the empire against danger, as well internal as external. Every thing, therefore, which tends to increase this danger, though it may be a local affair, yet, if it involves national expense or safety, becomes of concern to every part of the Union, and is a proper subject for the consideration of those charged with the general administration of the Government. I hope, in making these observations, I shall not be understood to mean that a proper attention ought not to be paid to the local opinions and circumstances of any part of the United States, or that the particular representatives are not best able to judge of the sense of their immediate constituents.

If we examine the proposed measure, by the

H. or R.]

Duties on Imports.

agreement there is between it and the existing State laws, it will show us that it is patronized by a very respectable part of the Union. I am informed that South Carolina has prohibited the importation of slaves for several years yet to come. We have the satisfaction, then, of reflecting that we do nothing more than their own laws do at this moment. This is not the case with one State. I am sorry that her situation is such as to seem to require a population of this nature; but it is impossible, in the nature of things, to consult the national good, without doing what we do not wish to do to some particular part.

Perhaps gentlemen contend against the introduction of the clause on too slight grounds. If it does not comport with the title of the bill, alter the latter. If it does not conform to the precise terms of the Constitution, amend it. But if it will tend to delay the whole bill, that, perhaps, will be the best reason for making it the object of a separate one. If this be the sense of the committee, I shall submit.

Mr. GRAY thought all duties ought to be laid as equally as possible. He had endeavored to enforce this principle yesterday, but without the success he wished for; he was bound by the principle of justice, therefore, to vote for the proposition. But if the committee were desirous of considering the subject fully by itself, he had no objection; but he thought when gentlemen laid down a principle, they ought to support it generally.

Mr. BURKE said, gentlemen were contending for nothing; that the value of a slave averaged about eighty pounds, and the duty on that sum at five per cent. would be ten dollars. As Congress could go no further than that sum, he conceived it made no difference whether they were enumerated or left in the common mass.

Mr. MADISON.—If we contend for nothing, the gentlemen who are opposed to us do not contend for a great deal. But the question is, whether the five per cent. ad valorem on all articles imported, will have any operation at all upon the introduction of slaves, unless we make a particular enumeration on this account. The collector may mistake; for he would not presume to apply the term goods, wares, and merchandise to any person whatsoever. But if that general definition of goods, wares, and merchandise is supposed to include African slaves, why may we not particularly enumerate them, and lay the duty pointed out by the Constitution, which, as gentlemen tell us, is no more than five per cent. upon their value. This will not increase the burden upon any; but it will be that manifestation of our sense expected by our constituents, and demanded by justice and humanity.

Mr. BLAND had no doubt of the propriety or good policy of this measure. He had made up his mind upon it; he wished slaves had never been introduced into America. But if it was impossible at this time to cure the evil, he was very willing to join in any measures that would prevent its extending further. He had some doubts whether the prohibitory laws of the States were not in part repealed. Those who had endeavored to discountenance this trade by laying a duty on the importation, were prevented by the Constitution from continuing such regulation, which declares that no State shall lay any impost or duties on imports. If this were the case, and he suspected pretty strongly that it was, the necessity of adopting the proposition of his colleague was more apparent.

Mr. SHERMAN said the Constitution does not consider these persons as a species of property; it speaks of them as persons, and says, that a tax or duty may be imposed on the importation of them into any State which shall permit the same, but they have no power to prohibit such importation for twenty years. But Congress have power to declare upon what terms persons coming into the United States shall be entitled to citizenship; the rule of naturalization must however be uniform. He was convinced there were others who ought to be regulated in this particular, the importation of whom was of an evil tendency, he meant convicts particularly. He thought that some regulation respecting them was also proper; but it being a different subject, it ought to be taken up in a different manner.

Mr. MADISON was led to believe, from the observation that had fallen from the gentleman, that it would be best to make this the subject of a distinct bill: he, therefore, wished his colleague would withdraw his motion, and move in the House for leave to bring in a bill on the same principles.

Mr. PARKER consented to withdraw his motion under a conviction that the House was fully satisfied of its propriety. He knew very well that these persons were neither goods nor wares, but they were treated as articles of merchandise. Although he wished to get rid of this part of his property, yet he should not consent to deprive other people of theirs by any act of his, without their consent.

The committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, May 14.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they had appointed a committee to confer with such committee as shall be named on the part of the House, to report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with during the session at the public expense.

The petition of Archibald McLean, of the city of New York, printer, was presented, praying to be employed to execute such portion of the printing of Congress as they may think proper to allot him.

A petition from the distillers of Philadelphia and its vicinity, suggesting the propriety of a greater difference in the duties on rum and molasses imported than had been proposed.

Said petitions were ordered to lie on the table. The petition of Jedediah Morse presented some days ago, was referred to a committee, consisting of Messrs. HUNTINGTON, CADWALADER, and Con-tee; and that from the citizens of New Jersey, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

A petition was presented from Englehart Cruse, praying for a grant of exclusive privilege for a term of years, to construct and vend within the United States, an improved steam engine, which he has invented, for raising water for the purposes of mills, manufactories, &c. Referred to the same committee to which Mr. Morse's petition is referred.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House then again went into a Committee on the impost bill, Mr. PAGES in the Chair.

Mr. SMITH moved to add a clause allowing a drawback of ten per cent. on the duty payable on all goods imported in American vessels, owned and navigated according to law, by citizens of the United States; which was carried by a vote of 30 to 16.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill with amendments; which, being agreed to by the House, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 15.

Mr. BLAND, from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, in preparing proper rules to be established between the two Houses, for the enrolment, attestation, publication, and preservation of the acts of Congress, and to regulate the mode of presenting the addresses, and other acts, to the President of the United States, made a report, which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Ordered, That Mr. SYLVESTER, Mr. WYNKOOP, and Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina,) be a committee to confer with the committee appointed by the Senate, to report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with at the public expense; and that it be an instruction to the said committee, on the part of this House, to receive proposals for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress, and report thereupon.

The several petitions of Francis Childs and John Swaine, and of Samuel Loudon and Son, praying to be employed in the printing business of Congress, were presented to the House, and together with the petition of Archibald McLean, presented yesterday, to same effect, ordered to be referred to the committee last appointed.

Several other petitions of the citizens of New Jersey, praying that the elections of Representatives from that State may be declared valid, were presented to the House, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

A petition of the Baron de Glaubeck, praying the consideration of Congress for certain losses and military services during the late war; also, a petition of Bartlett Hinds, a wounded officer in the Massachusetts line of the late Continental army, in behalf of himself and the Continental pensioners in that State, praying relief against certain injuries which they have sustained under the operation of the acts of the late Congress, were presented to the House, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITE, one of the Representatives from Virginia, presented to the House a resolve of the Legislature of that State, of the 27th of December, 1788, offering to the acceptance of the Federal Government ten miles square of territory, or any lesser quantity, in any part of that State, which Congress may choose, to be occupied and possessed by the United States, as the seat of the Federal Government; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

An engrossed bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States, was read a third time, and, on a motion made, ordered to be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into the said committee; and, after some time, the committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments, which were agreed to by the House.

Mr. MADISON made a motion further to amend the said bill, by adding to the end thereof a clause for limiting the time of its continuance.

Mr. AMES expressed a doubt of the propriety of the motion. He thought the bill ought to be commensurate with the wants of Government.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—For want of a proper knowledge of the true situation of our affairs, we are unable to determine how far the present provision is equal to the necessities of the Union, and this circumstance will tend to add considerably to our embarrassment in limiting the duration. If we make the time too short to supply the public wants, we shall not hold out to the public creditors a sufficient security for the punctual payment of their debts. If we should want to raise money by a loan, we could only expect it according to the duration of the fund: this makes the present motion a subject of serious consideration. Not that I object to what the gentleman has in contemplation, but I wish such language to be used to be till the wants are supplied, and thereafter cease. I am not of opinion that it should be for half a century, because I hope our national debt will be extinguished in much less time; but really I must confess, at this moment, I feel considerable embarrassment in determining in my mind the period for which it should exist, whether an enumerated term of years, or a general declaration during the continuance of the public wants.

I think it will be necessary specially to appropriate this revenue; indeed, I think all revenue should be appropriated at the time it is granted; but our want of knowledge respecting our situation makes it impracticable to direct a special appropriation at this time. Hence I cannot see what ought to be the decision of the House on the present motion. I think something of this kind ought to be done, but I cannot say particularly what. I believe other gentlemen will, on if its limitation was determined, it would always be in the power of the Government to make it commensurate with what the public debts and contingencies required.

The Constitution, as had already been observed, places the power in the House of originating money bills. The principal reason why the Constitution had made this distinction was, because they were chosen by the people, and supposed to be best acquainted with their interests and ability. In order to make them more particularly acquainted with these objects, the democratic branch of the Legislature consisted of a greater number, and were chosen for a shorter period, so that they might revert more frequently to the mass of the people. Now, if a revenue law was made perpetual, however unequal its operation might be, it would be out of the power of this House to effect an alteration; for if the President chose to object to the measure, it would require two-thirds of both Houses to carry it. Even if the House of Representatives were unanimous in their opinion that the law ought to be repealed, they would not be able to carry it, unless a great majority appeared in the Senate also.

He observed, that an honorable gentleman had thought that no appropriation of the public money could be made for a longer term than two years. This was true, as it related to the support of armies; but the question here did not appear to be respecting an appropriation. It was the revenue itself, which, without any appropriation, might continue flowing into the public treasury independent of the will of the people, and might thereby become a convenience in the hands of some other department of the Government, for the purpose of oppression. Experience might also forcibly suggest the necessity and importance of alterations in the law, yet, without this clause, it might never be in the power of the House to make them.

Mr. BODINOT said, he was in favor of the motion at the first view; but it was without proper consideration. He had attended to the arguments with a great desire of obtaining information, the consequence had been, that such difficulty arose in his mind on the subject, that he was unprepared to give his assent to it. He considered the want of public credit as one of the greatest evils the Legislature had to encounter; that such had been our situation for a long time under the late Government, that we were unable to perform any of the functions necessary to promote the public welfare. From this melancholy consideration, he was induced to join in every Constitutional measure to promote so laudable an end. He did conceive that if the present bill was limited in its operation or duration, it would prevent the growth of public credit. He thought, unless some very valuable advantage was to result from the limitation which gentlemen had in view, it ought not to be adopted; for his part, he could discover none. He considered a law always to be in the power of the Legislature. It was true there were checks to prevent a hasty repeal, or adoption of any measure whatsoever. These checks were no doubt intended for a wise purpose. The Constitution had given them, and it was a fair inference to suppose that the Senate ought to be trusted in this particular as well as the House. He did not apprehend any danger from the money being in the treasury; because it could not be touched without the special appropriation of Congress, and the receipts and expenditures of the public revenue must be published, which was an additional security. He apprehended that the limitation would not be equal to the demands of Government, because he thought they would continue unsatisfied for a longer term than gentlemen seemed willing to allow the law to exist. The time mentioned by the former Congress, and to which they requested the concurrence of the several States, was, that the impost duties might be continued for twenty-five years. This request was made on full consideration, and they did not think it was more than sufficient to discharge the principal and interest of the national debt. He concluded, therefore, that it was better to let the law remain without limitation; because when they found the purposes for which it was intended were accomplished, it would be in the power of Congress to repeal the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE thought the present was a subject of great importance, and he lamented it was not brought forward at an earlier period, because he feared the time would not allow that full discussion or deliberation which ought to take place. He wished also that the House was acquainted with the necessities of the United States, that so they might make provision accordingly; but these two points were mere matter of speculation as to their precise amount; yet he believed it was agreed on all hands, that the ways and means provided in this bill for the support of Government, the payment of interest and instalments of the foreign and domestic debt, were, so far as agreed to, inadequate to the object. If this be the case, the public debt must accumulate; and as we do not know when the time may come for its extinguishment, the provision cannot be limited; for every gentleman will agree, that if the demand for revenue be increasing, the fund ought to be commensurate to the object. Is there any time when the civil list will cease its demand? If there is not, there will be a perpetual call for revenue. He thought it absolutely impossible to provide for the payment of the debts, if the bill was limited to two, three, or four years; such a precarious provision would never tend to the re-establishment of public credit. If the bill was not limited, it would always be in the power of the Legislature to lower the duties or make such other alteration as might, upon experience, be thought beneficial to the community; whereas if the bill were limited, it would be thought improper to make any amendments during the term for which it is enacted, although those amendments appeared indispensably necessary. But why is this degree of caution necessary? Will not the administration of public affairs be conducted in future by representatives as good as ourselves? Will they have less wisdom or virtue to discover this occasion, find it easier to see the difficulty than to obviate it; but I hope those who have considered it will give their sentiments to the House, in order to enable us to form a judgment of what may be most expedient and proper.

Mr. LEE thought the operation of the law could not be well understood; that it was a system of experiment, and ought to be temporary, in order that a future Congress might make such amendments as time should discover to be necessary. How perfect soever the theory might appear, practice might prove it otherwise; he therefore wished its operation limited for three or five years. He thought it would be wise in the House to adopt the motion, in order to prevent any injustice which a permanent and imperfect regulation might have on posterity. He expected this would beget confidence in the Government which was to him a very desirable object.

Mr. WHITE.—The Constitution having authorized the House of Representatives alone to originate money bills, places an important trust in our hands, which, as their protectors, we ought not to part with. I do not mean to imply that the Senate are less to be trusted than this House; but the Constitution, no doubt for wise purposes, has given the immediate Representatives of the people a control over the whole Government in this particular, which for their interest they ought not to let out of their hands. Besides, the Constitution says further, that no appropriation shall be for a longer term than two years, which of consequence limits the duration of the revenue law to that period; when, if it is found conducive to the public welfare, it may be continued by the legislators appointed by the people, and who alone are authorized to declare upon this question in the first instance.

As to the restoration of our credit, or procuring of loans; if those who have money to lend, have confidence in our Government, and that confidence can only be regained by a punctual discharge of our engagements, we shall be able to draw the advantages from those causes which we formerly did. It was sufficient heretofore, and from the energy of the Government it is now more worthy of trust.

Mr. LIVERMORE hoped but little time would be taken up in the discussion of this subject, the people were anxiously waiting the result of their deliberations; besides, the impost was daily slipping away. He had no doubt of the propriety of the motion, because from the acknowledged imperfections of the bill, it would never do for a permanent system. If the people, who consider themselves subjected to very high and very unequal duties, find no termination of the grievance, they will immediately adopt measures in their defence, to thwart the views of Government; but if they understand the law as temporary, and only passed in order to gain experience for forming a better system, they will be induced to give it fair play, and bear the burden without complaint, trusting to the wisdom and justice of Congress for such alterations as practice may show to be necessary.

Besides, the objects for which the revenue is now wanting, will decrease annually; this will be an additional reason for limiting its duration. He was not for a very short term, he thought five, seven, or ten years would be more eligible than two or three, but he was decidedly against making it perpetual.

Mr. SINICKSON had understood that one of the objects of the bill was the re-establishment of public credit; but it never could be imagined that a law, limited to three or four years, could do this in any great degree; nor could any advantage arise from loans negotiated and terminated within such a short period. Under these impressions, he conceived the motion struck at the credit of the new Government, which the people had just established.

If the law was discovered to operate unequally, it might be amended by a future Legislature, who would take care to supply new funds to replace those which were either given up or reduced.

Mr. MADISON.—When he offered this amendment to the bill, he thought its propriety was so obvious and striking, that it would meet no opposition. To pass a bill, not limited in duration, which was to draw revenue from the pockets of the people, appeared to be dangerous in the administration of any Government; he hoped, therefore, the House would not be less cautious in this particular than other nations are, who profess to act upon sound principles. He imagined it might be considered by their constituents as incompatible with the spirit of the Constitution, and dangerous to republican principles, to pass such a law unlimited in its duration.

He hoped it would not be understood by gentlemen who opposed his motion, that he supposed them to be actuated with a desire to do injury to either of those principles; he believed them to be moved only by an ardent desire to promote the general welfare, by the re-establishment of public credit. He would heartily join his labors with theirs, to effect this object, but wished to do it in a way, that while they served their country, they might secure the liberties of the people, and do honor to themselves. Besides the restoration of public credit, he thought the act had in view the encouragement of a particular description of people, which might lead them into enterprises of a peculiar nature, for the protection of which the public faith seemed to be pledged. But would gentlemen infer from hence, that no alteration ought to take place if the manufactures were well established?—The subject appeared to him in a twofold point of view; first, to provide for the exigencies of Government, and second, for the establishment of public credit; but he thought both these objects could be obtained without making the bill perpetual. If the Government showed a proper attention to the punctual performance of its engagements, it would obtain the latter; the other would be secured by making provision as the occasion demanded. If the bill was to be made perpetual, it would be continued after the purpose for which it was adopted had ceased; the error would in this case be irremediable; whereas, and pursue the good of their fellow-citizens than we have?

As to the appropriation of this revenue, he was sorry the information before the House did not warrant them to proceed to that part of the business: he hoped it might be well done at some future period, but till it was done, not a farthing of the revenue could be paid out of the treasury. Where must the bill for the appropriation originate? It must be here. Then what ground have the House to fear the check of the Senate, or the President, in a case where they still retain all the power in their own hands? For it is as much in their power to limit this bill, by limiting the appropriation, as it is by the clause now proposed.

If he supposed the liberties of the people would be endangered unless the motion obtained, he most surely would be in support of it; but he thought the liberties of the people would ever be secure, while they chose men of wisdom and integrity to represent them. He had no reason to believe the people would be inattentive to this great privilege; and if it were exercised with discretion, there was no reason to apprehend that Congress would continue to collect an oppressive revenue, after the object for which it was imposed had ceased to exist. He was well persuaded, if the bill were limited, it would have the effect the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SINICKSON) mentioned, namely, that of injuring the public credit.

Mr. BLAND.—Our public credit consists of two branches; first, as it respects the evidences of our debt, in the hands of those from whom we have had money or services; and secondly, as it respects our ability to borrow in future. Now, the first branch of public credit depends upon the punctuality with which the interest is paid; but this, in foreign nations, does not depend upon the limitation of the act. Do gentlemen suppose our laws, like those of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable? Can any person, who has read our Constitution, believe that it is in our power to pass a law without limitation? No, it is impossible. Every person knows that a future Congress may repeal this, and every other law we pass, whenever they think proper. Taking the subject in this point of view, gentlemen would see that the arguments in favor of a perpetual revenue were more specious than solid; while those for a limitation contemplated the best and safest means of avoiding difficulty, in the repeal or alterations which hereafter might be thought necessary. Nothing but experience could demonstrate the propriety or impropriety of the present measures; therefore they ought to be adopted merely by way of trial. The Government ought to be cautious in its first setting out, lest it alarm the people; and he thought his constituents would be much alarmed, if they conceived the power of the purse to be given into the hands of the other branches of the Government. The Constitution had particularly entrusted the House of Representatives with the power of raising money; great care was necessary to preserve this privilege allege that the debt would accumulate, because the United States must make provision for the annual extinguishment of a part. If the revenue arising from the impost be insufficient for this purpose, recourse must be had to some other fund which will enable us to perform the engagements of the late Congress. It is true; the debt is large, and will take time to pay it off, but he had no doubt but it would be done according to contract, and with honor to the Union. How, then, can gentlemen suppose the revenue ought to be perpetual, in order to be commensurate with the object? If they contemplated the contraction of more debts in future, the supposition might be true; but he saw no reason why gentlemen should extend their views so far. He thought if a future war, or some other untoward circumstance, should increase the national debt, it ought to be provided for by the Government who were acquainted with the necessity. He thought the House ought to consider seriously before they parted with their powers; it was easy for them to pass a bill to give power, but it was difficult to recall it. He had seen many instances of this kind; one in particular, in the State from which he came, where the Legislature had given the appointment of sheriffs, and some other little matters out of their hands, and had been a long time endeavoring to get it back; but they had not been able to obtain it. He had no suspicions of any character in the Senate, but the Constitution had made that body in some degree perpetual, to obtain a permanency in the laws; if, therefore, this revenue bill had once their approbation, they might be inclined to continue it, even against the sentiments of the people; and of the House. Though he was not against trusting gentlemen who now composed the Senate, he was against trusting their successors.

He thought the faith of the United States sufficiently pledged to the public creditors, not only by the late Congress, but by the Constitution, which showed a particular attention to their interest. It then only remained, by efficient measures, to perform its stipulations; and this ever would, be a duty on the representatives of the people, until it was fully complied with. In confidence that it might be done within a reasonable time, he was for a period neither so short nor so long as had been mentioned. About seven or ten years, he thought, would effect the object the gentlemen had in view and he would join them in voting for that time.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was also in favor of the clause; he conceived the only reason of weight urged against it, related to the restoration of public credit, but he thought every person possessed a stock or debt of the United States; the same feelings and reasonings as those which they would know that their demands depended upon a higher source than Congress, and might be sure that we would do our duty in making particular provision. If Congress neglected this, one part of the creditors would compel them. If it was found that the United States were not disposed to pay their debts, foreigners would find the means to make them. Taking it therefore for granted, that Congress would always provide for these objects, he would proceed to consider what effect might arise from a permanent or temporary provision. If the latter were made, the creditors would honor us for our exertions, and confide in our continuing to provide for them in the manner we should find upon experience most convenient to the community. If the system was declared to be a perpetual provision for the payment of their interest, it would give no hope, in the first place, for the redemption of the capital; and in the second, if Congress were to alter it, and which, in all probability, they shortly must, the security would be impaired, and an essential injury done to the public credit, which we are so desirous to revive.

How can gentlemen contend that the bill is not commensurate to the object? Do they know what the object is? He supposed it would be appropriated as mentioned, to the support of Government and the payment of the interest and principal of the national debt; but such appropriation had not taken place, and it was uncertain whether it ever would. He thought it would be better to bring in a bill specially appropriating this fund to the payment of the foreign debt, and then it might be declared that it should continue, and be applied to this use, until the foreign debt was cleared. He conceived it would be unconstitutional to make the law perpetual, and therefore he was in favor of the clause.

Mr. AMES considered this as a very important question; and in order that his own mind might be fully enlightened, he had listened with the most unwearied attention to the arguments urged on both sides; but he was far from being satisfied that the motion was necessary or proper for the House to adopt. The principal reason offered in its support was, that the revenue is not specially appropriated; but he could not perceive that this furnished a reason why the clause should be introduced; either gentlemen are afraid that the Senate will not agree to the appropriation, or they will agree. If they will agree, there is no reason for distrust; if they will not agree with the House, then we ought not to trust them with this bill, until we bring forward a clause for the purpose of appropriating the fund it is intended to raise. Gentlemen tell us the act is imperfect, and therefore ought to be limited; if this be the case, it may be a good reason for recommending the bill, but can be none for adopting the clause. If we have not taken up time enough in adjusting it, and considering the several parts of this law, let it be readjusted and reconsidered in a Committee of the Whole, until gentlemen are satisfied as to its perfection.

Gentlemen tell us they are willing to make the revenue commensurate with the debt. If they do this, all the inconveniences resulting from the imperfection of the system will be entailed upon for a number of years. Other gentlemen mention a year or two for its limitation. Can the House listen seriously to such a proposition? If we were to tell our creditors that we are making provision for them for one year, would it tend to inspire them with confidence in our wisdom or justice? Would our foreign creditors believe we were scrupulously fulfilling our engagements with them? No: nothing less than a fixed, permanent system, can beget confidence or give security. An illusory system of one or two years duration would engender distrust; its very visage would make the public suspect deception. If we do not mean to deceive, why not make the provision commensurate to the occasion? His idea of a temporary act was pro hac vice, by way of experiment; but he thought the House could not make the experiment with this bill, because the public credit would not admit of it. If this act be made for one year, will it not be a considerable expense to the public by going over all the ground again, which had taken the House such a length of time to discuss?

Duties on Imports.

Gentlemen have insisted upon the necessity of keeping the purse-strings in their hands. What do they mean by this? What power have the House over the money that comes into the treasury? Are they at liberty to apply it to their own use? Do not Congress declare the revenue to be the property of the public creditors, when they appropriate it to their use? Shall we say the people, then, keep the purse-strings in their hands? For what honest purpose shall they keep them? Why shall we, the House of Representatives, detain the money of foreigners? Does it not seem to carry fraud on the face of it? One gentleman says that he is unwilling to trust a future Senate; but if it shall be of equal integrity with the present, why should he hesitate? The State will be equally careful of obtaining a good representation, for their own sakes. But suppose the reverse should happen, do we not act wisely in making a provision for the security of our honor and the public welfare, which cannot be destroyed by one misguided branch of the Legislature? Now, suppose this law to expire, and the Senate should be unwilling to provide for the objects we have in contemplation, will this not prevent the representatives of the people from carrying their wishes into execution? But if the Senate be willing to co-operate with the House, for what honest reason do we endeavor to retain this power? Besides, if the act is imperfect, will it not be easier to correct the imperfect part than to frame a new system? Surely gentlemen are under a great mistake when they suspect danger to arise from the revenue continuing to flow into the public treasury. Have not the House a complete command over it? No money can be drawn out but by appropriations by law. The President cannot touch it. Does it increase the power of the Senate? The Senate have no command over it, unless authorized by law. Can the House of Representatives make any use of it? They cannot get a farthing, because the consent of the Senate is required to enable them to draw for it. What has been the conduct of Great Britain, in relation to her funds? What has carried the credit of that kingdom to a superior eminence, but the attention she has paid to public credit?

He considered these advantages as having made that nation rich and powerful. He believed a like conduct on our part would produce the same consequences, because our Government is of such a nature as to give the public creditors the greatest security they could wish. If the revenue is appropriated, and the law for collecting it is without any limitation, the funds cannot be taken away without a positive act of injustice, to which both Houses of the Legislature must assent by a majority of two-thirds, or three independent parties must unite. It was therefore three to one in favor of the public creditor, that the funds appropriated to his use, would not be annihilated. Under these circumstances, Government might more safely be trusted. This, he observed, was not the case under despotic princes; their will alone could tear away the security of the subject. Under a pure democracy, the case was almost as bad; no confidence could be placed, because the caprice and whim of one body could dictate a change.

Now an act that expires at a limited period revives the topics of partial politics and opposing interests, which involves expense; besides, it affords less confidence, because a variety of circumstances occur to prevent a continuation of the necessary provision to establish the foundation of credit. It may be prevented by the mere disagreement of the two Houses. This uncertain situation of the public credit will prevent the Government from re-leasing their foreign and domestic debt, which might otherwise be done to very great advantage at a reduced interest. Viewing the subject in all these points of light, he could not help being opposed to the motion.

Mr. PAGE expressed his surprise to find gentlemen opposed to the limitation of the bill, who had complained so much of its imperfections. He thought a measure of the kind now proposed absolutely necessary to reconcile these gentlemen to particular parts of the bill. For his own part, he had objections to some articles, and for that reason, if there was no other, he would be in favor of the limitation. It had been frequently asserted that half the revenue would be lost by smuggling. Can this, then, he would ask, be a bill proper to perpetuate, or fit for the restoration of the credit of the United States? He asked gentlemen whether they would lend a hand to rivet round the necks of their fellow-citizens a regulation which experience has convinced them was unjust, unequal, and oppressive? Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. AMES) had declared that experience had convinced him that at least one particular article was subjected to a duty of this kind.

He did not believe public credit could be restored otherwise than by a strict and positive adherence to our engagements, and a faithful performance of the duties they undertook. While this continued to be a leading feature of the Government, he would be bold to say that we should daily grow in reputation, prosperity, and happiness. He hoped, therefore, that a particular attention would be paid to their future conduct, and that each member would emulate the other in providing for the revival of public credit, by acts of justice to the holders of public securities. Mr. GENAY asked his colleague if he advocated carrying the taxes to such an extent as to accumulate sums in the treasury for which the United States had no particular use? Yet if this revenue law were made perpetual, it would collect money into the public coffers after the national debt was paid. This would be such a temptation to the Executive to possess itself by force of the treasures of the nation, as he hoped would never be put in its way. If our commerce and population increased, this revenue would increase in the same proportion. He could not, therefore, bear the idea of all this money being collected into one spot, unless there was an absolute demand for it. He thought it incompatible with the liberty and security of the people, and therefore hoped the House would agree to a short limitation.

Mr. MANISON, for the sake of accommodation, would make another proposition. He was extremely sorry to differ with gentlemen about modes, when their object appeared to be the same. He thought the spirit of the Constitution and the structure of the Government rendered it improper to pass a perpetual revenue law. The arguments had been clear on this point; but as there was an evident propriety in making the means commensurate to the occasion, he was inclined to give the bill such a perpetuity as would answer the purpose of providing for the public debt and restoring the national credit. He thought this might be done by modifying his motion so as to refer to the collection bill; for he hoped, before that passed, the House would be able to ascertain the appropriation, and could limit it accordingly. The words he would propose were, that this act should not continue and be in force longer than the — day of —, unless otherwise limited by the act providing for the appropriation. As he had heard it intimated that the yeas and nays would be called on this question, he was desirous of rendering the clause as satisfactory as possible.

Mr. AMES could not bear to lie under the imputation of inconsistency, with which he was charged, inasmuch as he contended against the limitation of a bill he had opposed as oppressive in some of its parts. He believed the amendment now offered was new to almost every gentleman. For his part, he had always supposed it was intended as a permanent system. He remembered many gentlemen had made use of this expression, through the various debates which had taken place in the several stages of the bill. He had understood it in this light, and had therefore combated, with some degree of energy, such parts as appeared to him impolitic or unjust. He imagined the gentlemen on both sides had labored to make the bill as perfect as possible, with a view of making an equitable provision for the public exigencies, which should affect all parts of the Union with the greatest degree of impartiality.

Mr. SHERMAN, observed, that when Congress applied to the several States for the five per cent. impost, they judged it would enable them to extinguish the national debt in twenty-five years; but, in addition to this fund, they expected to make annual requisitions on the States for one and a half million of dollars at least; so that gentlemen could not expect the whole to be paid by this single fund in a short time. He wished a limitation to the law in general terms, such as until the debt, foreign and domestic, is discharged. He thought a short term would make an unfavorable impression upon the minds of the public creditors, and tend in a great measure to cloud the happy prospects that began to brighten the political hemisphere of this country.

Mr. GENAY expressed an intention of calling the yeas and nays if he was supported, because he thought it a question in which the essential interests of the people were deeply involved. Mr. LAWRENCE said, he held his present opinion upon the purest principles of patriotism, and an ardent love for his country's happiness. He had no objection to the yeas and nays being taken, as he was not inclined to disguise his sentiments.

Mr. PAGE was glad the yeas and nays were called, as it would give gentlemen an opportunity of showing to their constituents their approbation of a measure calculated to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and posterity.

Several members rose to speak on this question, when Mr. AMES moved the adjournment, fearing gentlemen would grow warm upon the question. Whereupon, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 16.

Mr. SENEY, from Maryland, presented to the House an act of the Legislature of that State, offering to the acceptance of Congress ten miles square of territory, in any part of the said State, for the seat of the Federal Government, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of Duncan Campbell, of the city of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that compensation might be made him for sundry advances which he made during the late war, for the service of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petition lie on the table. A petition of John Fenno was presented to the House and read, praying to be employed in the printing service of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed yesterday, for receiving proposals for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendment proposed yesterday to the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, and the said amendment was read as follows: "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act shall be in force until the — day of —, and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress which shall happen thereafter."

The question was called for, and Mr. LAWRENCE required the yeas and noes.

Duties on Imports.

Mr. JACKSON wished to say a few words on the bill. The eyes and noses being called for, he conceived it his duty to state his reasons for his vote. He declared himself to be in favor of the limitation, for the reasons offered by honorable gentlemen yesterday. He said he had as ardent a desire to re-establish public credit, and place it on a good footing, as any member on that floor, yet he did not think making this law perpetual would have that tendency. He had no doubt but every subsequent Legislature would be equally desirous of doing justice to the creditors of the Union, and he therefore felt no uneasiness in leaving such provision to be made by them. If the next Legislature were disposed to violate the public honor, would the law now under consideration stand in their way? For his part, he could not conceive it an insuperable bar. The establishment of public credit depends upon the practice of an honest and upright policy; it will not depend upon paper promises; it must be true and substantial payments that will restore to us our lost honor. If Government do this, our credit will be re-established, let the funds be obtained in what manner they may. He thought the foundation of public credit ought to be laid at home before the superstructure was raised. To do this, the confidence of the people was to be gained; they must be satisfied of the justice of our measures; and this cannot be, unless it impartially affects every part of the Union. Now, some parts of the present bill are very exceptionable to the Southern States; even the Northern gentlemen are far from unanimously approving them. He believed there was not a member who liked every part of the bill. Under these circumstances, what was to be expected but complaints from the people, and a consequent repeal of the bill. He did not wish to insinuate that the Senate would be so depraved as to oppose the public voice, but they might misunderstand it; they were a permanent body, and might be more inclined to support what they considered the honor of the Government, than the convenience of the people.

The House of Representatives appeared to him to be the body best calculated to know and feel the interests of their immediate constituents; they ought, therefore, to preserve the power of redressing grievances, and not give too much into the hands of the Senate. He acknowledged the claims which those that fought and bled for their country had upon the justice of Congress; but he did not believe that clam of citizens would complain or murmur at this House for keeping purse-strings in their hands when it was considered necessary to the security and happiness of the people.

Mr. WARRR did not see the necessity of calling the yeas and nays; he thought the measure was intended to have one of these two objects, either to show that one part of the House had mistaken the interest of their country, and ought to be held up to posterity, in order that their memories may be charged with their want of knowledge; or that there is a part of this House who think themselves more wise and patriotic than the majority. He never called the yeas and nays in his life, nor believed he ever should; but he was willing to have his vote appear, in all cases, when gentlemen thought proper to perpetuate the decision of the House in that way. On this occasion he would vote in favor of the amendment, and would endeavor to answer the objections, which, if well founded, would be a subject of great uneasiness in his mind, considering how he intended to give his vote. It was said, that a temporary law would have a tendency to injure the credit of the United States; he believed the credit of the United States was established on as solid principles as the most solemn act could recognize; he meant that part of the public credit which respected the debt contracted, and the engagements entered into before the adoption of the Constitution. If gentlemen would reflect, they would find it making part of our social compact. He believed no other country had made an act of this nature, to secure the just claims of their creditors. From this view of the subject, what more is necessary to be done than to carry the Constitution into effect? He would ask gentlemen if they believed that foreigners would scrutinize into our revenue system? Would they examine our ways and means, in order to determine the degree of confidence they ought to have in us as a nation? Would the public creditors scrutinize in this manner the modes by which Government meant to accomplish their ends? He thought it hardly probable the people would take the pains of examining the minute details of a revenue system; they would rather inspect our actions, and if they see our conduct directed by wisdom and prudence, they would be confirmed in the belief of that justice in Government which the Constitution has assured them of. If our payments are in future punctually made, and the full amount of the interest regularly discharged, the national credit will be re-established.

He would now proceed to examine, whether rendering this law perpetual would be a wise and prudent measure. It had been well observed by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) that every part of the law would bear harder on some States than on others; perhaps there was no State in the Union which would not be in some degree dissatisfied. He could perceive, by the sentiments of gentlemen in this House, that the burdens would be peculiarly felt; under these impressions, gentlemen have expressed themselves more warmly than perhaps they ought. There had been predictions of the most dangerous consequences of high duties, which he would not repeat; if these dangers were not imaginary, would it be prudent in the House to risk these consequences, and make these dangers unavoidable by rendering the law perpetual.

Much pains had been taken to impose the burdens as equally as possible. If the duty on molasses bears hard upon one State, the tonnage duty would bear equally so upon others. But still it is probable that there are unequal pressures laid by the bill, which experience alone could enable the Legislature to alter to the satisfaction of all parties. The system was great, complex, and comprehensive; it embraced commerce, manufactures, agriculture, finance, and, in short, every thing in which a nation can be concerned. Will it be prudent, then, under our present disadvantages, and without information, to enact a law affecting the highest interests of the people, which can never be repealed but by the consent of three independent bodies? Gentlemen have told us, that no valuable purpose can be answered by making the law temporary; now, he thought a valuable purpose could be answered by it. The two Houses of Congress, with the qualified negative of the President, formed the legislative power of the United States; they are distinct powers to be exercised by both branches of the Legislature. The House had been told, on a former occasion, that the Senate possessed greater powers than the Representatives. He admitted that, in some instances, they had greater powers; but with respect to revenue matters, they certainly had less, and very properly so. Shall we then give up to a body, who has already a superiority over us, those superior powers which we possess relative to revenue? A perpetual system would give the Senate greater advantages than Constitutionally they ought to enjoy. He thought it of little consequence for the House to possess the right of originating money bills, if those money bills were made perpetual. The exercise of this right would be lost, and he thought it necessary that every part of Government should feel itself dependent upon the people. We have been told, with truth, that the Senate are a virtuous body; they are so, and he hoped would remain so for ages yet to come, nay, for ever; and, in his legislative capacity, he would act upon no other supposition. But still it ought to be remembered, that they would always be men, and liable to all the errors, frailties, and infirmities, with the rest of their fellow mortals; besides, they were constituted in some measure for purposes to which the other branch was incompetent; while this House was constituted for purposes for which the Senate is unequal. It is a well grounded republican maxim, that taxation and representation should depend each on the other. The people should be taxed only by representatives chosen for that purpose. This principle was written in the hearts of our British ancestors; it had been maintained by the best blood of our citizens, and he hoped it would descend with the fullest energy to our posterity. What, said he, are we about to do? A great branch of revenue, indeed the only branch, to which an application is now proper, or expected by the people, is about to be put out of our hands forever; for it would not be in the power of this House, or any future House, to annihilate those funds without the consent of the Senate and the concurrence of the President. Now, the Senate are not an equal representation of the people; in that body the States have equal numbers, while, in this House, the representation is proportioned to their population. Delaware sends one, Georgia three, and Virginia ten. Is it possible, in the nature of things, that two Senators can be as well acquainted with the feelings and interests of the people of Virginia, as ten men selected from among them, and taken from the several parts of the State? Will the people be satisfied to have that body able to continue a revenue system which their immediate representatives think oppressive, or perhaps unnecessary? Certainly they would not; whatever the wisdom and virtue of the Senate may be, he was convinced they were not competent for those peculiar objects for which a just representation is absolutely necessary. The Senate, it is true, is not a House of Lords; they do not possess any properties materially distinguishing them from the members of the House of Representatives; but, though the distinction is not so striking in the one case as in the other, yet it was nevertheless real. The House of Lords is created by the King, and is a permanent body; the Senate is chosen by the State Legislatures, and though the individuals have not a permanency in office, yet the body never ceases to exist.

These circumstances, in the constitution of the Senate, afforded a powerful objection to the new system of government; and the people would never have adopted it had they supposed that the powers of this body were unlimited in continuing a system of taxation, which had at any time met the approbation of their particular representatives.

He supposed, if an excise was laid, or direct taxes were found necessary, the people would be oppressed by them, because the same principle that made an impost law perpetual would apply in all other cases. What, then would become of the boasted privilege of the people, the right of taxing themselves? He expressed a willingness to pass a revenue law commensurate with the occasion, to operate until the public debts are paid. This was all the creditors could demand or expect, and all the House could with safety do. He might be told that the Senate would be as ready to repeal the law as the House of Representatives; but, perhaps, the Senate could not be as well informed of the situation of the people, although they might be wise men; because it is not in the nature of things that two men should possess as much information of the circumstances and wishes of the people as ten men could; besides, there is something in the nature of man which would not suffer him easily to part with power. He could cite some striking instances of this spirit. He could refer to a remarkable one which took place in the State from which he came.

About the year 1670 an insurrection was raised in Virginia. After its suppression, the Assembly, to manifest their loyalty, passed an act giving the same privilege to the Governor and Council, with respect to scandalous words spoken of them, as the statute De Scandalis Magnatum gives to the Peers of Great Britain. The Assembly were soon after impressed with an opinion that these privileges were incautiously transferred, and endeavored to recover them. It was a uniform practice of the House of Representatives to send up a bill for that purpose every session; but although the Council always proved themselves the friends of liberty, and joined the Assembly, both in their legislative and individual capacities, in a warm and spirited opposition to British tyranny, yet they would never consent to repeal that act to the very last moment of their existence.

Mr. TUCKER did not think it necessary to give his opinion otherwise than by his vote, because gentlemen, who had yesterday delivered their sentiments in favor of the clause, had anticipated what he had to say. But as he found himself influenced by the call for the ayes and noes on this question, he should be induced to state some of his reasons in favor of the amendment. He said he was glad the ayes and noes had been called, and if it had not been done by any other gentleman, he should have conceived himself bound to have done it; because he did not think himself at liberty, but on very particular occasions, to make a law perpetual. He wished to see a doctrine established never to pass a law without limitation, unless justified by some extraordinary circumstances. Nothing, he thought, could ever justify such an act but the immutability of the object, and the absolute necessity and simplicity of every thing relating to it. If the House passed a perpetual revenue law, which had not an immutable object, they would abridge their own power, and destroy one of the great privileges of the people. Every bill of this nature, more or less, narrows the powers of this House, and throws it into the hands of the Executive and a minority of the Senate; for it is to be considered, that whenever we pass a bill on any subject, every matter in that bill contained is given up to the Executive and one-third of the Senators—so much so that it is out of the power of this House, even with a unanimous vote, to recover any part of it. At this rate we may go on, from time to time, in passing laws transferring our powers, and at length become mere cyphers in the Government. The Senate would be able, with these advantages, to retain every privilege that was transferred, and it is natural to suppose they would have the inclination: or if they surrender this power, they might do it in commutation for other privileges. A change of circumstances might render a change of the law necessary; a revolution in commerce and manufactures might make some alterations proper, even if this bill be now perfect; for what is equal and just to-day might be otherwise two years hence.

Now, supposing these circumstances to occur in two years, and a new House of Representatives to have met, desirous of making those alterations which experience had demonstrated to be necessary, what would they say when they found we had parted with the power which the Constitution intended for the immediate representatives of the people? Would they not justly charge us with betraying the privileges we are sworn to maintain, by transferring the power of raising revenue to the Executive and Senate? He did not suppose they would neglect the public good ; but he contended the House had no right to transfer any part of their power to be exercised by any body whatsoever.

Mr. SYLVESTER was in favor of the limitation clause. A good deal had been said in the House respecting the jarring interests of the several States. It had been confessed on all hands that this was an experimental law; he viewed it as such, and expected, in the course of a few years, the Legislature would be able to discover the errors of this day. But what advantage can result from their knowledge, if they have not power to make the necessary alterations, or to build up a new system more perfect than the old? He had examined the annals of history, but was unable to discover that any nation had ever established a perpetual revenue law. He imagined gentlemen would admit these reasons to be sufficient to warrant the vote they were about to give.

Mr. CLYMER was of opinion that, if the bill were suffered to stand as it was, without the addition of the limiting clause, it would not be perpetual, as gentlemen seemed to imagine. He did not think it could be considered as a law in perpetuity, unless there was an express declaration to that effect. He had no doubt but a few years' experience would enable Congress to correct this bill. But if it was limited to ten or twelve years, it could not be done within that period without a violation of the public faith. He thought this act, like the acts of Parliament, should be commensurate with its object. The public credit could be supported only by providing funds to answer the demand.

The design of this clause, he supposed, was to prevent a misapplication of the revenue; but this could be secured by attending to the appropriation. The House would have, in this case, an effectual check over the Executive power, as well as over the other branch of the Legislature. He thought this was as much as they ought to have, consistent with the distribution of the powers made by the Constitution.

Mr. SINNICKSON did not expect this was to be a perpetual law, incapable of alteration; but he wished to see it a permanent system. The idea of a temporary system was long ago said to be out of the contemplation of the House. He should only observe, in addition to this, that our credit depended essentially upon what should be done at this time. He thought if the revenue existed merely upon the breath of the Legislature, for one or two years at a time, we should never attain that object. He thought that the public good required something substantial to be done in favor of those who had lent the public money in the hour of distress.

Mr. BOURN thought himself obliged to say a few words more, in order to justify the part he should take in the division of the House on this question. He conceived the manner in which the motion was brought before the House, after the bill was supposed to be gone through, did not give such opportunity for the members to consider the subject as its importance seemed to require, and which might have been had if it had been brought forward at an earlier period. If, said he, we are to have the measures of the Parliament of Great Britain hung about our necks in all our public proceedings, and observations from their practice perpetually sounding in our ears, that practice ought to be defined and established. He believed that in the whole volumes of the statute law there was not one single revenue act to be found with a limitation. He believed that the revenue laws passed fifty, sixty, eighty, and near a hundred years ago, in that kingdom, existed at the present moment. We have long seen and been convinced of the infirmities of the former Confederation, and shall we now rivet those infirmities upon the present Constitution? Are we never to stand upon a certain and solid foundation? Is not our public credit totally gone?

Has not experience convinced us that the loss of it would have been our total destruction, if the generous exertions we have lately made had not revived some degree of confidence in our future measures? Are we not so deeply in debt as to give us reason to believe that it will require many years to emancipate ourselves? If this is the case, will a revenue law for one or two years bring that relief which is expected? Will it prevent an increase of the public debt? Will it restore value to the evidences of that debt held by our creditors? He would ask any man, whether, if the United States were in the situation in which they were the last war, he would be induced to lend money upon a temporary and inadequate fund provided for two years? He believed the answer would be to the negative.

A gentleman has said that foreigners will not examine our acts in detail, to see whether sufficient security is afforded for their debt. He was of a different opinion. Would gentlemen say that they never examine a security? Would they lend money for ten years, to be repaid by annual instalments, when the funds extended no further than five years? He thought they had seen enough of public faith, and public bodies, to induce them to use greater caution. Look at the situation of the public creditors; see their disappointments and distresses, and say whether any thing short of an actual provision for the principal and interest of their debt can give them satisfaction? But can this be done by a temporary revenue law of one or two years? He did not mean that the law should be perpetual, because it was not in the power of the Legislature to pass such; he meant it should be adequate to the object. He contended it was an impropriety in language to call a law perpetual which it was always in the power of Congress to repeal or alter; and said, a law limited to ten or twelve years was more out of their power than one in which nothing was declared with respect to its perpetuity; the latter was always subject to the will of the Legislature, the former could not be altered during that period without a violation of the public faith.

Some gentlemen say they never will consent to a perpetual law; if this is the case, there will be an end to the Government. Do gentlemen tem, that it was the effect of compromise; but nevertheless, he thought it as free from defects as it was possible a revenue system could be formed with such materials as the House possessed; but if it was imperfect, he did not see the difficulties some gentlemen mentioned, in altering and amending it when experience shall have pointed out its defects.

He was sorry the appropriations could not be made at this time, for want of a knowledge of the public debt and current expenses; but he hoped it might be done before the members left their seats, and then gentlemen might have an opportunity of making this law commensurate with the object they have in view.

He would observe further, that all which had been said by gentlemen respecting public credit, tended to injure it and promote a spirit of speculation. He hoped it would not be understood, that this House were against providing an ample fund for the payment of the debts eventually, and for the punctual discharge of the interest in the interim. If we mean to borrow money, it is certain those who lend will judge of the security; and it is to be hoped, they will not think, from any thing that has been said here, that the Legislature hesitates to provide good and sufficient funds for their security.

Mr. BOURNOR acquiesced in the motion now brought forward for the sake of accommodation, although he thought the bill would stand better without any limitation clause whatever.

Mr. PAGE was against the latter part of this clause. It had been justly said, that the bill would be oppressive; but, from the necessity of the times, the people will submit to it. Shall we not let them see the end of their burden in the law itself? Are they to look into another bill for that purpose? Perhaps after the Senate have agreed to this act, they may oppose the limitation in the subsequent one; they may insist upon having this in perpetuity, and then the object which the House have in view will be defeated.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved a division of the question.

Mr. LEE wished to strike out that part of the motion which related to the exception.

Mr. LIVERMORE seconded Mr. LEE.

The question was put, and that part of the clause lost.

The question now stood as originally introduced to the House.

The previous question was then demanded by five members: Shall the main question be now put? And on the question, shall the main question be now put? it was resolved in the affirmative.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the amendment proposed to the said bill, it was resolved in the affirmative—ayes 41, noes 8.

The ayes and noes being called for by one-fifth of the members present:

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,
Messrs. Abraham Baldwin, Egbert Benson, Theodorick Bland, Adamus Burke, Daniel Carroll, Isaac

Those who voted in the negative, are,

Messrs. Fisher Ames, Elias Boudinot, Lambert Cadwalader, George Clymer, John Lawrence, Roger Sherman, Thomas Simmickson, and George Thatcher.

The clause being added, it was agreed to fill the blank so as to read the first day of June, 1796.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had instructed their committee appointed to confer with a committee of this House, and report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with, at the public expense, to receive proposals for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress.

An engrossed bill, for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States, was read a third time, and the blanks therein filled up.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States."

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said bill to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

MONDAY, May 18.

A petition of John Bryce, of the city of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying to be employed as a stationer and book-binder to Congress.

Also the several petitions of Edward Evelith Powers, and Thomas Greenleaf, printers, praying to be employed in the printing service of Congress.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the committee appointed to receive proposals for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress.

Resolved, That leave be given to bring in a bill concerning the importation of certain persons into the United States, prior to the year 1808, and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. SIMMICKSON, and Mr. MUHLBURG, do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion, ordered, that a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill, providing for the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, in conformity to the Constitution, and for the purposes therein mentioned; and that Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. HEISTER, and Mr. SENEY, be of the said committee.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for collecting the duties on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States. Mr. PAGE in the Chair.

Mr. LAWRENCE wished this subject delayed a few days, that the whole system of impost and tonnage might be decided upon, because the extension necessary to be used in the collection depended on the quantity of the duties.

This bill was founded upon the laws of the several States, and was very inadequate to the objects of the General Government, whose measures ought to be perfectly equal. By the laws of some States, they rate the goods at the value at the time and place of importation; in others, at their value at the place from whence they were exported; this would cause a difference in the duties of twenty-five or fifty per cent., and the Constitution declares, that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be equal. Moreover, some States admitted paper in payment of duties; in cases where this medium was depreciated there would also be an inequality. For these reasons, and others that might readily occur, he wished the business to lie over.

Mr. HUNTINGTON had doubts respecting the constitutionality of the bill, besides being well satisfied of its incompetency: the inequalities mentioned by the gentleman from New York were very apparent; he would add another. The collection would be enforced with a greater or less degree of energy, according to the systems of the several States, and would be unequal. Besides, there are some States without impost and collecting laws, and, by the bill, they are to be governed by the laws of the adjoining State; he thought this would justly give ground of umbrage. How would one State like to be regulated by the laws of another which they had no power in forming? The State he represented would find itself in this predicament. He hoped the bill would be changed, and a system introduced upon general principles.

Mr. JACKSON thought the bill imperfect, and liable to all the objections mentioned. If a temporary system, for laying an impost of five per cent. upon all goods imported, had taken place at the first meeting of Congress, he should have agreed to some regulation of this kind, merely to embrace the Spring importations; but as that was passed, he was for making the collection bill of a similar nature with the impost bill.

Mr. Vining saw insuperable difficulties in passing such a law as this. Delaware and Jersey stood in the same predicament as Connecticut with respect to an impost law. He hoped, therefore, from a regard to those States, the bill would be given up; he thought the best way to get rid of the business would be for the committee to rise. This being agreed to, Mr. PAGE said, he was at a loss to make a regular report, as the committee had given no particular instructions: but, the truth was, they desired to have nothing more to do with the bill. Whereupon, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee respecting the enrolment and preservation of the acts of Congress, and to regulate the mode of presenting addresses, &c. to the President, and made some progress in considering the same; after which they rose and reported.

Adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 19.

A message from the Senate announced that they had appointed a committee, to join a committee on the part of this House, to present to the President of the United States the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths," after the same shall be duly engrossed, examined, and signed by the Speaker of this House, and the President of the Senate.

Ordered, That Mr. PARTRIDGE and Mr. FLOYD be appointed a committee on the part of this House, for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate.

Mr. SYLVESTER, from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, to consider and report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with, at the public expense, and to receive proposals for printing the acts, and other proceedings of Congress, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

On motion of Mr. BOURNOR, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair.

Mr. BOURNOR—I rise, Mr. Chairman, with diffidence, to introduce a subject to the consideration of the committee, which I had hoped would have been brought forward by an abler hand; the pressing necessity of it must alone be my excuse. The great Executive departments which were in existence under the late Confederation, are now at an end, at least so far as not to be able to conduct the business of the United States. If we take up the present Constitution, we shall find it contemplates departments of an Executive nature in aid of the President: it then remains for us to carry this intention into effect, which I take it will be best done by settling principles for organizing them in this place, and afterwards appointing a select committee to bring in a bill for the same. I need say little to convince gentlemen of the necessity which presses us into a pursuit of this measure. They know that our national debt is considerable; the interest on our foreign loans, and the instalments due, amount to two millions of dollars. This arrearage, together with the domestic debt, is of great magnitude, and it will be attended with the most dreadful consequences to let these affairs run into confusion and ruin, for want of proper regulations to keep them in order.

I shall move the committee, therefore, to come to some such resolution as this: That an office be established for the management of the finances of the United States, at the head of which shall be an officer to be denominated the Secretary of Finance. I am not tenacious of the style, perhaps some other may be proper, but the object I have in view is to establish the department; after which we may go on to narrate the duties of the officer, and accommodate the name to the acts he is to perform. The departments under the late Constitution are not to be models for us to form ours upon, by reason of the essential change which has taken place in the Government, and the new distribution of Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers.

If gentlemen then agree with me so far, I shall proceed to restrain the Secretary of Finance, and all persons under him, from being concerned in trade or commerce, and make it his duty to superintend the treasury and the finances of the United States, examine the public debts and engagements, inspect the collection and expenditure of the revenue, and to form and digest plans for its improvement. There may be other duties which gentlemen may add, as I do not pretend to have perfectly enumerated them all. After this point is settled, we may then go to the consideration of the War Department and the Department of Foreign Affairs; but, for the present, I would wish to confine ourselves to the Department of Finance.

Mr. BENSON wished the committee to consider what he judged to be a previous question, namely, how many departments there should be established? He approved of the division mentioned by the gentleman; but would, with his leave, move that there be established in aid of the Chief Magistrate, three Executive departments, to be severally denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, Treasury, and War. After determining this question, if it was a proper division, the Committee might proceed to enumerate the duties which should be attached to each.

Mr. BOURNOR was not tenacious of the form he had thrown his motion into, it was the substance he contended for; he had therefore no objection to the gentleman's motion. While he was up, he would correct a mistake into which he had fallen; it respected the arrangement of the interest and instalments of the foreign debt. He had learned from good authority, since he sat down, that there was nothing due on this account, but that it was completely paid up to the present year; but this did not do away the necessity of the present motion.

Mr. BLAND objected to the last motion as too indefinite, and feared the committee would precipitate the business, if they did not order the motions to lie on the table until to-morrow, or rather rise and refer it to be digested by a select committee.

Mr. WHITE wished gentlemen had been more particular in bringing this question forward, and had pointed out the nature and extent of the powers proposed to be given, so that his mind might be able to embrace the whole subject.

Mr. BOURNOR said, he could apologize for not bringing the business on in another way. It seemed to be a settled point in the House that a Committee of the Whole was the proper place for determining principles before they were sent elsewhere; he had therefore adopted that mode on the present occasion, though his own judgment would incline him to pursue that last mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BLAND.) He conceived the necessity of having such an office was indisputable; the Government could not be carried on without it; but there may be a question with respect to the mode in which the business of the office shall be conducted; there may also be a question respecting the constitution of it, but none with respect to the establishment of either of the three departments he had mentioned.

Mr. PARTRIDGE wished the committee to attend to one object at a time. If they had determined upon the propriety of the Department of Finance, they could go on to the next, and so on until they had decided upon all they conceived necessary; for his part, he could not see any reason for determining there should be three or five great departments; or what was the object of such a question, unless it was to decide the whole business at once.

Mr. BENSON said, his motion was founded upon the Constitutional division of these powers; the Constitution contemplated them, because it gave the President the right of requiring the opinion of the principal officer in each of the Executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices. If gentlemen were inclined to waive the determination for the present, he had no objection; it was certainly a subject of great importance, and required time for consideration.

Mr. VINING thought the gentleman should have added another department, viz: the Home Department. The territorial possessions of the United States, and the domestic affairs, would be objects of the greatest magnitude, and he suspected would render it essentially requisite to establish such a one.

Mr. BOURNOR wished to confine the question to the Department of Finance.

A motion was made by Mr. BLAND for the committee's rising.

Mr. MADISON hoped they would not rise until the principles were settled. He thought it much better to determine the outlines of all business in a Committee of the Whole. He was satisfied it would be found, on experience, to shorten their deliberations. If the gentleman who had offered motions to the committee would withdraw them, he would offer one, which he judged likely to embrace the intentions of both gentlemen.

Mr. BENSON withdrew his motion, and Mr. MADISON moved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that there shall be established an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, at the head of which there shall be an officer, to be called the Secretary to the Department of Foreign Affairs, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and to be removable by the President.

That there shall be a Treasury Department, &c.

That there shall be a War Department, &c.

Mr. VINING seconded the motion, and offered to amend it, by adding the Domestic Department, mutatis mutandis. He said this department, in his opinion, was of absolute necessity, more requisite than either of the other three, except the Department of Finance; the present and increasing duties of such a department will oblige them to make the establishment.

Mr. LIVERMORE was not prepared to decide on the question even as now brought forward, nor did he see a reason why the Department of Foreign Affairs was placed at the head of the list. He thought the Treasury Department of more importance, and consequently deserved the precedence.

As to the Domestic Department just mentioned by the gentleman from Delaware, he thought its duties might be blended with the others, and thereby save the United States the expense of one grand department. If the gentleman, therefore, would wait to see what were the duties assigned to them severally, he would be able to judge respecting his motion with greater propriety.

Mr. VINING withdrew his motion for the present.

And the committee agreed to the establishment of the Department of Foreign Affairs, and placing at the head thereof an officer to be called the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; but when they came to the mode of appointing the officer—

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina) moved to strike out the words "who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." He conceived the words to be unnecessary; besides, it looked as if they were conferring power, which was not the case, for the Constitution had expressly given the power of appointment in the words there used. He also objected to the subsequent part of this paragraph, because it declared the President alone to have the power of removal.

Mr. PAGE saw no impropriety in passing an act to carry into execution the views of the Constitution, and therefore had no objection to repeat those words in the resolution. He thought if the committee stopped there, they would be under no difficulty respecting the propriety of their measure, but if they went further, they might meet with considerable embarrassment.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that as there was a discretionary power in the Legislature to give the privilege to the President alone of appointing inferior officers, there could be no injury in declaring in the resolution the Constitutional mode of appointing the heads of departments; however, if gentlemen were uneasy, he would not object to strike it out.

Mr. LEY thought this officer was an inferior officer; the President was the great and responsible officer of the Government; this was only to aid him in performing his Executive duties; hence he conceived the power of appointing to be in the gift of the Legislature, and therefore the words were proper.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina.)—This officer is at the head of a department, and one of those who are to advise the President; the inferior officers mentioned in the Constitution are clerks and other subordinate persons. The words are only a repetition of the words in the Constitution, and are consequently superfluous.

The question was taken on striking out those words, and carried in the affirmative.

The committee proceeded to the discussion of the power of the President to remove this officer.

Mr. SMITH said he had doubts whether the officer could be removed by the President. He apprehended he could only be removed by an impeachment before the Senate, and that, being once in office, he must remain there until convicted upon impeachment. He wished gentlemen would consider this point well before they decided it.

Mr. MADISON did not concur with the gentleman in his interpretation of the Constitution. What, said he, would be the consequence of such construction? It would in effect establish every officer of the Government on the firm tenure of good behaviour; not the heads of Departments only, but all the inferior officers of those Departments, would hold their offices during good behaviour, and that to be judged of by one branch of the Legislature only on the impeachment of the other. If the Constitution means this by its declarations to be the case, we must submit; but I should lament it as a fatal error interwoven in the system, and one that would ultimately prove its destruction. I think the inference would not arise from a fair construction of the words of that instrument.

It is very possible that an officer who may not incur the displeasure of the President, may be guilty of actions that ought to forfeit his place. The power of this House may reach him by the means of an impeachment, and he may be removed even against the will of the President; so that the declaration in the Constitution was intended as a supplemental security for the good behaviour of the public officers. It is possible the case I have stated may happen. Indeed, it may, perhaps, on some occasion, be found necessary to impeach the President himself; surely, therefore, it may happen to a subordinate officer, whose bad actions may be connived at or overlooked by the President. Hence the people have an additional security in this Constitutional provision.

I think it absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removing from office; it will make him, in a peculiar manner, responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself, if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States, or neglects to superintend their conduct, so as to check their excesses. On the Constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt.

Mr. BENSON.—If we refer to the Constitution for light on this subject, it will appear evident that the objection is not well founded: The objection is this: that an officer ought not to be removed but by impeachment; then every officer is appointed during good behavior. Now, the Constitution expressly declares, that the Judges, both of the Supreme and Inferior Courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior. If it is declared, that they are to hold their offices by this particular tenure, it follows that the other officers of the Government should hold them only at pleasure. He thought this an important question, and one in which they were obliged to take the Constitution by construction. For although it detailed the mode of appointing to office; it was not explicit as to the superseding; this clause, therefore, would be a mere declaration of the Legislative construction on this point. He thought the importance and necessity of making the declaration, that the Chief Magistrate might supersede any civil officer was evident, and he should therefore vote in favor of the clause as it stood.

Mr. VINING said: there were no negative words in the Constitution to preclude the President from the exercise of this power; but there was a strong presumption that he was invested with it: because it was declared, that all Executive power should be vested in him, except in cases where it is otherwise qualified; as, for example, he could not fully exercise his Executive power in making treaties, unless with the advice and consent of the Senate—the same in appointing to office.

He viewed the power of removal, by impeachment, as a supplementary security to the people against the continuance of improper persons in office; but it did not consist with the nature of things, that this should be the only mode of removal; it was attended with circumstances that would render it insufficient to secure the public safety, which was a primary object in every Government. Witness a transatlantic instance of its incompetency—he meant the famous case of Mr. Hastings. With what difficulty was that prosecution carried on! What a length of time did it take to determine! What is to be done while the impeachment is depending? For, according to the ideas of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) he cannot be removed but on conviction. If he cannot be removed, I should suppose he cannot be suspended; and what security have the people against the machinations of a bad man in office? He had no doubt but the Constitution gave this power to the President; but, if doubts were entertained, he thought it prudent to make a Legislative declaration of the sentiments of Congress on this point. He was therefore in favor of the clause.

Mr. BLAND thought the power given by the Constitution to the Senate, respecting the appointment to office, would be rendered almost nugatory if the President had the power of removal. If the first nomination of the President should be disapproved by the Senate, and the second agreed to, he had nothing to do but wait the adjournment of Congress, and then fill the vacancy with his favorite; who, by thus getting into the possession of the office, would have a considerable chance of permanency in it. He thought it consistent with the nature of things, that the power which appointed should remove; and would not object to a declaration in the resolution, if the words were added, that the President shall remove from office, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He agreed that the removal by impeachment was a supplementary aid favorable to the people; but he was clearly of opinion, that the same power that appointed had, or ought to have, the power of removal.

Mr. JACKSON wished the motion had been referred to a sub-committee to digest: it seemed to him they were building the house before the plan was drawn. He wished to see the system reduced to writing, that he might leisurely judge of the necessity and propriety of each office and its particular duties.

With respect to the question before the House, he was of opinion that if the House had the power of removal by the Constitution, they could not give it out of their hands; because every power recognised by the Constitution must remain where it was placed by that instrument. But the words in the Constitution declare, in positive terms, that all civil officers shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, high crimes and misdemeanors; and however long it may take to decide, in this way it must be done. He did not think the case of Mr. Hastings ought to be brought forward as a precedent for conducting such business in the United States. He believed whenever an impeachment was brought before the Senate, they would proceed with all imaginable speed to its termination. He should, in case of impeachment, be willing to go so far as to give the power of suspension to the President, and he thought this all the security which the public safety required; it would prevent the party from doing further mischief. He agreed with the gentleman in the general principle, that the body who appointed ought to have the power of removal, as the body which enacts laws can repeal them; but if the power is deposited in any particular department by the Constitution, it is out of the power of the House to alter it.

Mr. MADISON did not conceive it was a proper construction of the Constitution to say that there was no other mode of removing from office than that by impeachment; he believed this, as applied to the Judges, might be the case; but he could never imagine it extended in the manner which gentlemen contended for. He believed they would not assert, that any part of the Constitution declared that the only way to remove should be by impeachment; the contrary might be inferred, because Congress may establish offices by law; therefore, most certainly, it is in the discretion of the Legislature to say upon what terms the office shall be held, either during good behavior or during pleasure. Under this construction, the principles of the Constitution would be reconcilable in every part; but under that of the gentleman from South Carolina, it would be incongruous and faulty. He wondered how the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) would reconcile his principles so far as to permit the President to suspend the officer. He begged his colleague (Mr. BLAND) to consider the inconvenience his doctrine would occasion, by keeping the Senate constantly sitting, in order to give their assent to the removal of an officer; they might see there would be a constant probability of the Senate being called upon to exercise this power, consequently they could not be a moment absent. Now, he did not believe the Constitution imposed any such duty upon them; why, then, said he, shall we enjoin it, especially at such expense of the public treasure?

Mr. BOURNIEUR would by no means infringe the Constitution by any act of his; for if he thought this motion would lead the committee beyond the powers assigned to the Legislature, he would give it a decided negative; but, on an impartial examination of that instrument, he could not see the least foundation for such an objection; however, he was glad the question had come forward, because he wished to give a Legislative construction to this part of the Constitution.

The gentlemen who denied the power of the President to remove from office, founded their opinion upon the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, where it is declared, that all officers shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason or bribery. If their construction is admissible, and no officer whatever is to be removed in any other way than by impeachment, we shall be in a deplorable situation indeed. Consider the extent of the United States, and the difficulty of conducting a prosecution against an officer, who, with the witnesses, resides a thousand miles from the seat of Government. But suppose the officer should, by sickness, or some other accident, be rendered incapable of performing the functions of the office, must he be continued? And yet it is to be apprehended, that such a disability would not furnish any good ground for impeachment; it could not be laid as treason or bribery, nor perhaps as a high crime or misdemeanor. Would gentlemen parrow the operation of the Constitution in this manner, and render it impossible to be executed?

When the committee come to consider the clause respecting the removal by impeachment, they will find it is intended as a punishment for a crime, and not intended as the ordinary means of re-arranging the Departments. We find in the clause in the Constitution subsequent to the one just mentioned, that the Judges are declared to hold their offices during good behavior; but if this is the tenure by which all offices are to be held, where is the necessity of this explicit declaration in favor of the Judges? Now, if any thing is to be drawn by construction from this part of the Constitution, it is that the Judges alone are to hold their offices during good behavior; but all other officers during pleasure, unless otherwise provided in the Constitution. He was certain, from the nature of things, that it was not the intention of the Constitution to prevent the President from removing an officer who was found to be wholly unfit or incapable of doing his duty.

Mr. WHITE thought no office under the Government was to be held during pleasure, except those which are to be constituted by law; but all the heads of departments are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He conceived that, in all cases, the party who appointed ought to judge of the removal, except in those cases which by the Constitution are excepted, and in those cases impeachment and conviction are the only mode by which they can be removed. Although this committee may consider of the expediency of the present measure, yet the Senate would check, or correct, an improper decision; and he would ask the supporters of this part of the resolution, whether they expected the Senate would part with a power which they might think the Constitution vested in them? He had doubts respecting the authority of the House to decide this question, and was very tenacious of doing any thing that would look like an encroachment on the privileges of the other branch of the Legislature.

Mr. THATCHER asked, why the Judges were particularly mentioned in the Constitution as holding their offices during good behavior, if it was not supposed that, without this express declaration in their favor, they in common with all other officers not immediately chosen by the State Legislatures and the people, would hold them during pleasure? The clause respecting impeachment was particularly calculated for removing unworthy officers of the other description. Holding this construction of the Constitution to be right, he was in favor of the clause as it stood.

Mr. JACKSON acknowledged the Judges held their offices during good behavior, and he believed the Legislature had the power of determining the time an office should continue, but did not think they could give to the President alone the power of removing those who were appointed with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH admitted that Congress had a right to say that an office should be held a limited time, or for one year; but if no precise period was fixed, he conceived the officer's appointment to be during good behavior, and that the person could not be removed by the President. The Constitution expresses the precise time for which the President of the United States shall be chosen; if no precise time had been fixed, he should conceive the tenure to be during good behavior. Now, on the same principle, he apprehended, if the Legislature did not fix a precise time for the Secretary of Foreign Affairs to hold his office, he would keep it during good behavior; all that could be done in case of misbehaviour would be, to suspend the officer until after trial and conviction, when he would be removed. A gentleman has asked, what must be done if an incumbent is found unfit for his office? He would answer, the person must remain there. What must be done if a member of this House is found unfit to perform the business of his constituents? Certainly he must and will continue on this floor. You cannot remove him unless guilty of some crime. He did not hold the opinion mentioned by some gentlemen, that the power who appoints can remove, because there were several cases where those who appoint have not the power of removal. In some of the State Governments, the chief Executive Magistrate appoints to office, but cannot remove. So, under this Constitution, neither the people nor the Legislature can remove the members of the Senate or House of Representatives; nor can the Electors remove the President or Vice President, both of whom they appoint to those offices. He apprehended the power which the Constitution gave to Congress of establishing certain offices by law, would enable them to limit the tenure of the office; but if Congress declined the exercise of this power, the officers appointed would continue in their station during good behaviour.

Mr. LAWRENCE apprehended the words of the resolution limited the tenure of the office in the manner which the honorable gentleman last up seemed to admit to be proper. To be sure, it did not denominate the period by years or days, but it nevertheless fixed a precise period for its existence, viz. during the pleasure of the President. The Constitution had certainly intended that Congress should define the tenure of office, or it would never have declared the Judges should continue during good behaviour. This Constitutional provision in their favor, was to render them independent of the Legislature, which it was not supposed would be the case if nothing on this head had been declared. It is the only thing which prevents us from making them dependent upon the will of the President for their continuance in office, or from ordaining that their commission shall expire at the end of a certain term of years.

He conceived, as the Constitution was silent with respect to the time the Secretary of Foreign Affairs should remain in office, that it therefore depended upon the will of the Legislature to say how the department should be constituted and established by law, and the conditions upon which he shall enjoy the office. We can say he shall hold it for three years from his appointment, or during good behaviour; and we may declare unfitness and incapacity causes of removal, and make the President alone judge of this case. We may authorize the President to remove him for any cause he thinks proper. It is in our power to make such declaration; but at the same time the Constitution provides, that the President shall not have it in his power to hold a person in office who has been guilty of crimes or misdemeanors against the Government; the power of removal in such cases is in the Legislature, by impeachment. The only question which remained, he considered to be, could the Legislature safely trust the President with this power? The question of right he conceived to be indisputable; it was merely a question of expediency. Gentlemen admit that we have a right to limit the duration of the office. What is authorizing the removal by the President but limiting it? and if we conceive this the best method of limiting it, why shall it be objected to as unconstitutional? If it increases the responsibility of the President, and certainly it does this, why should the Legislature hesitate in obtaining the highest security for the public interest and safety?

Mr. SYLVESTER thought the Constitution ought to have a liberal construction, and therefore was of opinion that the clause relative to the removal by impeachment was intended as a check upon the President, as already mentioned by some gentlemen, and to secure to the people, by means of their representatives, a Constitutional mode of obtaining justice against speculators and defaulters in office, who might be protected by the persons appointing them. He apprehended the doctrine held out by the gentleman from South Carolina would involve the Government in great difficulties, if not in ruin, and he did not see it was a necessary construction of the Constitution. Why, then, should the House search for a meaning, when the Constitution inconsistent with itself, make a more rational one is at hand? He, however, inclined at present to the sentiments of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BLAND,) who thought the Senate ought to be joined with the President in the removal, as they were joined by the Constitution in the appointment to office.

Mr. GOODRICH was decidedly against combining the Senate in this business. He wished to make the President as responsible as possible for the conduct of the officers who were to execute the duties of his own branch of the Government. If the removal and appointment were placed in the hands of a numerous body, the responsibility would be lessened. He admitted there was a propriety in allowing the Senate to advise the President in the choice of officers; this the Constitution had ordained for wise purposes; but there could be no real advantage arising from the concurrence of the Senate to the removal, but great disadvantages. It might beget faction and party, which would prevent the Senate from paying proper attention to the public business. Upon the whole, he concluded the community would be served by the best men when the Senate concurred with the President in the appointment; but if any oversight was committed, it could best be corrected by the superintending agent. It was the peculiar duty of the President to watch over the executive officers; but of what avail would be his inspection, unless he had a power to correct the abuses he might discover.

Mr. MADISON.—I look upon every Constitutional question, whatever its nature may be, as of great importance. I look upon the present to be doubly so, because its nature is of the highest moment to the well-being of the Government. I have listened with attention to the objections which have been stated, and to the replies that have been made, and I think the investigation of the meaning of the Constitution has supported the doctrine I brought forward. If you consult the expediency, it will be greatly against the doctrine advanced by gentlemen on the other side of the question. See to what inconsistency gentlemen drive themselves by their construction of the Constitution. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) in order to bring to conviction and punishment an offender in any of the principal offices, must have recourse to a breach of the common law, and yet he may there be found guilty, and maintain his office, because he is fixed by the Constitution. It has been said, we may guard against the inconvenience of that construction, by limiting the duration of the office to a term of years; but, during that term, there is no way of getting rid of a bad officer but by impeachment. During the time this is depending, the person may continue to commit those crimes for which he is impeached, because if his construction of the Constitution is right, the President can have no more power to suspend than he has to remove.

What fell from one of my colleagues (Mr. BLAND) appears to have more weight than anything hitherto suggested. The Constitution, at the first view, may seem to favor his opinion; but that must be the case only at the first view; for, if we examine it, we shall find his construction incompatible with the spirit and principles contained in that instrument.

It is said, that it comports with the nature of things, that those who appoint should have the power of removal; but I cannot conceive that this sentiment is warranted by the Constitution; I believe it would be found very inconvenient in practice. It is one of the most prominent features of the Constitution, a principle that pervades the whole system, that there should be the highest possible degree of responsibility in all the Executive officers thereof; any thing, therefore, which tends to lessen this responsibility, is contrary to its spirit and intention, and, unless it is saddled upon us expressly by the letter of that work, I shall oppose the admission of it into any act of the Legislature. Now, if the heads of the Executive departments are subjected to removal by the President alone, we have in him security for the good behaviour of the officer. If he does not conform to the judgment of the President in doing the executive duties of his office, he can be displaced. This makes him responsible to the great Executive power, and makes the President responsible to the public for the conduct of the person he has nominated and appointed to aid him in the administration of his department. But if the President shall join in a collusion with this officer, and continue a bad man in office, the case of impeachment will reach the culprit, and drag him forth to punishment. But if you take the other construction, and say he shall not be displaced but by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the President is no longer answerable for the conduct of the officer; all will depend upon the Senate. You here destroy a real responsibility without obtaining even the shadow; for no gentleman will pretend to say the responsibility of the Senate can be of such a nature as to afford substantial security. But why, it may be asked, was the Senate joined with the President in appointing to office, if they have no responsibility? I answer, merely for the sake of advising, being supposed, from their nature, better acquainted with the character of the candidates than an individual; yet even here the President is held to the responsibility—he nominates, and, with their consent, appoints. No person can be forced upon him as an assistant by any other branch of the Government.

There is another objection to this construction, which I consider of some weight, and shall therefore mention to the committee. Perhaps there was no argument urged with more success, or more plausibly grounded against the Constitution, under which we are now deliberating, than that founded on the mingling of the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government in one body. It has been objected, that the Senate have too much of the Executive power even, by having a control over the President in the appointing to office. Now, shall we extend this connection between the Legislative and Executive departments, which will strengthen the objection, and diminish the responsibility we have in the head of the Executive? I cannot but believe, if gentlemen weigh well these considerations, they will think it safe and expedient to adopt the clause.

Mr. GERRY.—The Constitution provides for the appointment of the public officers in this manner: The President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. Now, if there be no other clause respecting the appointment, I shall be glad to see how the heads of departments are to be removed by the President alone. What clause is it that the President gives his power in express terms? I believe there is none such. If there is a power of removal, besides that by impeachment, it must vest somewhere. It must vest in the President, or in the President and Senate, or in the President, Senate, and House of Representatives. Now there is no clause which expressly vests it in the President. I believe no gentleman contends it is in this House, because that would be that mingling of the Executive and Legislative powers gentlemen deprecate. I presume, then, gentlemen will grant, that if there is such a power, it vests with the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who are the body that appoints. I think we ought to be cautious how we step in between the President and the Senate, to abridge the power of the one, or increase the other. If the power of removal vests where I suppose, we, by this declaration, undertake to transfer it to the President alone. It has been mentioned, that it is proper to give this power to the President, in order to make him more fully responsible for this officer. I am for supporting the President to the utmost of my power, and making him as responsible as possible. I would therefore vest every gift of office, in the power of the Legislature, in the President alone; but I cannot think we ought to attempt to give him authority to remove from office, in cases where the Constitution has placed it in other hands.

Mr. LIVERMORE considered this as a Constitutional question, and was of opinion, that the same power which appointed an officer, had the right of removal also, unless it was restrained by an express declaration to the contrary. As the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is empowered to appoint ambassadors, certainly they have a right to remove them and appoint others. In the case of the judges, they must be appointed for life, or during good behaviour. He had no idea, that it could ever enter into the heart of any man living, that all officers appointed under the Constitution were to have a perpetuity in office. The judges themselves would not have had this right, if had not been expressly given by the Constitution, but would be removable in like manner with ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls. He took it, therefore, in the present case, that the President and the Senate would have the power of removing the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. The only question, therefore, which appears to be before the committee is, whether we shall give this power to the President alone? And with that he thought they had nothing to do. He supposed, if the clause was left out, the President and the Senate would proceed, as directed by the Constitution, to appoint the officer; and hereafter, if they judged it necessary, would remove him; but if they neglected to do so, when it was necessary, by reason of his misdemeanors, this House would impeach him, and so get rid of him on conviction.

Mr. BLAND.—It seems to be agreed on all hands, that there does exist a power of removal; the contrary doctrine would be a solecism in Government. If an officer embezzles the public money, or neglects or refuses to do the duties of his appointment, can it be supposed there is no way of getting rid of such a person? He was certain it was essentially necessary such a power should be lodged somewhere, or it would be impossible to carry the Government into execution. Their inquiries were therefore reduced to this point: Does it reside, agreeably to the Constitution, in the President, or in the President and the Senate? The Constitution declares, that the President and the Senate shall appoint, and it naturally follows, that the power which appoints shall remove also. What would be the consequence of the removal by the President alone, he had already mentioned, and need not repeat. A new President might, by turning out the great officers, bring about a change of the ministry, and throw the affairs of the Union into disorder: would not this, in fact, make the President a monarch, and give him absolute power over all the great departments of Government? It signifies nothing that the Senate have a check over the appointment, because he can remove, and tire out the good disposition of the Senate.

His colleague had objected to the removal in this way, because the Senate would be kept constantly sitting. He did not think this objection of any weight, because the Constitution made some other things their duty, which would require them to be pretty constantly sitting. He alluded to the part they were called upon to perform in making treaties; this, therefore, would be a trifling objection.

Mr. BENSON thought it was not absolutely necessary to make any provision on this head, because the power was given to the President by the Constitution; but as the argument had been pretty well gone into, he would add no more at present, than just to remark an error the gentleman last up had fallen into. He had supposed the President to have the powers of a monarch, that he could introduce and keep a favorite in office in despite of every other branch of the Government: the Senate was an effectual check to a system of favoritism, and it lay in the power of the House to correct any abuse arising from such a system, if it unhappily was fallen into.

Mr. BLAND insisted that the check of the Senate was not sufficient, if the power of removal was taken from them. Indeed, he was satisfied, from the privilege the President had of nominating and filling up vacancies pro tempore, he would become absolute, if he alone had the power of removal. He was therefore against this part of the motion, both on principle and policy. He therefore, with the advice and consent of the Senate, "so that the power of removal might be declared to be in the same body as the Constitution placed the appointment."

Mr. CLYMAN said, the power of removal was an Executive power, and as such belonged to the President alone, by the express words of the Constitution: "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The Senate were not an Executive body; they were a Legislative one. It was true, in some instances, they held a qualified check over the Executive power, but that was in consequence of an express declaration in the Constitution; without such declaration, they would not have been called upon for advice and consent in the case of appointment. Why, then, shall we extend their power to control the removal which is naturally in the Executive, unless it is likewise expressly declared in the Constitution?

The question on adding the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," as moved by Mr. BLAND, was put and lost.

Mr. WHITE.—It has been said, that the Senate are not an Executive body. I grant that they are not an Executive body when they are sitting for Legislative purposes; but they are an Executive body when performing their Executive functions as required in the Constitution.

Every question respecting treaties or public officers must go through their hands. Why shall we make the President responsible for what goes through other hands? He is not solely responsible, agreeably to the Constitution, for the conduct of the officers he nominates, and the Senate appoints; why then talk of obtaining a greater degree of responsibility than is known to the Constitution?

We are told, that we ought to keep the Legislative and Executive departments distinct; if we were forming a constitution, the observation would be worthy of due consideration, and he would agree to the principles; but the Constitution is formed, and the powers blended; the wished-for separation is therefore impracticable.

Mr. VIVING remarked, that the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLYMAN) was too well founded to be overturned by the critical distinction made by the gentleman last up, and was sufficient to convince gentlemen, if they would consider it well, that the Constitution vested the power of removal in the President alone. He begged the committee to consider the monstrous effect it would produce if the Legislature went on to mingle the Legislative and Executive powers. He would place it in one other point of view, and then have done with the subject. It is well known, that the Senate are to decide upon an impeachment made by this House. Now, can they be impartial judges when they have already given judgment in the case? Suppose the President communicates his suspicions to the Senate respecting the malfeasance of a public officer, and they, from factious or party views, or, indeed, for want of full information, refuse their consent to the removal; can they be the equal and unbiased judicature which the Constitution contemplates them to be? He thought they could not.

Mr. PAGE requested the committee to delay the decision of this question, because he did not wish gentlemen to commit themselves, without having fully reflected upon the subject. It had presented itself to his mind, as one of the most momentous questions that could arise, in which the rights of the People, the energy of Government, and the liberty of posterity were staked. He begged them not to cast the die, on which the fate of millions was hazarded, until they had maturely considered the subject. He felt a degree of security in the check the Senate had over the President, in appointing to office; but he should not think himself safe, if the power of removal was in the President alone.

The question was now taken, and carried by a considerable majority, in favor of declaring the power of removal to be in the President.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GERRY knew nothing of the system which gentlemen propose to adopt, in arranging the Treasury Department. He thought they were hurrying on business too rapidly. Gentlemen had already committed themselves on one very important point; he hoped the honorable mover of this proposition would explain his intentions, before the committee decided the question. He could not see where it might lead.

The late Congress had, on long experience, thought proper to organize the Treasury Department, in a mode different from that proposed by the resolution. He would be glad to know what the reasons were that should induce the committee to adopt a different system from that which had been found most beneficial to the United States. He hoped gentlemen would give time for considering the subject maturely; wherefore, he would move to postpone it, for the present, and proceed to the War Department.

Mr. BOURNOT rose, to express his surprise that gentlemen should say that they were not prepared, when the subject had been often mentioned to the House, and its necessity was self-evident. He had a week ago proposed to refer it to a select committee, but had been overruled. He was told then, that the proper mode of doing the business was, to go into a Committee of the Whole. He had taken that mode, in consequence, and hoped the business would not be unnecessarily delayed. Mr. GOUGH admitted the necessity of having a Treasury Department, as said by the gentleman last up, was self-evident; but it was not obvious whether the Department should be placed under one man, or a Board of Commissioners. In order to have time for considering the question, he would second the motion for postponing.

Mr. BENSON said, the motion of postponement was contrary to the rules of the House. The gentleman might move the committee to rise, and the effect would be the same. While he was up, he would declare his sentiment to be in favor of a single head of this Department, rather than three; but he would have the principal officer well checked in the execution of his trust.

The motion being changed for the rising of the committee, it was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, May 20.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair. The resolution for establishing the Treasury Department being under consideration:

Mr. GERRY.—We are now called upon, Mr. Speaker, to deliberate, whether we shall place this all-important Department in the hands of a single individual, or in a Board of Commissioners. I presume the gentleman, who has brought forward this string of propositions, means, that this officer shall have power to examine into the state of the public debt and expenses, to receive and disburse the revenue, to devise plans for its improvement and expansion, and, in short, to superintend and direct the receipts and expenditure, and govern the finances of the United States; having under him officers to do the subordinate business of registering and recording his transactions, and a Comptroller to control his operations with respect to the accounts and vouchers, more fully responsible for this officer. I am for supporting the President to the utmost of my power, and making him as responsible as possible. I would therefore vest every gift of office, in the power of the Legislature, in the President alone; but I cannot think we ought to attempt to give him authority to remove from office, in cases where the Constitution has placed it in other hands.

Mr. LIVERMORE considered this as a Constitutional question, and was of opinion, that the same power which appointed an officer, had the right of removal also, unless it was restrained by an express declaration to the contrary. As the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is empowered to appoint ambassadors, certainly they have a right to remove them and appoint others. In the case of the judges, they must be appointed for life, or during good behavior. He had no idea, that it could ever enter into the heart of any man living, that all officers appointed under the Constitution were to have a perpetuity in office. The judges themselves would not have had this right, if it had not been expressly given by the Constitution, but would be removable in like manner with ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls. He took it, therefore, in the present case, that the President and the Senate would have the power of removing the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. The only question, therefore, which appears to be before the committee is, whether we shall give this power to the President alone? And with that he thought they had nothing to do. He supposed, if the clause was left out, the President and the Senate would proceed, as directed by the Constitution, to appoint the officer; and hereafter, if they judged it necessary, would remove him; but if they neglected to do so, when it was necessary, by reason of his misdeemeanors, this House would impeach him, and so get rid of him on conviction.

Mr. BLAND.—It seems to be agreed on all hands, that there does exist a power of removal; the contrary doctrine would be a solecism in Government. If an officer embezzles the public money, or neglects or refuses to do the duties of his appointment, can it be supposed there is no way of getting rid of such a person? He was certain it was essentially necessary such a power should be lodged somewhere, or it would be impossible to carry the Government into execution. Their inquiries were therefore reduced to this point: Does it reside, agreeably to the Constitution, in the President, or in the President and the Senate? The Constitution declares, that the President and the Senate shall appoint, and it naturally follows, that the power which appoints shall remove also. What would be the consequence of the removal by the President alone, he had already mentioned, and need not repeat. A new President might, by turning out the great officers, bring about a change of the ministry, and throw the affairs of the Union into disorder: would not this, in fact, make the President a monarch, and give him absolute power over all the great departments of Government? It signifies nothing that the Senate have a check over the appointment, because he can remove, and tire out the good disposition of the Senate.

His colleague had objected to the removal in this way, because the Senate would be kept constantly sitting. He did not think this objection of any weight, because the Constitution made some other things their duty, which would require them to be pretty constantly sitting. He alluded to the part they were called upon to perform in making treaties; this, therefore, would be a trifling objection.

Mr. BENSON thought it was not absolutely necessary to make any provision on this head, because the power was given to the President by the Constitution; but as the argument had been pretty well gone into, he would add no more at present, than just to remark an error the gentleman last up had fallen into. He had supposed the President to have the powers of a monarch, that he could introduce and keep a favorite in office in despite of every other branch of the Government: the Senate was an effectual check to a system of favoritism, and it lay in the power of the House to correct any abuse arising from such a system, if it unhappily was fallen into.

Mr. BLAND insisted that the check of the Senate was not sufficient, if the power of removal was taken from them. Indeed, he was satisfied, from the privilege the President had of nominating and filling up vacancies pro tempore, he would become absolute, if he alone had the power of removal. He was therefore against this part of the motion, both on principle and policy. He therefore moved to add to the words of the motion, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so that the power of removal might be declared to be in the same body as the Constitution placed the appointment.

Mr. CLYMER said, the power of removal was an Executive power, and as such belonged to the President alone, by the express words of the Constitution: "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The Senate were not an Executive body; they were a Legislative one. It was true, in some instances, they held a qualified check over the Executive power, but that was in consequence of an express declaration in the Constitution; without such declaration, they would not have been called upon for advice and consent in the case of appointment. Why, then, shall we extend their power to control the removal which is naturally in the Executive, unless it is likewise expressly declared in the Constitution?

The question on adding the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," as moved by Mr. BLAND, was put and lost.

Mr. WHITE.—It has been said, that the Senate are not an Executive body. I grant that they are not an Executive body when they are sitting for Legislative purposes; but they are an Executive body when performing their Executive functions as required in the Constitution.

Every question respecting treaties or public officers must go through their hands. Why shall we make the President responsible for what goes through other hands? He is not solely responsible, agreeably to the Constitution, for the conduct of the officers he nominates, and the Senate appoints; why then talk of obtaining a greater degree of responsibility than is known to the Constitution?

We are told, that we ought to keep the Legislative and Executive departments distinct; if we were forming a constitution, the observation would be worthy of due consideration, and he would agree to the principles; but the Constitution is formed, and the powers blended; the wished-for separation is therefore impracticable.

Mr. VINING remarked, that the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLYMER) was too well founded to be overturned by the critical distinction made by the gentleman last up, and was sufficient to convince gentlemen, if they would consider it well, that the Constitution vested the power of removal in the President alone. He begged the committee to consider the monstrous effect it would produce if the Legislature went on to mingle the Legislative and Executive powers. He would place it in one other point of view, and then have done with the subject. It is well known, that the Senate are to decide upon an impeachment made by this House. Now, can they be impartial judges when they have already given judgment in the case? Suppose the President communicates his suspicions to the Senate respecting the malfeasance of a public officer, and they, from factions or party views, or, indeed, for want of full information, refuse their consent to the removal; can they be the equal and unbiased judicature which the Constitution contemplates them to be? He thought they could not.

Mr. PAGE requested the committee to delay the decision of this question, because he did not wish gentlemen to commit themselves, without having fully reflected upon the subject. Treasury Department.

Before this committee proceed one step farther in this business, they ought seriously to consider the situation of this country, and what will be the consequence of appointing such an officer; consider how it will affect the public in general, the revenue, and even the Government itself. He is declared, in the list of duties assigned him in the paper read yesterday by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Benson,) to have the power to form and digest the accounts, and to control all the officers of the Department. It is evident, that we put his integrity to the trial, by such an arrangement. If he is disposed to embezzle the public money, it will be out of the power of the Executive itself to check or control him in his nefarious practices. The extension of his business to the collectors of at least fifty seaports, (over whom the naval officer can have no control, with respect to the money received,) will furnish abundant opportunities for peculation. In addition to the moneys arising from the impost, he may have to do with large sums derived from other quarters, for the sale of the vacant lands, the money of defaulters now due to the United States, and the revenue arising from taxes and excises. Admit these innumerable opportunities for defrauding the revenue, without check or control, and it is next to impossible he should remain unsullied in his reputation, or innoxious with respect to misapplying his trust.

Other great opportunities may arise in case of an anticipation of the public revenue; or, if it is necessary to prevent the injury which a rapid depreciation of the securities occasion to public credit, he may be employed in purchasing them, in order to advance the credit of the Union. But what is to prevent the greatest imposition in this business? Charging them to the public at their nominal value, it is not in the power of the Government to check this species of speculation; what then is the situation of your officer? He must subject himself to suspicion: indeed, it is as much as his reputation is worth to come into a place of this kind; he can hardly preserve his integrity. His honor, credit, and character, must inevitably be injured. He cannot prove himself innocent of the suspicion, because it is the negative side of the question. He can offer nothing more in his defence than a mere denial of the crime.

There is another point which ought to be well considered: This officer is to digest and form the accounts. He can consequently give the business such complexity, as to render it impossible to detect his impositions; and as the inferior officers, who might discover the fraud, are to be appointed by the principal, will they not consequently be men after his own heart?

Taking these circumstances together, it must be very disagreeable to the person appointed, provided he is an honest, upright man; it will be disagreeable also to the people of the Union, who will always have reason to suspect, that a partiality is shown to the collectors, and other officers of the State to which he belonged. This has absolutely been the case, and was productive of very great dissatisfaction. I would be glad to know of the gentlemen, who are for vesting these powers in a single person, where they will find the man who is capable of performing the duties of a financier? For it is not the mere calling him a financier, and giving him a large salary, that will enable him to perform his functions in such a manner as to give satisfaction. We had once a gentleman who filled such a department, and I believe the only one in the United States who had knowledge and abilities by any means competent to the business; but that gentleman is now employed in another branch of the Government, and cannot be called to this trust. During the late war, Congress thinking it necessary to employ a financier, were led to inquire for a proper character to fill such an office; but not being able to discover such a one in this country, in whose abilities they had sufficient confidence, they wrote to Doctor Price a letter, to induce him to come to America, and accept of an appointment under them, for the superintendence of their finances. He wrote, in answer, that he felt with gratitude the honor which they had done him by their application, and signified, that he was desirous of rendering every service in his power to aid the glorious cause in which America was embarked; but, from his advanced situation in life, and infirmities of body, he was under the necessity of declining. This circumstance serves to show how difficult it is to get a proper person for so arduous an undertaking. But it appears to me, that if we could fix upon a person equal to the office, involving him in forming accounts, and such trifling business, would divert his attention from the more important duties he is called upon to perform. The proper business of finance, I take it, ought to be to consider of the means to improve the revenue, and introducing economy into the expenditures; to recommend general systems of finance, without having any thing to do with the actual administration of them, because, if he engaged in the Executive business, we shall be deprived of his talents in more important concerns. If it should be granted that there is a person of abilities to be found, adequate to the duties of the office, I want to know where the advantage arises of appointing him alone in preference to a Board? If you have commissioners, you have an opportunity of taking one from each grand division of the United States, namely, the Eastern, the Middle, and Southern Districts. If this person is a member of the Board, is it not evident you will have every advantage from his abilities in such a situation, as you would if he were placed in office without control? If he was possessed of such genius, he could employ it more usefully as a Commissioner of the Board of Treasury, than when left to perform all the drudgery of the Executive part; because while his fine imagination was busied in reducing a chaos to a beautiful system, his colleagues might perform those parts which required less elevation of thought; by dividing the burden, the business would be done with more regularity and facility. Surely no advantage to the public would arise from giving him the sole management of the business, but much inconvenience might; besides, it must unavoidably, as I said before, subject him to suspicions unfavorable to his reputation. This has absolutely been realized; it is not a mere chimera, a matter of speculation. We have had a Board of Treasury, and we have had a Financier. Have not express charges, as well as vague rumors, been brought against him at the bar of the public? They may be unfounded, it is true; but it shows that a man cannot serve in such a station without exciting popular clamor. It is very well known, I dare say, to many gentlemen in this House, that the noise and commotion were such as obliged Congress once more to alter their Treasury Department, and place it under the management of a Board of Commissioners. We have seen speculations excited from this quarter against the Government itself, and painful insinuations of design by his appointment to the Senate. I mention these circumstances to exhibit to your view the inconvenience to which an officer is subjected by constituting an office of this nature. If the gentleman I have alluded to had been a member of the Board of Treasury, he would not have been subjected to the charges which were brought against him. In such a situation, he could have rendered the services his great abilities enabled him to do, without exposing his character to be torn to pieces by malevolence or detraction.

We are to pay some attention to the prejudices and wishes of our constituents, especially when their sentiments have been strongly declared for or against this or that mode of administration. We find such an officer unprecedented in the several States; and I believe it would not be agreeable to have a single officer, and his assistants, collecting the money, or controlling the revenue arising in those States; yet you make it one of his powers that money shall not be drawn without a warrant from the financier. There is no person of this kind mentioned in the Constitution; not even the President, nor Vice President and Senate, have a control over the Treasury; yet we put all this power into the hands of one great man, who is to be the head of the department. It appears to me, that by so doing, we shall establish an office giving one person a greater influence than the President of the United States has, and more than is proper for any person to have in a republican Government.

Perhaps it may be objected, that we should study economy. If we employ three persons to conduct this business, we shall have to pay them more than would be required for a salary for an individual. But this I take to be a very light consideration, compared with securing the public treasury. A single officer to have the command of three or four millions of money, possesses a power very unsafe in a republic; but I apprehend we may employ three commissioners for the same sum that we shall be obliged to pay for one financier; if we have great officers we must allow large salaries.

I am desirous of supporting the President; but the Senate requires to be supported also in their Constitutional rights. To this body belongs the confidence of the States; while the President rests his support upon them he will be secure. They, with this House, can give him proper information of what is for the public interest, and, by pursuing their advice, he will continue to himself that good opinion which is justly entertained of him. If we are to establish a number of such grand officers as these, the consequences appear to me pretty plain. These officers, bearing the titles of minister at war, minister of state, minister for the finances, minister of foreign affairs, and how many more ministers I cannot say, will be made necessary to the President. If by this establishment we make them more respectable than the other branches of the Government, the President will be induced to place more confidence in them than in the Senate; the people will also be led to consider them as more consequential persons. But all high officers of this kind must have confidence placed, in them; they will in fact be the chancellors, the ministers of the nation. It will lead to the establishment of a system of favoritism, and the principal magistrate will be governed by these men. An oligarchy will be confirmed upon the ruin of the democracy; a Government most hateful will descend to our posterity, and all our exertions in the glorious cause of freedom will be frustrated: we shall go on till we reduce the powers of the President and Senate to nothing but a name. This surely, sir, does not comport with the conduct of the House. We have been very tenacious of giving a title to the President, lest it should be implied we desired to increase his power. We would tell him by no other appellation than merely President of the United States. I confess I was not such a stickler about titles as all this, because I did not consider that the liberties of the people could be hurt by such means; but I am not clear that the Constitution authorizes us to bestow titles; it is not among the enumerated powers of Congress. But if the Constitution did authorize it—[A call to order was made by some of the members, and Mr. GEARY was desired to confine himself to the point; the subject of titles was not before the House.] Mr. GEARY proceeded, and said the Senate were Constitutionally the highest officers of Government, except the President and Vice President; that the House was about to supersede them, and place over their heads a set of ministers who were to hold the reins of Government, and all this to answer no good purpose whatever; because the same services could be obtained from subordinate officers.

In short, a Board of Treasury would conduct the business of finance with greater security and satisfaction than a single officer. He had a very good opinion of the gentleman who formerly administered the finances of the United States, and doubted if another of equal qualities could be found; but it was impossible for any person to give satisfaction in such a station. Jealousy would unavoidably be entertained; besides, no inconvenience resulted from the present arrangement of that department; therefore, there could be no good reason to induce a change. If the House were truly republican and consistent, they would not admit officers, with or without titles, to possess such amazing powers as would eventually end in the ruin of the Government. Under these impressions, he moved to amend the resolution so as to read, "there shall be established a Treasury Department, at the head of which there shall be three commissioners, to be denominated the Board of Treasury."

Mr. Wadsworth.—My official duty has led me often to attend at the treasury of the United States, and, from my experience, I venture to pronounce that a Board of Treasury is the worst of all institutions. They have doubled our national debt. (I do not mean by this observation to censure any man who has been in that office: I presume they were honest men, and did as well as could be done under such a system.) But I do not remember a single instance, in any one board, that I found them to have a system that would give even tolerable satisfaction; there appeared a want of confidence in the members of them all: they seemed to have no fixed principles to guide them, nor responsibility for their conduct.

I have had also transactions at the treasury whilst it was managed by a Superintendent of Finance. As to what fell from the gentleman last up, (though without intention, I dare say, to affect or prejudice the character of that officer, it may possibly have such an effect.) I think it necessary to state my sentiments, which are formed from my own experience as well as from report. I had great transactions with him, and must say that there did appear to be system in his management, and responsibility in his negotiations. I dare risk my fortune and character with him, because there was unity in the office, and somebody in whom I could confide. The nature of the office is better calculated to give satisfaction than the other. I will not pretend to enumerate the savings he made, by introducing economy throughout the whole departments under Congress, because I do not know them all; but they were very considerable. The administration of the finances was clear to the meanest capacity. Receipts and expenditures were stated simply; they were published to the world. The heads of the Treasury Department, the Board of Commissioners, I do not believe have closed their accounts to this very day. I do not say it is for want of ability, will, or honesty, that this event has not taken place. I conceive it to be owing to their want of system in conducting their business. I wish the committee had before them the transactions of the board for one single month; they would find what I have remarked to be too well founded. Instead of system and responsibility, they would find nothing but confusion and disorder, without a possibility of checking their accounts. I know I am heard by one gentleman who is acquainted with these truths by experience.*

* It is presumable he alluded to Mr. GAZAR, a member of a Committee of Congress, appointed to superintend the Treasury.

of the public knowing their situation; there is no possibility of getting on with the public accounts and closing them; there has not been the transactions of more than one of the great departments completely settled, owing to a radical defect in their constitution; they cannot proceed with that unity and decision necessary to insure justice. As to what the gentleman said, with respect to the difficulty of getting a proper officer to fill the department, I will just observe, that I do not believe it impossible, and am therefore prepared to attempt it.

Mr. GERRY asked, what he had said that induced the gentleman (Mr. Wadsworth) to believe it tended to prejudice the reputation of the late financier?

Mr. WADSWORTH replied, that he (Mr. GERRY) had mentioned a clamor raised against him, and that it had not subsided, because his accounts were unsettled; he had therefore endeavored to show the cause to which these circumstances were owing.

Mr. GERRY stated, that if such powers were given to a financier, he would be obnoxious and the people suspicious. These suspicions would injure his reputation, because it would be out of his power to prove them groundless. I mentioned a fact said he, to prove this position; the fact is notorious; but I did not mention it with a view to prejudice the gentleman, because I believe the insinuations charged against him in the public papers are without good grounds.

Mr. WADSWORTH had understood the gentleman as he had explained himself, but nevertheless the expressions were so loose as to leave suspicion room to maintain its ground; he had recapitulated facts also with an intention to do justice to a character that had been, he apprehended, unjustly and wantonly aspersed.

Mr. BENSON stated, that in the year 1781, from the very great derangement of public affairs, Congress were induced to place the Treasury Department under the superintendence of an individual. It is true, after the conclusion of the war, in the latter end of 1783, or beginning of 1784, Congress again changed their system, and placed the department in the hands of three commissioners, to be taken as the gentleman has said, one from the Eastern, one from the Middle, and one from the Southern district; which regulation I think induced above twenty applications. Some gentlemen on this floor will doubtless recollect an observation that was made at that time, that if this trust had been to be reposed in one responsible individual, not perhaps more than three of the candidates would have had confidence to come forward as applicants for the office.

For his part, he conceived that it required the same abilities in every individual of the commissioners, as was necessary, if a single person was placed at the head of the Department. If men competent to the undertaking are so difficult to be found, you will increase the embarrassment of the President threefold by making the arrangement the gentleman contends for. The principle upon which the gentleman advocates the appointment ment of a board of treasury, would apply in favor of a change in the Constitution, and we ought to have three Presidents of the United States instead of one, because their business might be done with more regularity and facility; but he did not think the argument to be well founded.

If it was the duty of the House to use economy in their establishments, one officer would certainly require less salary than three; however, he believed the arguments of the gentlemen were premature. He should not find fault with the duties of the officer before they were proposed to the consideration of the committee.

The motion under consideration proposed nothing more than that a Secretary should be placed at the head of the Department. It said nothing of the duties which he was to perform. When the bill came forward, no doubt, proper checks would be provided to prevent this officer from abusing his trust.

Mr. GALDWIN thought that there were very few gentlemen, who had much to do with public business, but had turned their attention to this question. He had employed his reflection upon the subject for some time, and his sentiments were against the establishment of a board of treasury. He was persuaded there was not so much responsibility in boards as there was in individuals, nor is there such good ground for the exercise of the talents of a financier in that way. Boards were generally more destitute of energy than was an individual placed at the head of a Department. The observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts were of great weight, so far as they inferred the necessity of proper checks in the department having care of the public money; if they had system, energy, and responsibility, he should be in favor of them; but his experience had convinced him of the contrary. He was not an advocate for an unlimited authority in this officer. He hoped to see proper checks provided; a Comptroller, Auditors, Register, and Treasurer. He would not suffer the Secretary to touch a farthing of the public money, beyond his salary. The settling of the accounts should be in the hands of the Auditors and Comptroller; the registering them to be in another officer, and the cash in the hands of one unconnected with either. He was satisfied that in this way the treasury might be safe, and great improvements made in the business of revenue.

Mr. MADISON had intended to have given his sentiments on this subject; but he was anticipated in some things by the gentleman last up. He wished, in all cases of an Executive nature, that the committee should consider the powers that were to be exercised, and where that power was too great to be trusted to an individual, proper care should be taken so to regulate and check the exercise, as would give indubitable security for the perfect preservation of the public interest, and to prevent that suspicion which men of integrity were ever desirous of avoiding. This was his intention in the present case. If the committee agreed to his proposition, he intended to introduce principles of caution, which he supposed would any weight in them, he imagined they applied with equal force against Boards. The commissioners were men equally fallible and exposed as the Secretary, Comptroller, and Auditors.

The gentleman had asked, where a proper character for a financier was to be found? America has seen one man equal to the task; but he would not undertake to say that that gentleman was the only one fit for the business. If talents of this kind were hard to be found, he was for establishing the Department in this way, in order to bring up men to a knowledge of this science. He had no idea of sending to a foreign nation for a person; it would be dishonorable to the United States. But he could not believe any foreigner adequate to the business. The utility of this officer consists in his knowledge of the manners, habits, customs, wealth, and pursuits; the temper, genius, and disposition of the people. This cannot be acquired but by a long residence and actual observation. A foreigner has not this advantage, and therefore must be unfit to direct the finances of America.

Mr. BLAND thought the decision of the House would depend upon the propriety of the powers which were annexed to the office, and the checks and restraints to which the whole of the department was subjected. Hence he thought they were taking the business up at the wrong end. He joined gentlemen in thinking the management of the public money was a matter of the most serious consideration, in which every citizen was more or less concerned. If a man were to be placed at the head of this department, without check or control, he would be a dangerous officer; but if his powers could be effectually restrained from doing the public an injury, he thought he might be rendered serviceable. Under these impressions, he had essayed to define the powers proper to be given. If they met the approbation of the committee, he was ready to vote in favor of the clause, adding thereto a Board of Commissioners.

Mr. GERRY joined the gentleman last up: he thought the powers ought first to be determined, because, after the committee had consented to have such an officer, gentlemen might insist upon such powers as would render him improper; in which case, gentlemen will have committed themselves, and cannot decently retract.

Mr. VINING thought there was an unnatural combination intimated by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BLAND.) He could by no means think of uniting a Financier and Board of Treasury. He was sorry to hear the anecdote mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is to be supposed that we have no character in America fit for a place at the head of our Treasury? Are we to send to England for Doctor Price? Much as he valued and respected that character, he should be sorry to see him preside in one of the great departments of Government. He felt the humiliation so sensibly that he should never again boast of the genius or abilities of his country. But he believed that event took place for want of information; because experience had convinced the world that America possessed a man equal to the arduous undertaking. He did not doubt that, on inquiry, many more might be found adequate to the business.

Mr. GERRY did not look upon it as derogatory to the dignity of the United States to look abroad for men of merit to perform their services. During the late war, they had employed useful officers in the army, who taught tactics to the troops. Finance was a system requiring time and attention in its acquirement. The kingdoms of Europe were not above seeking out and employing men of abilities in this way, although they were unqualified by law to hold any office. Did the King of France refuse the service of Necker because he was a Protestant, and his father an alien? He was equally tenacious of the honor of his countrymen with the gentleman from Delaware, but he thought it no disparagement to them to say they were not well acquainted with the most abstruse science in the world, which they never had any necessity to study.

The question on the amendment proposed by Mr. GERRY was taken and lost; after which the resolutions respecting the Treasury and War Department, as proposed by Mr. MADISON, were both agreed to.

Mr. VINING then proposed the establishment of the Domestic Department upon the same principles; but, on motion of Mr. BOUNDINOT, the committee rose and reported the resolutions agreed to.—Adjourned.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and the same being amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that there ought to be established the following Executive departments, viz: A Department of Foreign Affairs, at the head of which shall be an officer to be called Secretary to the United States for the Department of Foreign Affairs, removable by the President. A Treasury Department, at the head of which shall be an officer to be called Secretary to the United States for the Treasury Department, removable by the President. A Department of War, at the head of which shall be an officer to be called Secretary to the United States for the Department of War, removable by the President.

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the committee in the said resolution; and that a committee, to consist of eleven members, be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills pursuant thereto.

The members elected were Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. VINING, Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MADISON, Mr. BOUNDINOT, Mr. BURKE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. BOUNDINOT, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. CADWALADER.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to report a proper mode of investigating and deciding on the petitions of a number of the citizens of New Jersey, principles he urged in favor of a Board against the Constitution. It might with equal justice be said, that gentlemen, who contended for a Secretary of the Treasury, desired to have a single legislator; one man to make all laws, the revenue laws particularly, because among many there is less responsibility, system, and energy; consequently a numerous representation in this House is an odious institution.

Mr. BOUNDINOT considered the question to be, whether the Department should be under the direction of one or more officers. He was against Boards, because he was convinced by experience that they are liable to all the objections which gentlemen have stated. He wished the committee had it in their power to turn to the transactions of this Department since the Revolution, to examine the expenditures under former Boards of Treasury, and under the Superintendent of Finance; it would so confound them, that he was sure no gentleman would offer another argument in favor of Boards. He was not acquainted with the management under the present board. He had not been in the habit of doing business with them. But between the administration of the former and the Superintendent of Finance, there was an intolerable comparison. He was far from being astonished at the jealousy and suspicion entertained of that valuable officer; he rather wondered that the clamor was not more loud and tremendous. He could not repeat all the causes there were for accusation against him, but surely they were not inconsiderable. He remembered one hundred and forty-six supernumerary officers were brushed off in one day, who had long been sucking the vital blood and spirit of the nation. Was it to be wondered at, if this swarm should raise a buzz about him? The reform which daily took place made him no inconsiderable number of enemies. The expenditures under the Board of Treasury had been enormous. They were curtailed in the quartermasters, commissaries of provision and military stores, in the hospital, and every great department established by Congress; so that, besides those who were offended by a removal, every one who was affected by this economy, or parsimony, if they will call it so, were incensed against him. It was impossible to gain friends among those people by a practice of this kind. He would state a circumstance which might give the committee some small idea of what the savings under the Superintendent were. The expenditure of hay at a certain post was one hundred and forty tons; such was the estimate laid before him; yet twelve tons carried the post through the year, and the supply was abundant, and the post was as fully and usefully occupied as it had ever been before.

He wished gentlemen to examine whether the other arguments did not preponderate in favor of a single administration. He thought that there was certainly more responsibility and system likely to be acquired in this way than in the other. He saw no weight in the objections stated by the gentleman, respecting the collusion between the Secretary and the Collectors; but if there was give satisfaction on that point. As far as was practicable, he would have the various business of this important branch of the Government divided and modified, so as to lull at least the jealousy expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts; indeed, he supposed, with the assistance of the committee, it might be formed so as to give satisfaction. He had no doubt but that the offices might be so constituted as to restrain and check each other; and unless an unbounded combination took place, which he could by no means suppose was likely to be the case, that the public would be safe and secure under the administration. He would favor the arrangement mentioned by the worthy gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. BALDWIN,) and after that was separated from the Secretary's duties, he believed the officer would find sufficient business to employ his time and talents in rendering essential services to his country. This arrangement he considered would answer most of the objections which had been urged.

If a board is established, the independent officers of Comptroller and Auditor are unknown; you then give the aggregate of these powers to the board, the members of which are equal; therefore you give more power to each individual than is proposed to be trusted in the Secretary; and if apprehensions are to be entertained of a combination, they apply as forcibly in the case of two or three commissioners combining, as they do in the case of the Secretary, Comptroller, and other officers. If gentlemen permit these sentiments to have their full weight, and consider the advantages arising from energy, system, and responsibility, which were all in favor of his motion, he had no doubt of their according with him on this question.

Mr. GERRY.—If an individual has a control over the Treasury Department; if no money can be received or expended but by him, or on his warrant, he did not see any check which could be provided to prevent a misapplication of such powers, nor any means by which a man could demonstrate he had preserved his integrity. He thought these things were better guarded under a Board, and therefore preferred one. Gentlemen, to be sure, had asserted there was no responsibility in a Board; he denied the fact. A Board of three commissioners are surely as responsible for their measures as an individual for his; each person of them is responsible for the act of the Board, or, if one of them should deny his acquiescence to the matter in question, the charge may be determined by having recourse to the journal of their transactions, because whenever an order or resolution takes place, they enter their names for or against the measure in their books. These circumstances show they are responsible; and undoubtedly there is more security in having three persons consulted, than confiding all to the uncontrolled caprice of a single individual. He did not see the necessity of an officer to improve the revenue; that he took to be the peculiar business of the Federal Legislature. He could answer to the gentleman (Mr. BENSON) who applied the complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House; as elected within that State, made a report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report from the Committee of Elections, stating the proof of the facts charged in the petition of David Ramsey, suggesting that WILLIAM SMITH, returned a member of this House for the State of South Carolina, was, at the time of his election, ineligible, by reason that he had not been seven years a citizen of the United States.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 22.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report on Mr. SMITH's case.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved the recommitment of the report, with instructions to the committee, to examine and report facts arising from the proofs, in order to save the time of the House in the inquiry.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to this motion, and said, if he was to decide upon Mr. SMITH's eligibility, he would hear the evidence, and not commit to any man whatsoever to inquire for him. After some desultory conversation on the recommitment and mode of proceeding, it was agreed to examine the evidence in favor of Mr. SMITH, the facts alleged by Doctor Ramsey, in proof that Mr. SMITH was not seven years a citizen of the United States, being admitted. Whereupon, it being moved and seconded, that the House do agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it appears to this House, upon full and mature consideration, that the said WILLIAM SMITH had been seven years a citizen of the United States, at the time of his election.

Mr. SMITH.—As the House are inclined to hear the observations I have to make, I shall begin with admitting the facts stated in the memorial of Doctor Ramsey, hoping the House will excuse the egotism into which I am unavoidably drawn. I was born in Charleston, South Carolina, of a family whose ancestors were among the first settlers of that colony, and was sent to England for my education when I was but twelve years of age. In 1774, I was sent to Geneva, to pursue my studies, where I resided until 1778. In November, that year, I went to Paris, where I resided upwards of two months in the character of an American gentleman. Immediately on my arrival there, I waited on Doctor Franklin, Mr. Adams, and Mr. A. Lee, the commissioners from Congress to the Court of France, as a citizen of America, and was received as such by them. In January, 1779, I left Paris for London, whither I went to procure the means of embarking for America, from the gentleman who had been appointed my guardian by my father when I was first sent to Europe in 1770, and from whom alone I had any hope of obtaining such means. But in this endeavor, I was disappointed, and remained some time in England, with the hope of receiving remittances from Charleston. Here again my expectation was defeated. The rapid depreciation of the Continental money rendered the negotiation of money transactions extremely difficult, and thus I remained till the fall of Charleston. I took this opportunity of studying the law, but could not be called to the bar, because I had not taken the oath of allegiance to Great Britain, which is a necessary qualification. After the surrender of Charleston, the whole State of South Carolina, fell into the hands of the enemy, and it was impossible at that time to return. No sooner, however, did I acquire the means, and an opportunity offered, than I prepared myself to go back to America. I quitted London for that purpose in October or November, 1782, not in a vessel bound to Charleston, then a British garrison, and which I certainly should have done, had I considered myself a British subject, and which would have been most convenient, as there were vessels constantly going from London to Charleston; but I travelled to Ostend, and there embarked in a neutral vessel bound to St. Kitt's, from whence it was my intention to proceed to a Danish island, and thence to some American port in North Carolina or Georgia, from whence I could reach the American camp. In the beginning of January, 1783, I sailed from Ostend, but was detained a considerable time by contrary winds, and in the middle of the month of February, was shipwrecked on the coast of England, and was obliged to return to London in order to procure another passage. These circumstances unavoidably prevented my return to Charleston, until some time in November, 1783.

On my arrival at Charleston, I was received by my countrymen as a citizen of the State of South Carolina, and elected by their free suffrage a member of the Legislature in November, 1784. In the August following, I was chosen, by the Governor and Council, a member of the Privy Council, and this election was confirmed by the Legislature the October following. In September, the same year, I was elected one of the Wardens of the City of Charleston. In November, 1786, I was again elected into the Legislature; again in November, 1788; I was elected at the same time that I was elected to the House of Representatives of the United States, the September preceding having been chosen again a Warden of the city.

After having stated these facts, he went on adhering to the laws referred to in the report of the committee, which he said, he conceived to be applicable to the present case.

In September, 1779, a question was discussed in the Legislature of South Carolina, respecting the young men who were sent abroad for their education, and it was determined that it was most for the interest of the State, that they should be allowed to continue in Europe till they were twenty-two years of age; after which the law provided they should be doubly taxed if they did not return. This law might fairly be supposed to recognise the citizenship of all the young men in a similar predicament with himself. It allowed them all to be absent until they were twenty-two years of age; but even after that period it did not deprive them of the right of citizenship; it only subjected them to the penalty of a double tax. This he contended was a sort of compact with him, that if he chose to be absent after that time, he should suffer a certain penalty, which, in its own nature, implied that his citizenship remained; but before he attained that age, South Carolina was in such a situation that her best friends were compelled to be absent, and take refuge in distant countries. It was not till some time after that the friends of the American cause began to assemble in that State; the absentee law, therefore, never operated on him, and he never was doubly taxed.

In February, 1782, the Legislature met at Jacksonburg, and discriminated between friend and foe, between American and British subjects, by disposing of the estates of the latter, and banishing them; from an inspection of the law passed at that time, it would be evident in what light they viewed him. He had landed property in the State, but was himself in England; yet they did not attempt to confiscate his property, or subject him to an amercement. The absentee law was his safeguard, he had the permission of the State to be abroad.

If the Legislature in 1782 recognised as citizens some of those persons whose estates were confiscated for adhering to Great Britain, and for being disaffected to America, a fortiori, did it not recognise as a citizen one whose estate was not forfeited, who had not been deemed worthy of punishment, and who had been absent under the sanction of the law?

By the constitution of South Carolina it appears that no person was eligible to a seat in the Legislature until he had resided three years, nor to a seat in the Privy Council until he had resided five years in the State. He had a seat in both those bodies before he had resided two years in the State of South Carolina, and no objection was ever made on that score. He could not have been qualified for either, had not the people of South Carolina deemed his residence in that State such a residence as gained him a qualification; or had they not supposed the qualification required in the constitution applied only to new comers and new citizens, for whom that residence was necessary to wean them from their local prejudices and national habits, and to attach them to the Commonwealth. Had they not, in short, supposed him to have been a citizen during the Revolution, and attached to his native State by every tie which could bind an individual to any country? Three years residence was either not required of him, or his former residence was deemed within the meaning of the Constitution.

An act to confer the right of citizenship on aliens was passed March 26, 1784. For the purpose of possessing the subordinate rights of citizenship, such as an exemption from the alien duty, a residence of one year, and taking the oath of allegiance, was sufficient. To confer a right of voting at elections, a person must have been admitted a citizen two years prior to his voting; but for the higher privileges of a citizen, being eligible to offices of trust, to a seat in the Legislature and Privy Council, the alien must have been naturalized by law. Now, in November, 1784, he was elected into the Legislature, and took his seat without objection in January, 1785, and was elected into the Privy Council, October, 1785; all without being naturalized by law.

In October, 1785, when he was elected to the Council, his election was opposed, but the objection now brought forward was not then made; and the memorialist himself, who was a member of the Legislature, voted in favor of the choice; though, unquestionably, unless he was considered by the Legislature as a citizen before he returned to Charleston, nothing had afterwards occurred to make him so, and the alien act of 1784 positively required a naturalization by act of Assembly to give him a qualification.

The constitution of South Carolina is silent as to citizenship, but allowed any person to vote at elections who had resided a year in the State, and paid a certain tax; to be a member of the Assembly he must have resided three, and to be a Privy Counsellor five years previous to his election, but nothing was said about citizenship. The act of 1784, however, expressly defined who should and who should not be deemed citizens; and, consequently, all persons who did not become citizens must have been held to be aliens, and considered so, till they had conformed to the alien act of 1784. Now, as he was admitted to offices of trust, to which aliens were not admissible, and as he was admitted to them without having the rights of citizenship conferred upon him, in pursuance of that act, it followed clearly, that the people of South Carolina and the Legislature acknowledged him to be a citizen by virtue of the Revolution.

He went on to observe, that, from the doctrine laid down by the memorialist, it was difficult to ascertain when he did become a citizen of South Carolina. When he was admitted to the bar in 1784, he did no act which made him a citizen, the bare act of taking an oath of qualification to an office could not convert an alien to a citizen. The constitution seemed to imply a mere residence of a year, by giving a right to vote, gave a right of citizenship; if that were the case, and if his residence prior to the Revolution was considered such a residence as the constitution required, then he was a citizen, by virtue of the constitution, after having resided a year in Carolina. Now, it was clear, his residence prior to the war was deemed such a residence as the constitution required; because he was admitted to vote and admitted to a seat in the Legislature and Council by right of such residence, not having had the requisite residence since the war, and yet being deemed qualified. If, therefore, that part of the constitution which gave a right of voting, in consequence of a year's residence and paying a certain tax, virtually conferred citizenship, by giving a right to vote, (and it appeared absurd that a right to vote should be given to persons not citizens,) and if, also, his residence, prior to the Revolution, was deemed a sufficient residence, then he was a citizen by virtue of the Constitution. The points that seemed most to be relied upon by the memorialist were:

1st. That residence was actually necessary to confer citizenship, or, in other words, that a person could not become a citizen of a country till he has resided in it.

2d. That a person could not become a citizen till he was of age to choose his country.

In answer to the first, he denied that residence in the country was absolutely necessary. Was it to be supposed, he asked, that when a man sent his son into another country for his education and improvement, the son was thereby to lose any political benefits which might, during such temporary absence, accrue to his country? If his father had lived a few years longer, would there have arisen any question on this subject? Would he not, though absent, have acquired, according to the petitioner's own positions, a right of citizenship? And should his death at such an early period not be deemed a sufficient misfortune for him, without using that as a pretence for making him an alien? Those who represented him in Carolina as his guardians, who were in loco parentis, were residents in Carolina at the declaration of independence.

His property was in Carolina, his money in the treasury, assisting to carry on the war. The declaration of independence affected him as much, though at Geneva, as it did those in Carolina; his happiness, that of his dearest connexions, his property, were deeply interested in it; his fate was so closely connected with that of Carolina, that any revolution in Carolina was a revolution to him. Though a minor, as soon as he heard of the independence of America, he considered himself an American citizen.

If a person could not become a citizen of a country without residing in it, what should be said of those gentlemen who had been in Europe during the war, and were now in high office in America? Several of them went to Europe before the war, were there at the declaration of independence, and did not return to America till after the war, or about the close of it. When did their citizenship commence? According to the petitioner, they could not become citizens of America until they returned to America and took an oath of allegiance to the States; but Congress employed them in offices of great confidence, before they had returned to America or taken such oath. Congress, therefore, considered them citizens by virtue of the Revolution.

It had been said that Carolina had called on her young men to come to her assistance. This was not the true state of the case. Carolina thought that her young men who were abroad for their education, should not be taken from their studies till they were twenty-two years of age, and doubly taxed them after that. His guardian wrote to him that he had permission of the Legislature to be absent till he was twenty-two, and that he should be doubly taxed after that age.

It has been also said that Carolina tendered an oath, to discover who were friends, and who were enemies. In March, 1778, the Legislature of South Carolina passed an act to oblige every free male inhabitant of that State, above sixteen years of age, to take an oath of allegiance to the State. As there were notoriously many persons then in the State who were inimical to its liberties, such a step was necessary to give a reasonable cause for obliging them to quit the country. With that view, the oath was generally tendered only to those who were suspected or known not to be friendly to the cause. He had been informed by several persons who were zealous partisans, and then in Carolina, that they had never taken any oath of allegiance, and that it had not been required of them on this occasion.

The act directed that those who did not take it should quit the State; and, if they returned, should be dealt with as traitors and suffer death. Let us examine whether this act can, in any respect, apply to the present question.

1st. It particularly mentioned "inhabitants of the State of South Carolina." It could not, therefore, apply to persons who were abroad.

2dly. It directed that the oath should be taken before a justice of peace in Carolina; this could not, therefore, extend to a person then at Geneva.

3dly. It was directed to be taken in one month after the passing of the act; and it was not possible that I should hear of the existence of such an act in less than three months.

4thly. It was directed that, if the persons refused to take it, they should quit the State; but I was already out of it.

5thly. Those who refused to take it, were prevented from acquiring or conveying property, and rendered incapable of exercising any profession. But on my return to Carolina I took possession of my estate, part of which consisted of lands and houses, which had been mine since the year 1770; and I was immediately admitted to the exercise of the profession for which I was educated.

6thly. The act directed that, if any person returned to Carolina after having refused to take the oath, he should be put to death as a traitor; and yet, on my return, never having taken the oath, I was elected a member of the Legislature, and a Privy Councillor; and, instead of being deemed a criminal myself, I acted as Attorney General to punish others; and yet the petitioner, in one of his late publications, lays great stress on the applicability of this act.

Secondly, there could be no doubt that a minor might be a citizen, from the very words of the Constitution, which admitted a person to be a member of the House of Representatives at twenty-five, and yet required a citizenship of seven years. This was of itself a sufficient refutation of every thing contained in the petition on this head. The Constitution acknowledged that a person might be a citizen at eighteen; if so, there was no reason why a person might not be one at sixteen or fourteen.

Mr. LEE said the committee had now to determine whether Mr. SMITH was a citizen of South Carolina during his absence from home, or not. If the laws of that State recognised him as such, the question was determined, because this House could not dispute a fact of that kind. From the reference that has been made to the constitution and laws of South Carolina, and the circumstances which took place under them, with respect to Mr. SMITH, it was convincing that he was acknowledged there to be a citizen in consequence of the Revolution.

Mr. THATCHER thought the examination had been full; the facts stated in the memorial were admitted; but, nevertheless, it appeared from other facts, that Mr. SMITH was received and respected as a citizen of that standing which the Constitution required. He had considered the subject maturely, and was now ready for the decision.

The petition of Dr. Ramsey was again read, in which he stated, "That citizenship with the United States is an adventitious character to every person possessing it, who is how thirty years of age; and that it can, in no case, have been acquired but in one of the following modes: 1st, By birth or inheritance. 2dly, By having been a party to the late Revolution. 3dly, By taking an oath of fidelity to some of the States. 4thly, By tacit consent. 5thly, By adoption: and that Mr. SMITH cannot have acquired the character of a citizen in either of these modes, seven years ago. He cannot be a citizen by birth or inheritance, for he was born in 1758, in South Carolina, while a British colony; and his parents were both dead many years before the declaration of independence; his birthright and inheritance can, therefore, be no other than that of a British subject; for no man can be born a citizen of a Government which did not exist at the time of his being born; nor can parents leave to their children any other political character than that which they themselves possessed."

After going on to state his reasons why Mr. SMITH could not have acquired citizenship in any of the other modes, he proceeds to say, that he "conceives that birth and residence in this country, before the Revolution, could not confer citizenship on Americans who were absent when independence was declared, while they were absent, and anterior to their returning and joining their country under its new and independent Government; for, on that supposition, many persons hostile to these States must be admitted citizens; those who have been born for thirteen years before the declaration of independence, within the posts of our northwestern frontiers, which are unjustly detained from us by the British, would be citizens. Our East India trade would be laid open to the numerous natives of this country, who are now dispersed over Europe and the West Indies. If birth and residence within the limits of the United States before the Revolution conferred the rights of citizenship, persons of the aforesaid description, who have neither done nor hazarded any thing for our independence, might trade to the East Indies as citizens of the United States."

from the circumstance of their having been born in this country thirty or forty years ago, and after having glutted our market with extravagant importations, carry the whole profits of their commerce to their present residence in foreign countries. These, and many other dangerous consequences, would, as your petitioner apprehends, follow from the establishment of a precedent, by which it was acknowledged, that a native of this country might be a citizen of the United States before he lived under their Government."

Mr. MADISON.—I think the merit of the question is now to be decided, whether the gentleman is eligible to a seat in this House or not; but it will depend on the decision of a previous question, whether he has been seven years a citizen of the United States or not.

From an attention to the facts which have been adduced, and from a consideration of the principles established by the Revolution, the conclusion I have drawn is, that Mr. SMITH was, on the declaration of independence, a citizen of the United States; and unless it appears that he has forfeited his right, by some neglect or overt act, he had continued a citizen until the day of his election to a seat in this House. I take it to be a clear point, that we are to be guided, in our decision, by the laws and constitution of South Carolina, so far as they can guide us; and where the laws do not expressly guide us, we must be guided by principles of a general nature, so far as they are applicable to the present case.

It were to be wished, that we had some law adduced, more precisely defining the qualities of a citizen or an alien; particular laws of this kind have obtained in some of the States; if such a law existed in South Carolina, it might have prevented this question from ever coming before us; but since this has not been the case, let us settle some general principle before we proceed to the presumptive proof arising from public measures under the law, which tend to give support to the inference drawn from such principles.

It is an established maxim that birth is a criterion of allegiance. Birth, however, derives its force sometimes from place, and sometimes from parentage; but, in general, place is the most certain criterion; it is what applies in the United States; it will, therefore, be unnecessary to investigate any other. Mr. SMITH founds his claim upon his birthright; his ancestors were among the first settlers of that colony.

It is well known to many gentlemen on this floor, as well as to the public, that the petitioner is a man of talents, one who would not lightly hazard his reputation in support of visionary principles: yet I cannot but think he has erred in one of the principles upon which he grounds his charge. He supposes, when this country separated from Great Britain, the tie of allegiance subsisted between the inhabitants of America and the King of that nation, unless, by some adventitious circumstance, the allegiance was transferred to one of the United States. I think there is a distinction which will invalidate his doctrine in this particular, a distinction between that primary allegiance which we owe to that particular society of which we are members, and the second—allegiance we owe to the Sovereign established by that society. This distinction will be illustrated by the doctrine established by the laws of Great Britain, which were the laws of this country before the Revolution. The Sovereign cannot make a citizen by any act of his own; he can confer denizenship; but this does not make a man either a citizen or subject. In order to make a citizen or subject, it is established, that allegiance shall first be due to the whole nation; it is necessary that a national act should pass to admit an individual member. In order to become a member of the British empire, where birth has not endowed the person with that privilege, he must be naturalized by an act of Parliament.

Contested Election.

What was the situation of the people of America, when the dissolution of their allegiance took place by the declaration of independence? I conceive that every person who owed this primary allegiance to the particular community in which he was born, retained his right of birth, as a member of a new community; that he was consequently absolved from the secondary allegiance he had owed to the British Sovereign. If he were not a minor, he became bound, by his own act, as a member of the society who separated with him from a submission to a foreign country. If he were a minor, his consent was involved in the decision of that society to which he belonged by the ties of nature. What was the allegiance, as a citizen of South Carolina, he owed to the King of Great Britain? He owed his allegiance to him as a King of that society to which, as a society, he owed his primary allegiance. When that society separated from Great Britain, he was bound by that act, and his allegiance transferred to that society, or, the Sovereign which that society should set up; because it was through his membership of the society of South Carolina that he owed allegiance to Great Britain.

This reasoning will hold good, unless it is supposed that the separation which took place between these States and Great Britain, not only dissolved the union between those countries, but dissolved the union among the citizens themselves: that the original compact which made them altogether one society, being dissolved, they could not fall into pieces, each part making an independent society; but must individually revert into a state of nature; but I do not conceive that this was, of necessity, to be the case; I believe such a revolution did not absolutely take place. But in supposing that this was the case, lies the error of the memorialist. I conceive the colonies remained as a political society, detached from their former connexion with another society, without dissolving into a state of nature; but capable of substituting a new form of Government in the place of the old one; which they had, for special considerations, abolished. Suppose the State of South Carolina should think proper to revise her constitution, abolish that which now exists, and establish another form of Government: surely this would not dissolve the social compact.

It would not throw them back into a state of nature. It would not dissolve the union between the individual members of that society. It would leave them in perfect society, changing only the mode of action, which they are always at liberty to arrange. Mr. SMITH being then, at the declaration of independence, a minor, but being a member of that particular society, he became, in my opinion, bound by the decision of the society, with respect to the question of independence and change of Government; and if afterwards he had taken part with the enemies of his country, he would have been guilty of treason against that Government to which he owed allegiance, and would have been liable to be prosecuted as a traitor.

If it be said, that very inconvenient circumstances would result from this principle, that it would constitute all those persons who are natives of America, but who took part against the revolution, citizens of the United States, I would beg leave to observe, that we are deciding a question of right, unmixed with the question of expediency, and must, therefore, pay a proper attention to this principle. But I think it can hardly be expected by gentlemen that the principle will operate dangerously. Those who left their country, to take part with Britain, were of two descriptions—minors, or persons of mature age. With respect to the latter, nothing can be inferred with respect to them from the decision of the present case; because they had the power of making an option between the contending parties; whether this was a matter of right or not is a question which need not be agitated in order to settle the case before us. Then, with respect to those natives who were minors at the Revolution, and whose case is analogous to Mr. SMITH's, if we are bound by the precedent of such a decision as we are about to make, and it is declared that they owe a primary allegiance to this country, I still think we are not likely to be inundated with such characters; so far as any of them took part against us, they violated their allegiance, and opposed our laws; so, then, there can be only a few characters, such as were minors at the Revolution, and who have never violated their allegiance by a foreign connexion, who can be affected by the decision of the present question. The number, I admit, is large who might be acknowledged citizens on my principles; but there will very few be found daring enough to face the laws of the country they have violated, and against which they have committed high treason.

So far as we can judge by the laws of Carolina, and the practice and decision of that State, the principles I have adduced are supported; and I must own, that I feel myself at liberty to decide, that Mr. SMITH was a citizen at the declaration of independence, a citizen at the time of his election, and, consequently, entitled to a seat in this Legislature.

Mr. BOUNDINOT expressed an apprehension, that the principle supported by the gentleman from Virginia would tend to injure the State of New Jersey very considerably. He was afraid it would be construed to embrace all the natives of America who had deserted their country's cause during the late war; and, on this account, he was against deciding in favor of the proposed resolution, though he believed Mr. SMITH to be fairly and Constitutionally entitled to a seat in that House.

Mr. JACKSON.—I differ widely from the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MANISON) on the subject of allegiance and the social compact, and hold the principles advanced by him exceedingly dangerous to many of the States, and, in particular, to the one I have the honor to represent. The situation of America, at the time of the Revolution, was not properly to be compared to a people altering their mode or form of Government. Nor were there two allegiances due, one to the community here, another to that of Great Britain. We were all on a footing; and I contend the principle is right, in some degree of a total reversion to a state of nature amongst individuals, and to a mere parental or patriarchal authority, where the heads had families dependent on them; the former, right in his own eyes, and the cause which he thought just; and, in the latter cases, the children followed the will of the father, who chose for them, as the person who brought them into life, and whose fortunes they were to inherit. I conceive the whole allegiance or compact to have been dissolved. Many of the States were a considerable period without establishing constitutions or forms of Government, and during that period we were in a little better state than that of nature; and then it was, that every man made his election for an original compact, or tie, which, by his own act, or that of his father for him, he became bound to submit to. And what, sir, would otherwise be the result? And if the gentleman's doctrines of birth were to be supported, those minors who, with British bayonets have plundered and ravaged, nay, cruelly butchered their more virtuous neighbors—the sons of the most inveterate traitors, whose names deservedly sounded in every bill of confiscation; and the minors, sons of those who sheltered themselves under the shade of the British King, and supported his armies, if not with arms, with the resources of war, until the hour of danger was over—those, I say, after the blood of thousands has been spilt in the establishment of our Government, can now come forward and sneer at the foolish patriots, who endured every hardship of a seven years' war, to secure to them the freedom and property they had no hand in defending. Sir, did we fight for this? Was it for this the soldier watched his numerous nights, and braved the inclemency of the seasons? Will he submit, after having gained his point at the expense of property and the loss of constitution, to have those sentiments established? If he will, he has fought to little purpose indeed.

Sir, I again contend, that when the Revolution came on, we were all alike with respect to allegiances, and all under the same social tie. An Englishman born did not conceive himself more liable to be condemned for treason than an American, had the enemy succeeded; nor would there have been any distinction in the laws on coming to a trial. But, sir, how should this primary allegiance be known to belong to the less, or American community, where the majority did not prevail? In Georgia, the majority were opposed to American measures; agreeably to the gentleman's reasoning, the minors must have been all on the British side; and yet many of them, on arriving to years of discretion, behaved well and valiantly with us. To corroborate this, sir, I will remark, that, for a considerable period, we had no general or federal Government, or form of constitution, and yet were in arms. I would ask what state we were in then? Neighbor was against neighbor, and brother against brother. But, sir, the gentleman says, the hardened minor will not return. Sir, experience has proved the contrary. The Middle and Eastern States, except Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, never had the enemy long with them; there was not the same trial of men, and they knew not the audacity of those villains. After having received their equivalent for, in many cases, feigned losses, from the British Crown, they are daily returning and pushing into office. It is necessary we should guard against them. Britain, although humiliated, yet has a longing eye upon this country; she has yet posts in it. Although it is improbable that so many of these people will get into Congress as to form a corrupt majority, yet they have ambition and resentment enough to attempt it. At this moment, sir, in Georgia, are some of the most daring bringing ejectments for estates which their fathers had deservedly forfeited, although themselves had imbrued their hands in the blood of their fellow citizens.

Now, to the present case: Highly as I regard the gentleman (Mr. SMITH) as a valuable member, and esteem his abilities, I can only form my opinion on the leave given him by the State to be absent. If that principle is introduced into the resolution, I will vote in favor of Mr. SMITH's eligibility; but if not, I must decline voting. Which he accordingly did when the question was put.

Mr. TUCKER hoped that the yeas and nays would be taken on this question, not because he had any doubt in his own mind of Mr. SMITH's right to a seat, but because he had been solicited by Dr. RAMSAY to have the yeas and nays taken. The yeas and nays were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Benson, Boudinot, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Coles, Contee, Fitzsimons, Floyd, Gilman, Goodhue, Heister, Huntington, Lawrence, Lee, Leonard, Livermore, Madison, Moore, Mahlenburg, Page, Van Rensselaer, Seney, Schureman, Scott, Sinnenickson, Smith, of Maryland, Sturgis, Sylvester, Thatcher, Trumbull, Tucker, Vining, White, and Wynkoop.

Jonathan Grout voted in the negative.

NEW JERSEY ELECTIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the report from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred, to report a proper mode of investigation and decision on the petition of a number of the citizens of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House, as elected within that State; and the said report being amended to read as follows:

"That it will be proper to appoint a committee before whom the petitioners are to appear, and who shall receive such proofs and allegations as the petitioners shall judge proper to offer in support of their said petition, and who shall, in like manner, receive all proofs and allegations from persons who may be desirous to appear and be heard in opposition to the said petition, and to report to the House all such facts as shall arise from the proofs and allegations of the respective parties."

Resolved, That this House doth agree with the committee in the said report, and that it be an instruction to the said Committee of Elections to proceed accordingly.

The members appointed were Messrs. PARTRIDGE, FLOYD, and THATCHER.

On motion,

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further proceeding on the motion to them committed, for making a compensation to the President of the United States for his services; and that a committee be appointed to take into consideration the subject of compensation, to be made for the services of the President, Vice President, the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and to report thereupon.

The members appointed were Messrs. BALDWIN, Vining, LIVERMORE, MADISON, BENSON, BURKE, FITZSIMONS, BOUDINOT, WADSWORTH, GERRY, CADWALADER, and SMITH, of Maryland.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented, according to order, a bill imposing duties on tonnage; and the same was received, and read the first time.

A petition of the shipwrights of the city of Philadelphia, whose names are the unto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, stating such regulations as they conceive will tend to the advancement and increase of American shipping, and praying the attention of Congress thereto.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

TUESDAY, May 26.

A bill imposing duties on tonnage was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. SYLVESTER, from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, to consider and report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with at the public expense, and to receive proposals from the printers for printing the acts and other proceedings of Congress, made a further report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, May 27.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had appointed a committee to confer with the committee appointed by this House, on the proper method of receiving into either House bills or messages from the President of the United States.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. TRAUMBULL in the Chair, on the bill imposing duties on tonnage; and, after making several amendments thereto, directed their Chairman to report when the House should think proper to receive the same.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to regulate the collection of duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and the same was received and read the first time.

THURSDAY, May 28.

DUTIES ON TONNAGE.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments made yesterday in Committee of the Whole, to the bill imposing duties on tonnage, which were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion,

Resolved, That every such member of the present Congress as is not yet furnished with a set of the journals of the late Congress, shall, on application to the keeper of the records and papers of the said late Congress, be entitled to receive a complete set of such journals.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

The House proceeded to consider the two reports, the one made on the 19th instant, the other on the 26th instant, by the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, to consider and report what newspapers the members of Congress shall be furnished with at the public expense, and to receive proposals for printing the acts, and other proceedings of Congress; and the first report, in the words following, viz:

"That, in their opinion, public economy requires that the expense heretofore incurred by the public, of supplying every member of Congress with all the newspapers printed at the seat of Congress, should be retrenched in future; but as your committee consider the publication of newspapers to be highly beneficial in disseminating useful knowledge throughout the United States, and deserving of public encouragement, they recommend that each member of Congress be supplied, at the public expense, with one paper, leaving the choice of the same to each member; and that it be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to give the necessary directions to the different printers to furnish each member with such paper as he shall choose."

Which being read and debated:

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said report.

The other report being again read, and amended to read as followeth:

"That it would be proper that it should be left to the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to contract with such persons as shall engage to execute the printing and binding business on the most reasonable terms, the paper being furnished by the said Secretary and Clerk to such person at the public expense. That such persons as they shall contract with shall be obliged to render a state of their accounts quarterly, and that six hundred copies of the acts of Congress, and seven hundred copies of the journals, be printed and distributed to the Executive and Judiciary, and heads of departments of the Government of the United States, and the Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary of the several States."

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said report.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

WESTERN LANDS.

The House, on motion of Mr. SCOTT, went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering certain resolutions he had prepared respecting the disposal of the land in the Western Territory, Mr. TRAUMBULL in the Chair.

Mr. SCOTT presumed there was little need of argument to prove to the committee the necessity of taking speedy measures with respect to the unsettled lands in the Western Territory. The dissolution of the Board of Treasury, and the death of the late geographer of the United States, are adventitious circumstances, which tend to increase the necessity. Gentlemen are acquainted with the number of sales which have been made to some of the citizens of the United States; they consequently know that the United States are under an obligation to complete the surveys of those lands which they have made sale of. They know, also, that until this is done, they cannot receive a farthing of the millions of dollars due on those contracts; they will not only be unable to receive the principal, but will be paying interest for the same. Besides this, there are other considerations for putting the business on a new footing. The mode hitherto pursued of selling lands has been very expensive to the United States. Perhaps, on inquiry, we shall find that the specie it has cost us in getting the land surveyed, and sales completed, would have purchased as many certificates as we get for the sale of the land. The lands are also proposed to be sold in too great quantities. It is very difficult to form a company for the purchase of a million acres. It ought to be sold in small quantities to make the sales more certain and numerous, and, consequently, increase the public income. On this principle, it will be well to open a land office, and grant the soil in such quantities as may suit the applications. By this means more may be expected for the purchase, than when it is struck off at a wholesale price by the million acres; and in this way the land office will be conducted without expense, which will be fixed on the purchaser, so that the whole money the lands may bring will come into the treasury without deduction.

There are other considerations why a land office should be opened for the sale of that territory in the way just mentioned. There are, at this moment, a great number of people on the ground, who are willing to acquire by purchase a right to the soil they are seated upon. Allured by its fertility, the agreeableness of the climate, and the prospect of future ease to themselves and families, they would not seek a change. Kentucky, already full—at least there are no more valuable lands to be got there with a clear title—can receive no more emigrants; they therefore turn their wishful eyes upon the lands of the Union. They hope to get them of Congress upon as good terms as they can procure them of the speculators. What will these men think who have placed themselves on a vacant spot, anxiously waiting its disposition by the Government, to find their pre-emption right engrossed by the purchaser of a million of acres? Will they expose themselves to be preyed upon by these men? They might submit to this, but they have other offers.

There are seven thousand souls waiting for lands; they will have them here or elsewhere; but there is some danger, if they cannot be accommodated within the boundaries of the United States, they will do one of two things: either move into the Spanish territory, where they are not altogether uninvited, and become an accession of power to a foreign nation forming to us a dangerous frontier; or they will take this course, move on the United States' territory, and take possession without your leave. What then will be the case? They will not pay you money. Will you then raise a force to drive them off? That has been tried; troops were raised and sent under General Harmer to effect that purpose. They burnt the cabins, broke down the fences, and tore up the potato patches; but three hours after the troops were gone, these people returned again, repaired the damage, and are now settled upon the lands in open defiance of the authority of the Union. But nevertheless they are willing to pay an equitable price for those lands; and, if they may be indulged with a pre-emption to the purchase, no men will be better friends to the Government. They went on the ground with an intention of purchasing, and are kept there by a hope that the Government will see their interest, and dispose of the land upon reasonable terms. But if you do not listen to their request, if you neglect or despise their offers, and they prove too weak to resist the omnipotent arm of Government, they will have recourse to a neighboring Power for protection. Hopes of that protection are now held out to them; it is my duty to inform you of the fact. They will be led to think their interest is separate from yours on the Atlantic shores. It will take prudent management to prevent the fatal effects of a commotion in that country. One of the most unhappy things we could do, would be to refuse selling those lands in less quantities than by the million of acres; it would certainly be a cause of disgust, if not of separation. If the object was to prevent the settlement of the country, it would be another thing; but that cannot be accomplished, it is not in the power of any force on earth to prevent the increase of the population now begun; it is, therefore, much better that we should incline them to friendship than oblige them to become our enemies. The emigrants who reach the Western country will not stop till they find a place where they can securely seat themselves. Your lands tempt them to pitch there; but, to secure them, they must have a well grounded hope that the lands they cultivate may become their own. To encourage this you must open that territory to them, and let them have lands for pay. You must go further, you must open the land office in that country, because it will be impossible for the indigent persons to travel far for an office-right. You can then establish a government among them, and derive advantages from them which are now totally lost. They wish for your government and laws, and will be gratified with the indulgence; but they wish also to acquire property under them; they wish for your lands, and what good reason can be offered to warrant a denial? If they cannot get your land, they must go further and obtain it of foreigners, who are desirous of having them at any rate, who will give them lands without pay.

Western Lands.

These observations are sufficient, no doubt, to evince the necessity of doing something with respect to the Western territory, and something different from what has hitherto been done. In order that the committee may have a full view of my ideas, I will read the plan I have in my hand upon which a law may be founded.

Mr. S. here read a previous resolution, to be followed by the plan, which was to this effect:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that an act of Congress ought to pass for establishing and regulating a land-office, for the sale of the vacant and unappropriated land in the Western territory.

[Here, by way of separate resolutions, followed in detail the constituent parts of this office, and the routine in which the business should be conducted, directing the expense of the office to be supported by the fees payable before the warrants and patents were delivered.]

Mr. Boudinot was well convinced of the importance of the subject; but did not think the committee ripe for a decision. The other departments were not established, therefore it was best to leave the resolutions on this subject as much at large as possible. He had no objection to an adoption of a general resolution, and the appointment of a sub-committee, to consider of and arrange the business; but he could not consent to limit it in the manner the gentleman proposed.

Perhaps the measure might interfere with the former arrangements, and it would be difficult if not unjust to alter them. Besides, the plan of the business was mere matter of experiment. Moreover, the necessity of such an establishment may be superseded by throwing the business into the hands of one of the three great departments, which the House had agreed to organize. For these reasons, he moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "a land office," which would leave the subject at large.

Mr. LEE seconded this motion. Mr. VINING took it, that the committee ought to carry this measure into effect as speedily as it was possible. He was convinced, from what the gentleman near him (Mr. Scott) had said, that it was indispensably necessary that a land office should be established. He did not conceive this business could be engrafted upon either of the three grand departments; there must be an independent, unconnected office, established in the Western country, where the necessary communications may be made, and the money can be secured to the officer of the treasury. Why then should gentlemen combine objects which are distinct in their nature, and throw the whole weight of this branch of the Government upon another already well burdened with business?

Mr. Scott admitted his measure to be mere matter of experiment, but gentlemen ought not to object to it on that account, because it was an experiment that would cost nothing; the officers were to have nothing but fees for their services.

Mr. CLYMER did not believe the committee were prepared for a decision at this time. He considered the subject to be as intricate and difficult as it was interesting; and therefore hoped full time would be given for investigation. Many persons had purchased large quantities of lands of the late Congress, with a view to sell them out in small lots, to accommodate the people who are inclined to settle upon them. If Congress now open a land office for the sale of small quantities, it will no doubt overcast the prospect of advantage which induced the former, and may induce future purchasers to apply for large grants. These observations, and others which would readily occur to every gentleman, would satisfy the committee that they ought not to precipitate the business. For this reason, he moved the rising of the committee.

Mr. WHITE opposed the rising of the committee, for the reasons suggested. He was confident every member saw the propriety of doing something speedily in the business, and he hoped they would agree to the resolution, as the best mode of disposing of the land, and giving satisfaction to the people.

Mr. MADISON had no objection to the rising of the committee, as the means of obtaining information; but he thought the business deserving of the earliest attention. The clear and full manner in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had opened the subject to the view of the committee, left no doubt on his mind of the propriety of taking some early measures to accomplish the business in the manner suggested by that gentleman. The facts and intelligence mentioned were too important to be passed lightly over; he should for the present agree to rise, but hoped the subject would be resumed in the House.

Collection of Revenue.

[H. or R.]

The question was taken on the first resolution moved by Mr. SCOTT, and passed in the affirmative; the others remaining on the table. The committee then rose, and reported progress.

Mr. GERRY then moved, that a committee be appointed to consider the state of the unappropriated lands in the Western territory, and to report thereupon.

Mr. VINING thought this motion contradictory to the one just adopted in committee. If time was necessary for obtaining information, it was useless to set a committee about the business, because every gentleman might have easy access to all the former Congress had done on this subject.

Mr. PAGE disliked the appointment of a sub-committee on business which was before the whole, and doubted if it was in order.

Mr. GERRY said, it was of importance that the House should be made master of this subject, and he knew no way so likely to proceed in it, as by appointing a sub-committee to consider and inquire into the state of those lands. He looked upon this proposition to be detached from what was before the Committee of the Whole, yet, it was of that nature as to reflect light upon the subject. He therefore hoped his motion would be agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT did not design to hurry the House or the committee into any measures, especially if they were of doubtful policy; from his local situation he was possessed of facts, which it was impossible for many members of that House to be acquainted with. These facts he thought led to considerations of great importance to the United States. Under these circumstances, his duty led him to communicate to the House the information he had already given. He was far from wishing that Congress should proceed in the dark in their determinations on this subject; he rather wished for every information to be brought forward which could tend to illustrate it; and for that reason had cheerfully acquiesced in the rising of the committee. As he had some doubts with respect to the propriety of this motion, he hoped it would not be precipitated; he thought it was unnecessary to appoint a committee to consider the state of the unappropriated lands in the Western territory, because their situation was such as to stare every one in the face. No gentleman in that House was ignorant of the great sum of money due to Congress, upon completing the surveys of the grants already made. He supposed, likewise, that it was not in the power of the United States to make any alterations in their contracts with the purchasers of the land; a committee would therefore be useless.

He thought it was very clear, from the facts he had stated, that there was a necessity of adopting some measures like those he had proposed. If the gentleman by his motion intended to embarrass the business, or prevent any but the million-acre purchasers from acquiring lands in that country, he was certain it would do an essential injury to the interests of the United States; the people, who are now disposed to settle, would go to the Spanish or English colonies; they would form a place of refuge, for all the outcasts of the Atlantic States, who, in such case, would become very dangerous neighbors. He had done his duty by bringing the subject before the House, and had no doubt but that others would do what was right in determining upon this question.

The motion was hereupon decided in the affirmative, and a committee consisting of Messrs. SCOTT, HUNTINGDON, and SHERMAN, was appointed. Adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 29.

The engrossed bill imposing duties on tonnage was read the third time, passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. PARRANDE, from the committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, on the proper method of receiving into either House bills or messages from the President of the United States, made a report; and the said report was amended to read as followeth:

"That until the public offices are established, and the respective officers are appointed, any returns of bills and resolutions, or other communications from the President, may be received by either House, under cover, directed to the President of the Senate, or Speaker of the House of Representatives as the case may be, and transmitted by such person as the President may think proper."

A bill to regulate the collection of duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

MONDAY, June 1.

A message from the Senate stated their agreement to the report on the mode of receiving into either House bills or other communications from the President of the United States, as the same had been amended by this House.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair, on the bill to regulate the collection of duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States.

And after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed to take into consideration the subject of compensations to be made for the services of the President and Vice President, the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, made a report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion,
Ordered, That Mr. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) Mr. LAWRENCE, and Mr. AMES, be a committee to prepare and report a bill or bills to establish a uniform system on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

TUESDAY, June 2.

The SPEAKER, pursuant to the directions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths," proceeded to administer the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, in the form prescribed by the said act, to the following members of this House, who had not before taken a similar oath, viz: ABRAHAM BALDWIN, EGBERT BENSON, ED-ANUS BURKE, ISAAC COLES, BENJAMIN CONTEE, WILLIAM FLOYD, JONATHAN GROUT, JOHN HATHORN, JAMES JACKSON, SAMUEL LIVERMORE, JEREMIAH VAN RENSSELAER, JOSHUA SENEY, THOMAS SINICKSON, PETER SYLVESTER, THOMAS SUMTER, JONATHAN TRUMBULL, JOHN VINING, and JEREMIAH WADSWORTH.

The same oath, and moreover the oath of office, prescribed by the said act, were also administered by the Speaker to the Clerk.

Mr. HUGER and Mr. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) produced certificates under the hand of the Chief Justice of New York, of their having taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States before the said Chief Justice, pursuant to a former resolution of this House.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to establish an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of War; which was received, and read the first time.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to establish an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs; which was received, and read the first time.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and resumed the bill for the collection of the revenue.

On motion, it was voted that the consideration of the two first articles should be postponed: the third article, which is in these words, viz:

"That there shall also be constituted the following ports, which shall be ports both of entry and delivery, to wit:" was taken up, when

Mr. LIVERMORE proposed, that Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, should be one of the ports of entry and delivery to fill up the blank. Machias and Portland were next mentioned; upon which many observations were made by different members—chiefly with respect to the number of ports for entry and delivery which it might be necessary to constitute. The committee appeared to be divided in sentiment; and some gentlemen having observed, that they were not sufficiently prepared to decide what ports would be most suitable in the several States, it was moved, that the committee should rise, and make the further consideration of the bill the order of the day for to-morrow.

The vote on this motion being taken, it passed in the negative.

The committee then proceeded in filling up the blank, when the following ports were agreed upon, viz:

Portsmouth, in New Hampshire.

Massachusetts.—Portland, Newburyport, Gloucester, Salem, Marblehead, Boston, Plymouth, Dighton, New Bedford, Sherbourne, Nantucket, Connecticut.—New London, New Haven, Norwalk.

State of New York.—City of New York, Sag Harbor.

New Jersey.—Perth Amboy, Egg Harbor, Salem.

Pennsylvania.—Philadelphia.

Delaware.—Wilmington.

The committee then rose, and the Chairman reported progress.

On motion,

Ordered, That it be an instruction to the committee appointed the 11th of April, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for regulating the collection of imposts and tonnage in the United States, that they do prepare and bring in a bill, directing the mode of registering and clearing vessels, ascertaining their tonnage, and regulating the coasting trade, pilots, and light-houses.

On motion, the House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 3.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had agreed to the amended report for the publication of the acts of Congress, with an amendment, to which they desired the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the proposed amendment and agreed to it; of which the Clerk was directed to inform the Senate.

The two bills to establish the Department of War and the Department of Foreign Affairs, were read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they were about to proceed to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, pursuant to the "act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths," and request that the act may be sent to them for that purpose.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House then again resolved itself into a committee, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair.

The bill to regulate the collection of the revenue came again under consideration—when further progress was made in filling up the blank, by agreeing to the following, as ports of entry and delivery, viz:

Maryland.—Chestertown, Oxford, Vienna, Bal-

The Speaker resumed the Chair, and the Chairman reported that the committee had, according to order, had the said bill under consideration, and made further progress therein.

Resolved, That this House will, to-morrow, again resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the said bill.

THURSDAY, June 4.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed the following resolution, to which they request the concurrence of the House, to wit:

Resolved, That, in ten days after the passing of every act of Congress, during the present session, or until some other regulation shall be adopted, twenty-two printed copies thereof, signed by the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and certified by them to be true copies of the original acts, be lodged with the President of the United States; and that he be requested to cause to be transmitted two of the said copies, so attested as aforesaid, to each of the Supreme Executives in the several States. To which resolution they desire the concurrence of this House.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the collection of revenue, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair; when the following ports of entry and delivery were added to the bill, viz:

Massachusetts.—Kennebunk.

Virginia.—West Point, Newport, Tappahannoc, Fredericksburg, Suffolk, Bermuda Hundred, City Point, Rocket's Landing.

New Jersey.—Burlington, Newark, New Brunswick.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. LAWRENCE proposed to insert a clause to this effect: that all ships or vessels arriving at New York from any foreign port, and destined to the city of Hudson, Albany, Esopus Creek, Poughkeepsie, or Newburg, on Hudson river, shall enter at the port of New York; and having there paid the duties, or secured them to be paid, they may then proceed to either of said ports to deliver their cargoes; the collector at New York putting on board a land or tide waiter, and taking effectual means to prevent frauds. This clause was adopted.

Mr. JACKSON introduced another clause, providing for the forming of the sea-coast of the State of Georgia into four districts, to include ports of entry and delivery. This division was agreeable to the laws of that State. This was adopted, as was also a clause, introduced by Mr. GOODRICH, similar to that of Mr. LAWRENCE, which provided that vessels bound up Merrimack river should enter and pay, or secure the duties, at Newburyport.

The committee then rose.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed to bring in a bill or bills for the arrangement of the three Executive departments, reported a bill for the Treasury Department; which was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. BENSON gave notice that to-morrow he should move for a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the proposition respecting Rhode Island.

FRIDAY, June 5.

The House took into consideration the resolution yesterday received from the Senate, providing for the transmission of copies of the acts of Congress to the several Executives of the States, and concurred therewith.

The bill for establishing the Treasury Department was read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. AMES presented a petition from the tradesmen and manufacturers of Boston, praying the attention of Congress to the encouragement of manufactures and to the increase of American shipping, by such regulations as the wisdom of the National Legislature shall judge most consistent with the interest, prosperity, and happiness of this extensive empire. Ordered to lie on the table.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the collection of the revenue, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair; when the following additions were made to the ports of entry and delivery:

Massachusetts.—Ipswich, Manchester, Beverly, Danvers, Lynn, Charlestown, Medford, Swansey, or Freetown, Westport, Duxbury.

Virginia.—Petersburg, Cumberland, Smithfield.

Mr. VINING gave notice, that on Wednesday next he should submit to the House a resolve, providing for the establishment of a fourth subordinate Executive Department to be denominated the Department of the Secretary of the United States for Domestic Affairs.

Mr. BENSON presented for consideration the resolution which he yesterday gave notice of his intention of introducing in relation to the admission of Rhode Island into the Union, and moved that the House immediately go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of discussing his proposition.

H. or R.]

Collection of Revenue.

[JUNE, 1789.]

The resolution is in the following words: "The Congress of the United States do resolve and declare it to be their most earnest desire, that the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, do recommend to the people of that State to choose delegates to meet in convention, and to whom the Constitution of the United States is to be submitted, conformably to the unanimous resolution of the United States in Congress assembled, of the 28th of September, 1787."

Mr. PAGE.—I think of Rhode Island as the worthy gentleman from New York does; but, as a member of Congress, I doubt the propriety of this body interfering in the business. If I put myself, for a moment, into the situation of a citizen of a State that has refused to accede to the Constitution of the United States, I must admit that I should watch your actions with a jealous eye; I should be apprehensive of undue influence, if I were to see you throw your weight into the scale. But what occasion is there for adopting such a resolution? Are gentlemen afraid to leave them to their own unbiased judgment? For my part I am not; it will demonstrate the goodness of the Constitution, if it be adopted upon mature consideration, without any aid but its own intrinsic value. As to amendments, when we come to consider of them, I dare say they will be such as to make the Constitution more agreeable; but, for the present, I think it improper to have any thing to do with the gentleman's motion; I hope he may be prevailed upon to withdraw it; he has done his duty by bringing it forward; but if it does not meet the approbation of the House, it will be a useless waste of time to give it any further discussion. The gentleman has shown sufficiently his attachment to the Federal Government, by the earnestness he shows to have it adopted throughout the United States. But, in addition to this, let him consider where such measures may lead us. Because the Legislature of Rhode Island have neglected or refused to submit the consideration of the Constitution to a convention, we are to recommend it, and express a most earnest desire that they will comply. But suppose they decline doing what you require, what is next to be done? I hope gentlemen will hesitate before they go any further. I think we should be employed more in the line of our duty, by attending to the interests of our constituents, and completing the organization of a Government which is not within our powers. Why should we interfere with the concerns of our sister States, who have not yet joined the new Government? I trust the gentleman will see the impropriety of his motion, and agree to withdraw it.

Mr. BENSON.—I hope we shall not go into an examination of the resolution at this stage of the business; my motion goes no further, than that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the resolution; therefore, when the House is in committee, it will be time enough to enter into the merits of the question. I admit, that it is not impossible but we may find, when we are in committee, that we cannot do any thing in the business; yet I think it proper to let that question rest until we go there. But, as the subject is of great importance, I have no doubt but the House will agree to my motion.

Mr. SMITH (of South Carolina).—I think we ought to go into committee, and hear what the gentleman has to say on the subject. Though I must acknowledge I am at present against the adoption of the resolution he has proposed; yet it is possible, when he has stated his reasons, and pointed out the necessity of it, that I may alter my opinion; but I wonder why the gentleman has omitted North Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN.—I think Rhode Island stands in a different situation from North Carolina. When this Constitution was formed in the convention, North Carolina was represented there; she, as well as the adopting States, submitted that instrument to a convention of the people; but not having adopted it, she has again called a convention, and is proceeding to reconsider it as fast as convenient; so that such a request as is now proposed would be unnecessary with respect to them. As Rhode Island did not send members to the first convention, there was a delicacy in transmitting the proceedings to them, and Congress could not, perhaps, apply to them with the same propriety as to another. But all we are now to consider, I believe, is, that we invite the State of Rhode Island to join our confederacy; what will be the effect of such a measure we cannot tell till we try it.

Mr. PAGE said, though he had a great deference for the mover, yet he conceived the motion ought not to come before Congress. He feared they would make themselves a party in the business, if they interfered; and he wished to avoid having any thing to do with their bickerings and disputes; it was enough for us to do the business we were sent upon, and not to attempt works of supererogation. From the respect he had for the gentleman, and from the delicate situation in which the House was involved, he hoped that the motion would be withdrawn.

Mr. AMES.—If the situation of the House is delicate, it is also dangerous in some degree; but he did not think it would relieve them by withdrawing the motion. If the gentleman felt serious on the subject, if there were danger in the measure, it ought to be well examined. But this was an argument for going into a Committee of the Whole. Surely gentlemen are not afraid of means of coming at that knowledge? It is not possible to conceive that this question can be long evaded. Then what advantage is proposed from procrastination? For his part, he could discover none; and, therefore, was in favor of resolving into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAGE had heard the word danger, but did not hear distinctly the gentleman's arguments. He thought the House run the risk of involving themselves as parties, and of incurring all the dangers to which such a situation would expose them. He thought the best way to avoid the danger was to stay where we are.

Amendments to the Constitution.

[H. or R.]

Mr. MADISON.—I believe, Mr. Speaker, there are cases in which it is prudent to avoid coming to a decision at all, and cases where it is desirable to evade debate; if there were not cases of this kind, it would be unnecessary to guard our discussions with the previous question. My idea on the subject now before the House is, that it would be improper in this body to expose themselves to have such a proposition rejected by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island. It would likewise be improper to express a desire on an occasion where a free agency ought to be employed, which would carry with it all the force of a command. How far this is contemplated on the present occasion, I cannot tell; but I heartily wish that as little may be said about it as possible. I conceive this to be one of the cases to which the previous question is applicable; and, if the gentleman means to call the House to a direct decision on this motion, I shall step between, and interpose the previous question.

Mr. AMES.—I am against the previous question being taken, because I wish the House to consider the motion made by the gentleman from New York; it is admitted to be a question of considerable importance; if it is, it ought to be considered; otherwise, we are shutting the door on information, and putting it out of our power to ascertain the propriety or impropriety of the motion.

I should be glad to know if any gentleman contemplates the State of Rhode Island disavowed from the Union; a maritime State, situated in the most convenient manner for the purpose of smuggling, and defrauding our revenue. Surely, a moment's reflection will induce the House to take measures to secure this object. Do gentlemen imagine that State will join the Union? If they do, what is the injury arising from the adoption of the resolution intended to be submitted to the committee? Is there any impropriety in desiring them to consider a question which they have not yet decided? It has been suggested, by an honorable gentleman, that this desire will operate as a demand. If a wish of Congress can bring them into the Union, why should we decline to express such a wish?

It has been said, that Rhode Island has never called a convention; the other States have. Then why should we decline to request them to do what every other State has been called upon to perform? The gentleman from Virginia seems afraid we should sacrifice our dignity by making this request. Let it be remembered, Great Britain lost her colonies by sacrificing her interest to her dignity. We ought, therefore, to be careful how we act upon ideas of this kind. There seems some disposition in that State to join her sister States in adopting the Constitution. Then, why shall we decline encouraging that good spirit by approving the measure?

Mr. WHITE thought it best to put the previous question, because it was improper for this Legislature to interfere in their deliberation. If they were disposed to adopt the Constitution, it would be best to let them exercise their judgment, independent of any influence which a recommendation from Congress might have.

The previous question being insisted upon, was put—"Shall the main question be now put?" and it was determined in the negative.

Adjourned.

MONDAY, June 8.

MICHAEL JENIFER STONE, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. GOUGH presented a petition from Nicholas Pike, of Newburyport, praying an exclusive interest, for a limited time, in the publication of his System of Arithmetic.—Referred to a select committee.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MADISON rose, and reminded the House that this was the day that he had heretofore named for bringing forward amendments to the Constitution, as contemplated in the fifth article of the Constitution. He then addressed the Speaker as follows: This day, Mr. Speaker, is the day assigned for taking into consideration the subject of amendments to the Constitution. As I considered myself bound in honor and in duty to do what I have done on this subject, I shall proceed to bring the amendments before you as soon as possible, and advocate them until they shall be finally adopted or rejected by a Constitutional majority of this House. With a view of drawing your attention to this important object, I shall move that this House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; by which an opportunity will be given, to bring forward some propositions, which I have strong hopes will meet with the unanimous approbation of this House, after the fullest discussion and most serious regard. I therefore move you, that the House now go into a committee on this business.

Mr. SMITH was not inclined to interrupt the measures which the public were so anxiously expecting, by going into a Committee of the Whole at this time. He observed there were two modes of introducing this business to the House. One by appointing a select committee to take into consideration the several amendments proposed by the State Conventions; this he thought the most likely way to shorten the business. The other was, that the gentleman should lay his propositions on the table, for the consideration of the members; that they should be printed, and taken up for discussion at a future day. Either of these modes would enable the House to enter upon business better prepared than could be the case by a sudden transition from other important concerns to which their minds were strongly bent. He therefore hoped that the honorable gentleman would consent to bring the subject forward in one of those ways, in preference to going into a Committee of the Whole. For, said he, it must appear extremely impolitic to go into the consideration of amending the Government, before it is organized, before it has begun to operate. Certainly, upon reflection, it must appear to be premature. I wish, therefore, gentlemen would consent to the delay: for the business which lies in an unfinished state—I mean particularly the collection bill—is necessary to be passed; else all we have hitherto done is of no effect. If we go into the discussion of this subject, it will take us three weeks or a month; and during all this time, every other business must be suspended, because we cannot proceed with either accuracy or despatch when the mind is perpetually shifted from one subject to another.

[H. or R.]

Amendments to the Constitution.

[JUNE, 1789.]

Mr. JACKSON.—I am of opinion we ought not to be in a hurry with respect to altering the Constitution. For my part, I have no idea of speculating in this serious manner on theory. If I agree to alterations in the mode of administering this Government, I shall like to stand on the sure ground of experience, and not be treading air. What experience have we had of the good or bad qualities of this Constitution? Can any gentleman affirm to me one proposition that is a certain and absolute amendment? I deny that he can. Our Constitution, sir, is like a vessel, just launched, and lying at the wharf; she is untried, you can hardly discover any one of her properties. It is not known how she will answer her helm, or lay her course; whether she will bear with safety the precious freight to be deposited in her hold. But, in this state, will the prudent merchant attempt alterations? Will he employ workmen to tear off the planking and take saunder the frame? He certainly will not. Let us, gentlemen, fit out our vessel, set up her masts, and expand her sails, and be guided by the experiment in our alterations. If she sails upon an uneven keel, let us right her by adding weight where it is wanting. In this way, we may remedy her defects to the satisfaction of all concerned; but if we proceed now to make alterations, we may delace a beauty, or deform a well proportioned piece of workmanship. In short, Mr. Speaker, I am not for amendments at this time; but if gentlemen should think it a subject deserving of attention, they will surely not neglect the more important business which is now unfinished before them. Without we pass the collection bill we can get no revenue, and without revenue the wheels of Government cannot move. I am against taking up the subject at present, and shall therefore be totally against the amendments, if the Government is not organized, that I may see whether it is grievous or not.

When the propriety of making amendments shall be obvious from experience, I trust there will be virtue enough in my country to make them. Much has been said by the opponents to this Constitution, respecting the insecurity of jury trials, that great bulwark of personal safety. All regulations may be done away, by proper regulations on this point, and I do not fear but such regulations will take place. The bill is now before the Senate, and a proper attention is shown to this business. Indeed, I cannot conceive how it could be opposed; I think an almost omnipotent Emperor would not be hardy enough to set himself against it. Then why should we fear a power which cannot be improperly exercised?

We have proceeded to make some regulations under the Constitution; but have met with no inaccuracy, unless it may be said that the clause respecting vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another, is somewhat obscure; yet that is not sufficient, I trust, in any gentleman's opinion to induce an amendment. But let me ask what will be the consequence of taking up this subject? Are we going to finish it in an hour? I believe not; it will take us more than a day, a week, a month—it will take a year to complete it! And will it be doing our duty to our country, to neglect or delay putting the Government in motion, when every thing depends upon its being speedily done?

Let the Constitution have a fair trial; let it be examined by experience, discover by that test what its errors are, and then talk of amending; but to attempt it now is doing it at a risk, which is certainly imprudent. I have the honor of coming from a State that ratified the Constitution by the unanimous vote of a numerous convention: the people of Georgia have manifested their attachment to it, by adopting a State Constitution framed upon the same plan as this. But although they are thus satisfied, I shall not be against such amendments as will gratify the inhabitants of other States, provided they are judged of by experience and not merely on theory. For this reason, I wish the consideration of the subject postponed until the 1st of March, 1790.

Mr. GOODRICH.—I believe it would be perfectly right in the gentleman who spoke last, to move a postponement to the time he has mentioned; because he is opposed to the consideration of amendments altogether. But I believe it will be proper to attend to the subject earlier; because it is the wish of many of our constituents, that something should be added to the Constitution, to secure in a stronger manner their liberties from the inroads of power. Yet I think the present time premature; inasmuch as we have other business before us, which is incomplete, but essential to the public interest. When that is finished, I shall concur in taking up the subject of amendments.

Mr. BURKE thought amendments to the Constitution necessary, but this was not the proper time to bring them forward. He wished the Government completely organized before they entered upon this ground. The law for collecting the revenue is immediately necessary; the Treasury Department must be established; till this, and other important subjects are determined, he was against taking this up. He said it might interrupt the harmony of the House, which was necessary to be preserved in order to despatch the great objects of legislation. He hoped it would be postponed for the present, and pledged himself to bring it forward hereafter, if nobody else would.

Mr. MADISON.—The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) is certainly right in his opposition to my motion for going into a Committee of the Whole, because he is unfriendly to the object I have in contemplation; but I cannot see that the gentlemen who wish for amendments to be proposed at the present session, stand on good ground when they object to the House going into committee on this business.

Amendments to the Constitution.

When I first hinted to the House my intention of calling their deliberations to this object, I mentioned the pressure of other important subjects, and submitted the propriety of postponing this till the more urgent business was despatched; but finding that business not despatched, when the order of the day for considering amendments arrived, I thought it a good reason for a farther delay; I moved the postponement accordingly. I am sorry the same reason still exists in some degree, but it operates with less force, when it is considered that it is not now proposed to enter into a full and minute discussion of every part of the subject, but merely to bring it before the House, that our constituents may see we pay a proper attention to a subject they have much at heart; and if it does not give that full gratification which is to be wished, they will discover that it proceeds from the urgency of business of a very important nature. But if we continue to postpone from time to time, and refuse to let the subject come into view, it may occasion suspicions, which, though not well founded, may tend to inflame or prejudice the public mind against our decisions. They may think we are not sincere in our desire to incorporate such amendments in the Constitution as will secure those rights, which they consider as not sufficiently guarded. The applications for amendments come from a very respectable number of our constituents, and it is certainly proper for Congress to consider the subject, in order to quiet that anxiety which prevails in the public mind. Indeed, I think it would have been of advantage to the Government if it had been practicable to have made some propositions for amendments the first business we entered upon; it would have stifled the voice of complaint, and made friends of many who doubted the merits of the Constitution. Our future measures would then have been more generally agreeably supported; but the justifiable anxiety to put the Government into operation prevented that; it therefore remains for us to take it up as soon as possible. I wish then to commence the consideration at the present moment; I hold it to be my duty to unfold my ideas, and explain myself to the House in some form or other without delay. I only wish to introduce the great work, and, as I said before, I do not expect it will be decided immediately; but if some step is taken in the business, it will give reason to believe that we may come to a final result. This will inspire a reasonable hope in the advocates for amendments, that full justice will be done to the important subject; and I have reason to believe their expectation will not be defeated. I hope the House will not decline my motion for going into a committee.

Mr. SHERMAN.—I am willing that this matter should be brought before the House at a proper time. I suppose a number of gentlemen think it their duty to bring it forward; so that there is no apprehension it will be passed over in silence. Other gentlemen may be disposed to let the subject rest until the more important objects of Government are attended to; and I should conclude, from the nature of the case, that the people expect the latter from us in preference to altering the Constitution; because they have ratified that instrument, in order that the Government may begin to operate. If this was not their wish, they might as well have rejected the Constitution, as North Carolina has done, until the amendments took place. The State I have the honor to come from adopted this system by a very great majority, because they wished for the Government; but they desired no amendments. I suppose this was the case in other States; it will therefore be imprudent to neglect much more important concerns for this. The executive part of the Government wants organization; the business of the revenue is incomplete, to say nothing of the judiciary business. Now, will gentlemen give up these points to go into a discussion of amendments, when no advantage can arise from them? For my part, I question if any alteration which can be now proposed would be an amendment, in the true sense of the word; but, nevertheless, I am willing to let the subject be introduced. If the gentleman only desires to go into committee for the purpose of receiving his propositions, I shall consent; but I have strong objections to being interrupted in completing the more important business; because I am well satisfied it will alarm the fears of twenty of our constituents where it will please one.

Mr. WHITE.—I hope the House will not spend much time on this subject, till the more pressing business is despatched; but, at the same time, I hope we shall not dismiss it altogether, because I think a majority of the people who have ratified the Constitution, did it under the expectation that Congress would, at some convenient time, examine its texture and point out where it was defective, in order that it might be judiciously amended. Whether, while we are without experience, amendments can be digested in such a manner as to give satisfaction to a Constitutional majority of this House, I will not pretend to say; but I hope the subject may be considered with all convenient speed. I think it would tend to tranquilize the public mind; therefore I shall vote in favor of going into a Committee of the Whole, and, after receiving the subject, shall be content to refer it to a special committee to arrange and report. I fear, if we refuse to take up the subject, it will irritate many of our constituents, which I do not wish to do. If we cannot, after mature consideration, gratify their wishes, the cause of complaint will be lessened, if not removed. But a doubt on this head will not be a good reason why we should refuse to inquire. I do not say this as it affects my immediate constituents, because I believe a majority of the district which elected me do not require alterations; but I know there are people in other parts who will not be satisfied unless some amendments are proposed.

H. OR R.]

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, thought the gentleman who brought forward the subject had done his duty: he had supported his motion with ability and candor, and if he did not succeed, he was not to blame. On considering what had been urged for going into a committee, he was induced to join the gentleman; but it would be merely to receive his propositions, after which he would move something to this effect: That, however desirous this House may be to go into the consideration of amendments to the Constitution, in order to establish the liberties of the people of America on the securest foundation, yet the important and pressing business of the Government prevents their entering upon that subject at present.

Mr. PAGE.—My colleague tells you he is ready to submit to the Committee of the Whole his ideas on this subject. If no objection had been made to his motion, the whole business might have been finished before this. He has done me the honor of showing me certain propositions which he has drawn up; they are very important, and I sincerely wish the House may receive them. After they are published, I think the people will wait with patience till we are at leisure to resume them. But it must be very disagreeable to them in manner it has been for six weeks past; they will be tired out by a fruitless expectation. Putting myself into the place of those who favor amendments, I should suspect Congress did not mean seriously to enter upon the subject; that it was vain to expect redress from them. I should begin to turn my attention to the alternative contained in the fifth article, and think of joining the Legislatures of those States which have applied for calling a new convention. How dangerous such an expedient would be I need not mention; but I venture to affirm, that unless you take early notice of this subject, you will not have power to deliberate. The people will clamor for a new convention; they will not trust the House any longer. Those, therefore, who dread the assembling of a convention, will do well to acquiesce in the present motion, and lay the foundation of a most important work. I do not think we need consume more than half an hour in the Committee of the Whole; this is not so much time but we may conveniently spare it, considering the nature of the business. I do not wish to divert the attention of Congress from the organization of the Government, nor do I think it need be done, if we comply with the present motion.

Mr. VINING.—I hope the House will not go into a Committee of the Whole. It strikes me that the great amendment which the Government wants is expedition in the despatch of business. The wheels of the national machine cannot turn, until the impost and collection bill are perfected; these are the desiderata which the public mind is anxiously expecting. It is well known, that all we have hitherto done amounts to nothing, if we leave the business in its present state. True; but say gentlemen, let us go into committee; it will take but a short time; yet may it not take a considerable proportion of our time? May it not be procrastinated into days, weeks, nay, months? It is not the most facile subject that can come before the Legislature of the Union. Gentlemen's opinions do not run in a parallel on this topic; it may take up more time to unite or conciliate them than is now imagined. And what object is to be attained by going into a committee? If information is what we seek after, cannot that be obtained by the gentleman's laying his propositions on the table; they can be read, or they can be printed. But I have two other reasons for opposing this motion; the first is, the uncertainty with which we must decide on questions of amendment, founded merely on speculative theory; the second is a previous question, how far it is proper to take the subject of amendments into consideration, without the consent of two-thirds of both Houses? I will submit it to gentlemen, whether the words of the Constitution, "the Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments," do not bear my construction, that it is as requisite for two-thirds to sanction the expediency of going into the measure at present, as it will be to determine the necessity of amending at all. I take it that the fifth article admits of this construction, and think that two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives must concur in the expediency as to the time and manner of amendments, before we can proceed to the consideration of the amendments themselves. For my part, I do not see the expediency of proposing amendments. I think, sir, the most likely way to quiet the perturbation of the public mind, will be to pass salutary laws; to give permanency and stability to Constitutional regulations, founded on principles of equity and adjusted by wisdom. Although hitherto we have done nothing to tranquilize that agitation which the adoption of the Constitution threw some people into, yet the storm has abated and a calm succeeds. The people are not afraid of leaving the question of amendments to the discussion of their representatives; but is this the juncture for discussing it? What have Congress done towards completing the business of their appointment? They have passed a law regulating certain oaths; they have passed the impost bill; but are not vessels daily arriving, and the revenue slipping through our fingers? Is it not very strange that we neglect the completion of the revenue system? Is the system of jurisprudence unnecessary? And here let me ask gentlemen how they propose to amend that part of the Constitution which embraces the judicial branch of the Government, when they do not know the regulations proposed by the Senate, who are forming a bill on this subject?

If the honorable mover of the question before the House does not think he discharges his duty without bringing his propositions forward, let him take the mode I have mentioned, by which there will be little loss of time. He knows, as well as any gentleman, the importance of completing the business on your table, and that it is best to finish one subject before the introduction of another.

Amendments to the Constitution.

[H. OR R.]

He will not, therefore, persist in a motion which tends to distract our minds, and incapacitate us from making a proper decision on any subject. Suppose every gentleman who desires alterations to be made in the Constitution were to submit his propositions to a Committee of the Whole; what would be the consequence? We should have strings of them contradictory to each other, and be necessarily engaged in a discussion that would consume too much of our precious time.

Though the State I represent had the honor of taking the lead in the adoption of this Constitution, and did it by a unanimous vote; and although I have the strongest predilection for the present form of Government, yet I am open to information, and willing to be convinced of its imperfections. If this be done, I shall cheerfully assist in correcting them. But I cannot think this a proper time to enter upon the subject, because more important business is suspended; and, for want of experience we are as likely to do injury by our prescriptions as good. I wish to see every proposition which comes from that worthy gentleman on the science of Government; but I think it can be presented better by staying where we are, than by going into committee, and therefore shall vote against his motion.

Mr. MADISON.—I am sorry to be necessary to the loss of a single moment of time by the House. If I had been indulged in my motion, and we had gone into a Committee of the Whole, I think we might have rose and resumed the consideration of other business before this time; that is, so far as it depended upon what I proposed to bring forward. As that mode seems not to give satisfaction, I will withdraw the motion, and move you, sir, that a select committee be appointed to consider and report such amendments as are proper for Congress to propose to the Legislatures of the several States, conformably to the fifth article of the Constitution.

I will state my reasons why I think it proper to propose amendments, and state the amendments themselves, so far as I think they ought to be proposed. If I thought I could fulfil the duty which I owe to myself and my constituents, to let the subject pass over in silence, I most certainly should not trespass upon the indulgence of this House. But I cannot do this, and am therefore compelled to beg a patient hearing to what I have to lay before you. And I do most sincerely believe, that if Congress will devote but one day to this subject, so far as to satisfy the public that we do not disregard their wishes, it will have a salutary influence on the public councils, and prepare the way for a favorable reception of our future measures. It appears to me that this House is bound by every motive of prudence, not to let the first session pass over without proposing to the State Legislatures, some things to be incorporated into the Constitution, that will render it as acceptable to the whole people of the United States, as it has been found acceptable to a majority of them. I wish, among other reasons, why something should be done, that those who had been friendly to the adoption of this Constitution may have the opportunity of proving to those who were opposed to it that they were as sincerely devoted to liberty and a Republican Government, as those who charged them with wishing the adoption of this Constitution in order to lay the foundation of an aristocracy or despotism. It will be a desirable thing to extinguish from the bosom of every member of the community, any apprehensions that there are those among his countrymen who wish to deprive them of the liberty for which they valiantly fought and honorably bled. And if there are amendments desired of such a nature as will not injure the Constitution, and they can be ingrafted so as to give satisfaction to the doubting part of our fellow-citizens, the friends of the Federal Government will evince that spirit of deference and concession for which they have hitherto been distinguished.

It cannot be a secret to the gentlemen in this House, that, notwithstanding the ratification of this system of Government by eleven of the thirteen United States, in some cases unanimously, in others by large majorities; yet still there is a great number of our constituents who are dissatisfied with it; among whom are many respectable for their talents and patriotism, and respectable for their jealousy they have for their liberty, which, though mistaken in its object, is laudable in its motive. There is a great body of the people feeling under this description, who at present feel much inclined to join their support to the cause of Federalism, if they were satisfied on this one point. We ought not to disregard their inclination, but, on principles of amity and moderation, conform to their wishes, and expressly declare the great rights of mankind secured under this Constitution. The acquiescence which our fellow-citizens show under the Government, calls upon us for a like return of moderation. But perhaps there is a stronger motive than this for our going into a consideration of the subject. It is to provide those securities for liberty which are required by a part of the community; I allude in a particular manner to those two States that have not thought fit to throw themselves into the bosom of the Confederacy. It is a desirable thing, on our part as well as theirs, that a re-union should take place as soon as possible. I have no doubt, if we proceed to take those steps which would be prudent and requisite at this juncture, that in a short time we should see that disposition prevailing in those States which have not come in, that we have seen prevailing in those States which have embraced the Constitution.

But I will candidly acknowledge, that, over and above all these considerations, I do conceive that the Constitution may be amended; that is to say, if all power is subject to abuse, that then it is possible the abuse of the powers of the General Government may be guarded against in a more secure manner than is now done, while no one advantage arising from the exercise of that power shall be damaged or endangered by it. We have in this way something to gain, and, if we proceed with caution, nothing to lose. And in this case it is necessary to proceed with caution; for while we feel all these inducements to go into a revision of the Constitution, we must feel for the Constitution itself, and make that revision a moderate one. I should be unwilling to see a door opened for a reconsideration of the whole structure of the Government—for a reconsideration of the principles and the substance of the powers given; because I doubt, if such a door were opened, we should be very likely to stop at that point which would be safe to the Government itself. But I do wish to see a door opened to consider, so far as to incorporate those provisions for the security of rights, against which I believe no serious objection has been made by any class of our constituents: such as would be likely to meet with the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses, and the approbation of three-fourths of the State Legislatures. I will not propose a single alteration which I do not wish to see take place, as intrinsically proper in itself, or proper because it is wished for by a respectable number of my fellow-citizens; and therefore I shall not propose a single alteration but is likely to meet the concurrence required by the Constitution. There have been objections of various kinds made against the Constitution. Some were levelled against its structure because the President was without a council; because the Senate, which is a legislative body, had judicial powers in trials on impeachments; and because the powers of that body were compounded in other respects, in a manner that did not correspond with a particular theory; because it grants more power than is supposed to be necessary for every good purpose, and controls the ordinary powers of the State Governments. I know some respectable characters who opposed this Government on these grounds; but I believe that the great mass of the people who opposed it, disliked it because it did not contain effectual provisions against the encroachments on particular rights, and those safeguards which they have been long accustomed to have interposed between them and the magistrate who exercises the sovereign power; nor ought we to consider them safe, while a great number of our fellow-citizens think these securities necessary.

It is a fortunate thing that the objection to the Government has been made on the ground I stated; because it will be practicable, on that ground, to obviate the objection, so far as to satisfy the public mind that their liberties will be perpetual, and this without endangering any part of the Constitution, which is considered as essential to the existence of the Government by those who promoted its adoption. The amendments which have occurred to me, proper to be recommended by Congress to the State Legislatures, are these: First, That there be prefixed to the Constitution a declaration, that all power is originally vested in, and consequently derived from, the people. That Government is instituted and ought to be exercised for the benefit of the people; which consists in the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right of acquiring and using property, and persons, their houses, their papers, and their other property, from all unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated by warrants issued without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, or not particularly describing the places to be searched, or the persons or things to be seized.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the cause and nature of the accusation, to be confronted with his accusers, and the witnesses against him; to have a compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence. The exceptions here or elsewhere in the Constitution, made in favor of particular rights, shall not be so construed as to diminish the just importance of other rights retained by the people, or as to enlarge the powers delegated by the Constitution; but either as actual limitations of such powers, or as inserted merely for greater caution.

Fifthly. That in article 1st, section 10, between clauses 1 and 2, be inserted this clause, to wit: No State shall violate the equal rights of conscience, or the freedom of the press, or the trial by jury in criminal cases. Sixthly. That, in article 3d, section 2, be annexed to the end of clause 2d, these words, to wit: But no appeal to such court shall be allowed where the value in controversy shall not amount to ——— dollars: nor shall any fact triable by jury, according to the course of common law, be otherwise re-examinable than may consist with the principles of common law. Seventhly. That in article 3d, section 2, the third clause be struck out, and in its place be inserted the clauses following, to wit:

The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and cases arising in the land or naval forces, or the militia when on actual service, in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, of the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and in all crimes punishable with loss of life or member, presentment or indictment by a grand jury shall be an essential preliminary, provided that in cases of crimes committed within any county which may be in possession of an enemy, or in which a general insurrection may prevail, the trial may by law be authorized in some other county of the same State, as near as may be to the seat of the offence.

In cases of crimes committed not within any county, the trial may by law be in such county as the laws shall have prescribed. In suits at common law, between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of the best securities to the rights of the people, ought to remain inviolate. Eighthly. That immediately after article 6th, be inserted, as article 7th, the clauses following, to wit:

The powers delegated by this Constitution are appropriated to the departments to which they are respectively distributed: so that the Legislature persons, their houses, their papers, and their other property, from all unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated by warrants issued without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, or not particularly describing the places to be searched, or the persons or things to be seized.

The powers not delegated by this Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively. Ninthly. That article 7th be numbered as article 8th.

The first of these amendments relates to what may be called a bill of rights. I will own that I never considered this provision so essential to the Federal Constitution as to make it improper to ratify it, until such an amendment was added; at the same time, I always conceived, that in a certain form, and to a certain extent, such a provision was neither improper nor altogether useless. I am aware that a great number of the most respectable friends to the Government, and champions for republican liberty, have thought such a provision not only unnecessary, but even improper; nay, I believe some have gone so far as to think it even dangerous. Some policy has been made use of, perhaps, by gentlemen on both sides of the question: I acknowledge the ingenuity of those arguments which were drawn against the Constitution, by a comparison with the policy of Great Britain, in establishing a declaration of rights; but there is too great a difference in the case to warrant the comparison: therefore, the arguments drawn from that source were in a great measure inapplicable. In the declaration of rights which that country has established, the truth is, they have gone no farther than to raise a barrier against the power of the Crown; the power of the Legislature is left altogether indefinite. Although I know whenever the great rights, the trial by jury, freedom of the press, or liberty of conscience, come in question in that body, the invasion of them is resisted by able advocates, yet their Magna Charta does not contain any one provision for the security of those rights, respecting which the people of America are most alarmed. The freedom of the press and rights of conscience, those choicest privileges of the people, are unguarded in the British Constitution.

But although the case may be widely different, and it may not be thought necessary to provide limits for the legislative power in that country, yet a different opinion prevails in the United States. The people of many States have thought it necessary to raise barriers against power in all forms and departments of Government, and I am inclined to believe, if once bills of rights are established in all the States as well as the Federal Constitution, we shall find, that, although some of them are rather unimportant, yet, upon the whole, they will have a salutary tendency. It may be said, in some instances, they do no more than state the perfect equality of mankind. This, is sure, is an absolute truth, yet it is not absolutely necessary to be inserted at the head of a Constitution.

In some instances they assert those rights which are exercised by the people in forming and establishing a plan of Government. In other instances, they specify those rights which are retained when particular powers are given up to be exercised by the Legislature. In other instances, they specify positive rights, which may seem to result from the nature of the compact. Trial by jury cannot be considered as a natural right, but a right resulting from a social compact, which regulates the action of the community, but is as essential to secure the liberty of the people as any one of the pre-existent rights of nature. In other instances, they lay down dogmatic maxims with respect to the construction of the Government; declaring that the Legislative, Executive, and judicial branches, shall be kept separate and distinct. Perhaps the best way of securing this in practice is, to provide such checks as will prevent the encroachment of the one upon the other.

But, whatever may be the form which the several States have adopted in making declarations in favor of particular rights, the great object in view is to limit and qualify the powers of Government, by excepting out of the grant of power those cases in which the Government ought not to act, or to act only in a particular mode. They point these exceptions sometimes against the abuse of the Executive power, sometimes against the Legislative, and, in some cases, against the community itself; or, in other words, against the majority in favor of the minority.

In our Government it is, perhaps, less necessary to guard against the abuse in the Executive Department than any other; because it is not the stronger branch of the system, but the weaker. It therefore must be levelled against the Legislature, for it is the most powerful, and most likely to be abused, because it is under the least control. Hence, so far as a declaration of rights can tend to prevent the exercise of undue power, it cannot be doubted that such declaration is proper. But I confess that I do conceive, that in a Government modified like this of the United States, the great danger lies rather in the abuse of the community than in the Legislative body. The prescription in favor of liberty ought to be levelled against that quarter where the greatest danger lies, namely, that which possesses the highest prerogative of power. But this is not found in either the Executive or Legislative departments of Government, but in the body of the people, operating by the majority against the minority. It may be thought that all paper barriers against the power of the community are too weak to be worthy of attention. I am sensible they are not so strong as to satisfy gentlemen of every description who have seen and examined thoroughly the texture of such a defence; yet, as they have a tendency to impress some degree of respect for them, to establish the public opinion in their favor, and rouse the attention of the whole community, it may be one means to controul the majority from those acts to which they might be otherwise inclined.

It has been said, by way of objection to a bill of rights, by many respectable gentlemen out of doors, and I find opposition on the same principles likely to be made by gentlemen on this floor, that they are unnecessary articles of a Republican Government, upon the presumption that the people have those rights in their own hands, and that is the proper place for them to rest. It would be a sufficient answer to say, that this objection lies against such provisions under the State Governments; and there are, I believe, but few gentlemen who are inclined to push their theory so far as to say that a declaration of rights in those cases is either ineffectual or improper. It has been said, that in the Federal Government they are unnecessary, because the powers are enumerated, and it follows, that all that are not granted by the Constitution are retained; that the Constitution is a bill of powers, the great residuum being the rights of the people; and, therefore, a bill of rights cannot be so necessary as if the residuum was thrown into the hands of the Government. I admit that these arguments are not entirely without foundation; but they are not conclusive to the extent which has been supposed. It is true, the powers of the General Government are circumscribed, they are directed to particular objects; but even if Government keeps within those limits, it has certain discretionary powers with respect to the means, which may admit of abuse to a certain extent, in the same manner as the powers of the State Governments under their constitutions may to an indefinite extent; because in the Constitution of the United States, there is a clause granting to Congress the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; this enables them to fulfil every purpose for which the Government was established. Now, may not laws be considered necessary and proper by Congress, (for it is for them to judge of the necessity and propriety to accomplish those special purposes which they may have in contemplation,) which laws in themselves are neither necessary nor proper; as well as improper laws could be enacted by the State Legislatures, for fulfilling the more extended objects of those Governments? I will state an instance, which I think in point, and proves that this might be the case. The General Government has a right to pass all laws which shall be necessary to collect its revenue; the means for enforcing the collection are within the direction of the Legislature; may not general warrants be considered necessary for this purpose, as well as for some purposes which it was supposed at the framing of their constitutions the State Governments had in view? If there was reason for restraining the State Governments from exercising this power, there is like reason for restraining the Federal Government.

It may be said, indeed it has been said, that a bill of rights is not necessary, because the establishment of this Government has not repealed those declarations of rights which are added to the several State constitutions; that those rights of the people which had been established by the most solemn act, could not be annihilated by a subsequent act of that people, who meant and declared at the head of the instrument, that they ordained and established a new system, for the express purpose of securing to themselves and posterity the liberties they had gained by an arduous conflict.

I admit the force of this observation, but I do not look upon it to be conclusive. In the first place, it is too uncertain ground to leave this provision upon, if a provision is at all necessary to secure rights so important as many of those I have mentioned are conceived to be, by the public in general, as well as those in particular who opposed the adoption of this Constitution. Besides, some States have no bills of rights, there are others provided with very defective ones, and there are others whose bills of rights are not only defective, but absolutely improper; instead of securing some in the full extent which republican principles would require, they limit them too much to agree with the common ideas of liberty. It has been objected also against a bill of rights, that, by enumerating particular exceptions to the grant of power, it would disparage those rights which were not placed in that enumeration; and it might follow by implication, that those rights which were not singled out, were intended to be assigned into the hands of the General Government, and were consequently insecure. This is one of the most plausible arguments I have ever heard urged against the admission of a bill of rights into this system; but, I conceive, that it may be guarded against. I have attempted it, as gentlemen may see by turning to the last clause of the fourth resolution.

It has been said that it is unnecessary to load the Constitution with this provision, because it was not found effectual in the constitution of the particular States. It is true, there are a few particular States in which some of the most valuable articles have not, at one time or other, been violated; but it does not follow but they may have, to a certain degree, a salutary effect against the abuse of power. If they are incorporated into the Constitution, independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the Legislative or Executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the Constitution by the declaration of rights. Besides this security, there is a great probability that such a declaration in the federal system would be enforced, because the State Legislatures will jealously and closely watch the operations of this Government, and be able to resist with more effect every assumption of power, than any other power on earth can do; and the greatest opponents to a Federal Government admit the State Legislatures to be sure guardians of the people's liberty. I conclude, from this view of the subject, that it will be proper in itself, and highly politic, for the tranquillity of the public mind, and the stability of the Government, that we should offer something, in the form I have proposed, to be incorporated in the system of Government, as a declaration of the rights of the people.

In the next place, I wish to see that part of the Constitution revised which declares that the number of Representatives shall not exceed the proportion of one for every thirty thousand persons, and allows one Representative to every State which rates below that proportion. If we attend to the discussion of this subject, which has taken place in the State conventions, and even in the opinion of the friends to the Constitution, an alteration here is proper. It is the sense of the people of America, that the number of Representatives ought to be increased, but particularly that it should not be left in the discretion of the Government to diminish them, below that proportion which certainly is in the power of the Legislature, as the Constitution now stands; and they may, as the population of the country increases, increase the House of Representatives to a very unwieldy degree. I confess I always thought this part of the Constitution defective, though not dangerous; and that it ought to be particularly attended to whenever Congress should go into the consideration of amendments.

There are several minor cases enumerated in my proposition, in which I wish also to see some alteration take place. That article which leaves it in the power of the Legislature to ascertain its own emolument, is one to which I allude. I do not believe this is a power which, in the ordinary course of Government, is likely to be abused. Perhaps of all the powers granted, it is least likely to abuse; but there is a seeming impropriety in leaving any set of men without control to put their hand into the public coffers, to take out money to put in their pockets; there is a seeming indecorum in such power, which leads me to propose a change. We have a guide to this alteration in several of the amendments which the different conventions have proposed. I have gone, therefore, so far as to fix it, that no law varying the compensation, shall operate until there is a change in the Legislature; in which case it cannot be for the particular benefit of those who are concerned in determining the value of the service. I wish, also, in revising the Constitution, we may throw into that section, which interdicts the abuse of certain powers in the State Legislatures, some other provisions of equal, if not greater importance than those already made. The words, "No State shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law," &c., were wise and proper restrictions in the Constitution. I think there is more danger of those powers being abused by the State Governments than by the Government of the United States. The same may be said of other powers which they possess, if not controlled by the general principle, that laws are unconstitutional which infringe the rights of the community. I should, therefore, wish to extend this interdiction, and add, as I have stated in the 5th resolution, that no State shall violate the equal right of conscience, freedom of the press, or trial by jury in criminal cases; because it is proper that every Government should be disarmed of powers which trench upon those particular rights. I know, in some of the State constitutions, the power of the Government is controlled by such a declaration; but others are not. I cannot see any reason against obtaining even a double security on those points; and nothing can give a more sincere proof of the attachment of those who oppose this Constitution to these great and important rights, than to see them join in obtaining the security I have now proposed; because it must be admitted, on all hands, that the State Governments are as liable to attack these invaluable privileges as the General Government is, and therefore ought to be as cautiously guarded against.

Amendments to the Constitution.

I think it will be proper, with respect to the judiciary powers, to satisfy the public mind on those points which I have mentioned. Great inconvenience has been apprehended to suitors from the distance they would be dragged to obtain justice in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon an appeal on an action for a small debt. To remedy this, declare that no appeal shall be made unless the matter in controversy amounts to a particular sum; this, with the regulations respecting jury trials in criminal cases, and suits at common law, it is to be hoped, will quiet and reconcile the minds of the people to that part of the Constitution.

I find, from looking into the amendments proposed by the State conventions, that several are particularly anxious that it should be declared in the Constitution, that the powers not therein delegated should be reserved to the several States. Perhaps other words may define this more precisely than the whole of the instrument now does. I admit they may be deemed unnecessary; but there can be no harm in making such a declaration, if gentlemen will allow that the fact is as stated. I am sure I understand it so, and do therefore propose it.

These are the points on which I wish to see a revision of the Constitution take place. How far they will accord with the sense of this body, I cannot take upon me absolutely to determine; but I believe every gentleman will readily admit that nothing is in contemplation, so far as I have mentioned, that can endanger the beauty of the Government in any one important feature, even in the eyes of its most sanguine admirers. I have proposed nothing that does not appear to me as proper in itself, or eligible as patronised by a respectable number of our fellow-citizens; and if we can make the Constitution better in the opinion of those who are opposed to it, without weakening its frame, or abridging its usefulness in the judgment of those who are attached to it, we act the part of wise and liberal men to make such alterations as shall produce that effect.

Having done what I conceived was my duty, in bringing before this House the subject of amendments, and also stated such as I wish for and approve, and offered the reasons which oc-able gentleman, a member of this House, has been attacked in the public newspapers on account of sentiments delivered on this floor. Have Congress taken any notice of it? Have they ordered the writer before them, even for a breach of privilege, although the Constitution provides that a member shall not be questioned in any place for any speech or debate in the House? No; these things are offered to the public view, and held up to the inspection of the world. These are principles which will always prevail. I am not afraid, nor are other members, I believe, our conduct should meet the severest scrutiny. Where, then, is the necessity of taking measures to secure what neither is not can be in danger?

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that the present is not a proper time for considering of amendments. The States of Rhode Island and North Carolina are not in the Union. As to the latter, we have every presumption that she will come in. But in Rhode Island I think the anti-federal interest yet prevails. I am sorry for it, particularly on account of the firm friends of the Union, who are kept without the embrace of the Confederacy by their countrymen. These persons are worthy of our patronage; and I wish they would apply to us for protection; they should have my consent to be taken into the Union upon such application. I understand there are some important mercantile and manufacturing towns in that State, who ardently wish to live under the laws of the General Government; if they were to come forward and request us to take measures for this purpose, I would give my sanction to any which would be likely to bring about such an event.

But to return to my argument. It being the case that those States are not yet come into the Union, when they join us, we shall have another list of amendments to consider, and another bill of rights to frame. Now, in my judgment, it is better to make but one work of it whenever we set about the business.

But in what a situation shall we be with respect to those foreign Powers with whom we desire to be in treaty? They look upon us as a nation emerging into figure and importance. But what will be their opinion, if they see us unable to retain the national advantages we have just gained? They will smile at our infantine efforts to obtain consequence, and treat us with the contempt we have hitherto borne by reason of the imbecility of our Government. Can we expect to enter into a commercial competition with any of them, while our system is incomplete? And how long it will remain in such a situation, if we enter upon amendments, God only knows. Our instability will make us objects of scorn. We are not content with two revolutions in less than fourteen years; we must enter upon a third, without necessity or propriety. Our faith will be like the punica fides of Carthage; and we shall have none that will repose confidence in us. Why will gentlemen press us to propose amendments, while we are without experience? Can they assure themselves that the amendments, as they call them, will not want amendments, as soon as they are adopted? I will not tax gentlemen with a desire of amusing the people; I believe they venerate their country too much for this; but what more can amendments lead to? That part of the Constitution which is proposed to be altered, may be the most valuable part of the whole; and perhaps those who now clamor for alterations, may, ere long, discover that they have marred a good Government, and rendered their own liberties insecure. I again repeat it, this is not the time for bringing forward amendments; and, notwithstanding the honorable gentleman's ingenious arguments on that point, I am now more strongly persuaded it is wrong.

If we actually find the Constitution bad upon experience, or the rights and privileges of the people in danger, I here pledge myself to step forward among the first friends of liberty to prevent the evil; and if nothing else will avail, I will draw my sword in the defence of freedom, and cheerfully immolate at that shrine my property and my life. But how are we now proceeding? Why, on nothing more than theoretical speculation, pursuing a mere ignis fatuus, which may lead us into serious embarrassments. The imperfections of the Government are now unknown; let it have a fair trial, and I will be bound to show ourselves; then we can tell where to apply the remedy, so as to secure the great object we are aiming at.

There are, Mr. Speaker, a number of important bills on the table which require despatch; but I am afraid, if we enter on this business, we shall not be able to attend to them for a long time. Look, sir, over the long list of amendments proposed by some of the adopting States, and say, when the House could get through the discussion; and I believe, sir, every one of those amendments will come before us. Gentlemen may feel themselves called by duty or inclination to oppose them. How are we then to extricate ourselves from this labyrinth of business? Certainly we shall lose much of our valuable time, without any advantage whatsoever. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will press us no further; he has done his duty, and acquitted himself of the obligation under which he lay. He may now accede to what I take to be the sense of the House, and let the business of amendments lie over until next Spring; that will be soon enough to take it up to any good purpose.

Mr. GERRY.—I do not rise to go into the merits or demerits of the subject of amendments; nor shall I make any other observations on the motion for going into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which is now withdrawn, than merely to say, that, referring the subject to that committee, is treating it with the dignity its importance requires. But I consider it improper to take up this business, when our attention is occupied by other important objects. We should despatch the subjects now on the table, and let this lie over until a period of more leisure for discussion and attention. The gentleman from Virginia says it is necessary to go into a consideration of this subject, in order to satisfy the people.

Amendments to the Constitution.

For my part, I cannot be of his opinion. The people know we are employed in the organization of the Government, and cannot expect that we should forego this business for any other. But I would not have it understood, that I am against entering upon amendments when the proper time arrives. I shall be glad to set about it as soon as possible, but I would not stay the operations of the Government on this account. I think with the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. VINING,) that the great wheels of the political machine should first be set in motion; and with the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) that the vessel ought to be got under way, lest she lie by the wharf till she beat off her rudder, and run herself a wreck ashore.

I say I wish as early a day as possible may be assigned for taking up this business, in order to prevent the necessity which the States may think themselves under of calling a new convention. For I am not, sir, one of those blind admirers of this system, who think it all perfection; nor am I so blind as not to see its beauties. The truth is, it partakes of humanity; in it is blended virtue and vice, errors and excellence. But I think if it is referred to a new convention, we run the risk of losing some of its best properties; this is a case I never wish to see. Whatever might have been my sentiments of the ratification of the Constitution without amendments, my sense now is, that the salvation of America depends upon the establishment of this Government, whether amended or not. If the Constitution which is now ratified should not be supported, I despair of ever having a Government of these United States.

I wish the subject to be considered early for another reason. There are two States not in the Union; it would be a very desirable circumstance to gain them. I should therefore be in favor of such amendments as might tend to invite them and gain their confidence; good policy will dictate to us to expedite that event. Gentlemen say, that we shall not obtain the consent of two-thirds of both Houses to amendments. Are gentlemen willing then to throw Rhode Island and North Carolina into the situation of foreign nations? They have told you that they cannot accede to the Union, unless certain amendments are made to the Constitution; if you deny a compliance with their request in that particular, you refuse an accommodation to bring about that desirable event, and leave them detached from the Union.

I have another reason for going early into this business. It is necessary to establish an energetic Government. My idea of such a Government is, that due deliberation be had in making laws, and efficiency in the execution. I hope, in this country, the latter may obtain without the dread of despotism. I would wish to see the execution of good laws irresistible. But from the view which we have already had of the disposition of the Government, we seem really to be afraid to administer the powers with which we are invested, lest we give offence. We appear afraid to exercise the Constitutional powers of the Government, which the welfare of the State requires, lest a jealousy of our powers be the consequence. What is the reason of this timidity? Why, because we see a great body of our constituents opposed to the Constitution as it now stands, who are apprehensive of the enormous powers of Government. But if this business is taken up, and it is thought proper to make amendments, it will remove this difficulty. Let us deal fairly and candidly with our constituents, and give the subject a full discussion; after that, I have no doubt but the decision will be such as, upon examination, we shall discover to be right. If it shall then appear proper and wise to reject the amendments, I dare to say the reasons for so doing will bring conviction to the people out of doors, as well as it will to the members of this House; and they will acquiesce in the decision, though they may regret the disappointment of their fondest hopes for the security of the liberties of themselves and their posterity. Thus, and thus only, the Government will have its due energy, and accomplish the end for which it was instituted.

I am against referring the subject to a select committee, because I conceive it would be disrespectful to those States which have proposed amendments. The conventions of the States consisted of the most wise and virtuous men of the community; they have ratified this Constitution, in full confidence that their objections would at least be considered; and shall we, sir, preclude them by the appointment of a special committee, to consider of a few propositions brought forward by an individual gentleman? Is it in contemplation that the committee should have the subject at large before them, or that they should report upon the particular amendments just mentioned, as they think proper? And are we to be precluded from the consideration of any other amendments but those the committee may report? A select committee must be considered improper, because it is putting their judgments against that of the conventions which have proposed amendments; but if the committee are to consider the matter at large, they will be liable to this objection, that their report will only be waste of time. For if they do not bring forward the whole of the amendments recommended, individual members will consider themselves bound to bring them forward for the decision of the House. I would therefore submit, if gentlemen are determined to proceed in the business at this time, whether it is not better that it should go, in the first instance, to a Committee of the Whole, as first proposed by the gentleman from Virginia?

Some gentlemen consider it necessary to do this to satisfy our constituents. I think referring the business to a special committee will be attempting to amuse them with trifles. Our fellow-citizens are possessed of too much discernment not to be able to discover the intention of Congress by such procedure. It will be the duty of their representatives to tell them, if they were not able to discover it of themselves, they require the subject to be fairly considered; and if it be found to be improper to comply with their reasonable expectations, to tell them so. I hope there is no analogy between federal and punie faith; but unless Congress shall candidly consider the amendments which have been proposed in confidence by the State conventions, federal faith will not be considered very different from the punica fides of Carthage. The ratification of the Constitution in several States would never have taken place, had they not been assured that the objections would have been duly attended to by Congress. And I believe many members of these conventions would never have voted for it, if they had not been persuaded that Congress would notice them with that candor and attention which their importance requires. I will say nothing respecting the amendments themselves; they ought to stand or fall on their own merits. If any of them are eligible, they will be adopted; if not, they will be rejected.

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. LIVERMORE was against this motion; not that he was against amendments at a proper time. It is enjoined on him to act a rational part in procuring certain amendments, and he meant to do so; but he could not say what amendments were requisite, until the Government was organized. He supposed the judiciary law would contain certain regulations that would remove the anxiety of the people respecting such amendments as related thereto, because he thought much of the minutiae respecting suits between citizens of different States, &c. might be provided for by law. He could not agree to make jury trials necessary on every occasion; they were not practised even at this time, and there were some cases in which a cause could be better decided without a jury than with one.

In addition to the judiciary business, there is that which relates to the revenue. Gentlemen had let an opportunity go through their hands of getting a considerable supply from the impost on the Spring importations. He reminded them of this; and would tell them now was the time to finish that business; for if they did not sow in seed-time, they would be beggars in harvest. He was well satisfied in his own mind, that the people of America did not look for amendments at present; they never could imagine it to be the first work of Congress.

He wished the concurrence of the Senate upon entering on this business, because if they opposed the measure, all the House did would be mere waste of time; and there was some little difficulty on this point, because it required the consent of two-thirds of both Houses to agree to what was proper on this occasion. He said, moreover, it would be better to refer the subject generally, if referred to them at all, than to take up the propositions of individual members.

Mr. SHERMAN—I do not suppose the Constitution to be perfect, nor do I imagine if Congress and all the Legislatures on the continent were to revise it, that their united labors would make it perfect. I do not expect any perfection on this side the grave in the works of man; but my opinion is, that we are not at present in circumstances to make it better. It is a wonder that there has been such unanimity in adopting it, considering the ordeal it had to undergo; and the unanimity which prevailed at its formation is equally astonishing; amidst all the members from the twelve States present at the Federal Convention, there were only three who did not sign the instrument to attest their opinion of its goodness. Of the eleven States who have received it, the majority have ratified it without proposing a single amendment. This circumstance leads me to suppose that we shall not be able to propose any alterations that are likely to be adopted by nine States; and gentlemen know, before the alterations take effect, they must be agreed to by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States in the Union. Those States which have not recommended alterations, will hardly adopt them, unless it is clear that they tend to make the Constitution better. Now, how this can be made out to their satisfaction I am yet to learn; they know of no defect from experience. It seems to be the opinion of gentlemen generally that this is not the time for entering upon the discussion of amendments: our only question therefore is, how to get rid of the subject. Now, for my own part, I would prefer to have it referred to a Committee of the Whole, rather than a special committee, and therefore shall not agree to the motion now before the House.

Mr. GERRY moved, that the business lie over until the 1st day of July next, and that it be the order for that day.

Mr. SUMNER—I consider the subject of amendments of such great importance to the Union, that I shall be glad to see it undertaken in any manner. I am not, Mr. Speaker, disposed to sacrifice substance to form; therefore, whether the business shall originate in a Committee of the Whole or in the House, is a matter of indifference to me, so that it be put in train. Although I am seriously inclined to give this subject a full discussion, yet I do not wish it to be fully entered into at present, but am willing it should be postponed to a future day, when we shall have more leisure. With respect to referring to a select committee, I am rather against it; because I consider it as treating the applications of the State conventions rather slightly; and I presume it is the intention of the House to take those applications into consideration as well as any other. If it is not, I think it will give fresh cause for jealousy; it will rouse the alarm which is now suspended, and the people will become clamorous for amendments. They will decline any further application to Congress, and resort to the other alternative pointed out in the Constitution. I hope, therefore, this House, when they do go into the business, will receive those propositions generally. This, I apprehend, will tend to tranquillize the public mind, and promote that harmony which ought to be kept up between those in the exercise of the powers of Government, and those who have clothed them with the authority, or, in other words, between Congress and the people. Without a harmony and confidence subsist between them, the measures of Government will prove abortive, and we shall have still to lament that imbecility (and weakness which have long marked our public councils. Mr. VINE found himself in a delicate situation respecting the subject of amendments. He came from a small State, and therefore his sentiments would not be considered of so much weight as the sentiments of those gentlemen who spoke the sense of much larger States. Besides, his constituents had prejudged the question, by a unanimous adoption of the Constitution, without suggesting any amendments thereto. His sense accorded with the declared sense of the State of Delaware, and he was doubly bound to object to amendments which were either improper or unnecessary. But he had good reasons for opposing the consideration of even proper alterations at this time. He would ask the gentleman who pressed them, whether he would be responsible for the risk the Government would run of being injured by an interregnum? Proposing amendments at this time, is suspending the operations of Government, and may be productive of its ruin.

He would not follow the gentleman in his arguments, though he supposed them all answerable, because he would not take up the time of the House; he contented himself with saying, that a bill of rights was unnecessary in a Government deriving all its powers from the people; and the Constitution enforced the principle in the strongest manner by the practical declaration prefixed to that instrument; he alluded to the words, "We the people do ordain and establish."

There were many things mentioned by some of the State Conventions which he would never agree to, on any conditions whatever; they changed the principles of the Government, and were therefore obnoxious to its friends. The honorable gentleman from Virginia had not touched upon any of them; he was glad of it, because he could by no means bear the idea of an alteration respecting direct taxes, judging of elections, &c. He found he was not speaking to the question; he would therefore return to it, and declare he was against committing the subject to a select committee; if it was to be committed at all, he preferred a Committee of the Whole, but hoped the subject would be postponed.

Mr. MADISON found himself unfortunate in not satisfying gentlemen with respect to the mode of introducing the business; he thought, from the dignity and peculiarity of the subject, that it ought to be referred to a Committee of the Whole. He accordingly made that motion first, but finding himself not likely to succeed in that way, he had changed his ground. Fearing again to be discomfited, he would change his mode, and move the propositions he had stated before, and the House might do what they thought proper with them. He accordingly moved the propositions by way of resolutions to be adopted by the House.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to these propositions, because they did not take up the amendments of the several States.

Mr. PAOR was much obliged to his colleague for bringing the subject forward in the manner he had done. He conceived it to be just and fair. What was to be done when the House would not refer it to a committee of any sort, but bring the question at once before them? He hoped it would be the means of bringing about a decision.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to refer Mr. MADISON's motion to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LES thought it ought to be taken up in that committee; and hoped his colleague would bring the propositions before the committee, when on the state of the Union, as he had originally intended.

Mr. BOURNOR wished the appointment of a select committee, but afterwards withdrew his motion.

At length Mr. LAWRENCE's motion was agreed to, and Mr. MADISON's propositions were ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole. Adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 9.

On motion. Resolved, That so much of the standing rules and orders as direct that, upon a division of the House on any question, the members who vote in the affirmative shall go to the right, and those in the negative shall go to the left of the Chair, be rescinded; and that, in future, when a division is called for, those in the affirmative of the question shall rise from their seats, and those in the negative remain sitting.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the collection of duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States. Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair. Previous to making any further nomination of ports of entry and delivery, it was moved, that the shores, bays, rivers, creeks, and harbors, be divided into as many districts as there are ports of entry in the United States. This motion, after a discussion, was adopted.

It was moved to insert a clause, whereby masters of ships and other vessels, loaded with goods, wares, and merchandise, and bound into the United States from any foreign port, should be obliged to produce duplicate manifestoes of their respective cargoes, to any officers of the customs that may demand the same, previous to their entering the ports of destination.

This motion gave rise to a lengthy conversation, which terminated in withdrawing the motion.

It was then voted, that a collector, a naval officer, and a surveyor, should be appointed for each of the following ports, viz: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Portsmouth; Alexandria, Virginia; Georgetown, Maryland;

Charleston, South Carolina; and Savannah. The committee then rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 10.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House again went into a committee on the bill to regulate the collection on imported goods; Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair.

On motion of Mr. MADISON, a clause was inserted, which provides "that there shall be a surveyor at each of the ports of delivery only," excepting certain ports to be enumerated.

The motion of Mr. AMES, which was withdrawn yesterday, was again brought forward by that gentleman, and adopted as a clause, to be inserted in the bill. It provides, That every master, or other person, having charge or command of a ship or vessel bound to any port of the United States, shall be obliged to produce, on demand, to any officer, or person authorized for the purpose, two manifestos, specifying in words, the true contents of the cargo on board such ship or vessel, one of which manifests the officer is to endorse, and return to the captain, noting the time when the same was produced to him. The other he is to transmit to the naval officer of the port to which the said vessel is bound.

Several other propositions were produced, and debated, but not accepted. The committee then rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, June 11.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the collection of duties, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair, when—

Mr. PARKER moved to insert the following clause in the bill, viz: "Provided that no ship or vessel, not belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall be permitted to enter or unlade at any other than the following ports, viz:"

This clause, the gentleman observed, was necessary to hold up a preference to our own navigation, to secure to the citizens of the States exclusively the coasting trade; it would conduce more effectually to securing the revenue, and was a provision sanctioned by the practice of other commercial countries.

Several other observations were made, when Mr. FITZSIMONS proposed that the clause should be amended by adding, "Nor shall any ship or vessel from India, China, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and bound to the United States, enter or unlade but at the following ports, viz:"

This clause, with the amendment, occasioned considerable discussion. In opposition to the first, it was observed that the restriction could not, with propriety, be confined to foreign vessels, on account of smuggling, as our own citizens, possessing superior advantages for that business, would more probably evade the laws than strangers; that it would operate altogether in favor of those States who employed no foreign shipping; and as sufficient had been done to encourage our own navigation, it was to be expected that the motion would be withdrawn.

With respect to the clause restricting vessels from India, it was said that it would tend to the creating of monopolies, to give undue advantage to particular ports, to their aggrandizement and that of individuals residing in or near such ports, while it would deprive those who resided at a distance from them, and whose capitals were limited, from adventuring in those voyages, as was now the case.

In support of the clause, it was observed that foreigners could, with propriety, be restricted from entering those ports which they had not been accustomed to frequent; and, for this reason, no injury would be done to the persons residing at such places; but to circumscribe our own navigation within narrower limits than it had been used to, would be productive of extensive ill consequences; it would cut off a great proportion of the trade of the United States, and, in a manner, depopulate the sea-coast. That the experience of other countries was in favor of restricting foreigners to narrower limits than our own citizens, they could not be supposed to be actuated by any motives of attachment to the Government or country to induce a compliance with the revenue laws.

With respect to the restriction on India ships, it was said that goods from that country were more easily smuggled than any other; that this restriction was of the last importance to the revenue, as one boat-load of India goods would pay a greater impost than a whole cargo from the West Indies; that it would be impolitic to suffer this trade to be carried on from ports favorably situated for smuggling; and that it had been found necessary to restrict British India ships to the port of London, to prevent frauds upon the revenue.

Many other observations were made, when the question on the amendment proposed by Mr. FITZSIMONS being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

The vote being then taken on the whole, it passed also in the affirmative.

The ports to be established by this clause are yet to be named.

Further progress was made in the bill, and several amendments agreed to.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, June 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, with several amendments, to which they requested the concurrence of this House.

Duties on Imports.

[JUNE, 1789.]

On motion, That Messrs. Vining, Stone, and Jackson, be added to the committee to whom was referred the subject of reporting a bill, directing the mode of registering and clearing vessels, ascertaining their tonnage, and for regulating the coasting trade, pilots, and light-houses.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House then formed itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the collection of impost duties, Mr. TOWNSEND in the Chair. Considerable progress was made in the bill; but, after some time spent thereon, they rose, and asked and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, June 13.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the collection of the duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; Mr. TOWNSEND in the Chair. The bill underwent further discussion, and the general sentiment of the committee on the subject was pretty generally ascertained. Many observations were made as to the most eligible mode of realizing the duties into the public treasury. But previous to any ultimate decision, on motion of Mr. FITZSIMONS, the committee rose, for the purpose of affording an opportunity of referring the subject to another committee, in order that a new bill might be reported. A motion to that effect was carried, and Messrs. GOODHUE, FITZSIMONS, LAWRENCE, BURKE, LIVERMORE, SHERMAN, and JACKSON, formed the committee.

Mr. GERRY proposed a resolution, making it a standing order of the House, that, in future, the House shall adjourn from Friday to Monday; and

Mr. LEONARD offered a resolution for prefixing the Constitution to the first volume of the Laws of Congress, when printed. Both resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, June 15.

JOHN BROWN, from Virginia, and THEODORE SPOWICK, from Massachusetts, appeared and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. GOODHUE, it was Ordered, That Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. PARKER, from Virginia, be added to the committee appointed on Saturday last, on the subject of collecting duties on imports.

WESTERN LANDS.

Mr. SCOTT, from the committee to consider the state of the unappropriated lands in the Western territory, reported. This report contained a very particular geographical account of that country.

the opinion of respectable commercial characters was in favor of the proposed duties, particularly the duty on spirits, which, agreeably to their ideas, could be easily collected, even if it had been set at a higher rate.

TUESDAY, June 16.

A motion was made by Mr. WHITE, of Virginia, and adopted, that seats be provided for such members of the Senate as please to attend the debates, within the bar of the House.

The House then proceeded to consider the remainder of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the impost bill. The House did not concur in the same fixed by the Senate for this act to be in force, viz: the 1st of July next; but substituted the 1st of August; when the following being read, were acceded to, viz:

To insert playing cards at a duty of ten cents per pack.

Cotton at three cents per pound.

To allow a drawback on brandy and geneva exported from the United States.

After the words "exported out of the limits of the United States," to add the following, viz: as settled by the late treaty of peace.

To strike out the sentence which provided for allowing a drawback of five cents per gallon on spirits distilled from molasses in the United States, and exported out of the same.

The discount of ten per cent. on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in vessels built in the United States, and owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, was extended to goods, &c. imported in vessels not built in the United States, but which were owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, on the 16th May last, and continued so till the time of the importation of such goods.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs; Mr. TOWNSEND in the Chair.

The first clause, after recapitulating the title of the officer and his duties, had these words: "To be removable from office by the President of the United States."

Mr. WHITE.—The Constitution gives the President the power of nominating and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointing to office. As I conceive the power of appointing and dismissing to be united in their natures, and a principle that never was called in question in any Government, I am averse to that part of the clause which subjects the Secretary of Foreign Affairs to be removed at the will of the President. In the Constitution, special provision is made for the removal of the judges; that I acknowledge to be a deviation from my principle; but as it is a Constitutional provision, it is to be admitted. In all cases not otherwise provided for in the Constitution, I take it, that the principle I have laid down is the governing one. Now the Constitution has associated the Senate with the President, in appointing the heads of departments. The Secretary of Foreign Affairs is the head of a department; for the words of the law declare, that there shall be a department established, at the head of which shall be an officer to be so denominated. If, then, the Senate are associated with the President in the appointment, they ought also to be associated in the dismissal from office. Upon the justice of this construction, I take the liberty of reviving the motion made in the Committee of the Whole, for striking out these words: "to be removable from office by the President of the United States."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—The gentleman has anticipated me in his motion; I am clearly in sentiment with him that the words ought to go out. It is in the recollection of the committee, that when the subject was last before us, this power was excepted to; and although the words were then allowed to stand, it was generally understood that it should be further debated. I then was opposed to giving this power to the President, and am still of opinion that we ought not to make this declaration, even if he has the power by the Constitution.

I would premise that one of these two ideas are just: either that the Constitution has given the President the power of removal, and therefore it is nugatory to make the declaration here; or it has not given the power to him, and therefore it is improper to make an attempt to confer it upon him. If it is not given to him by the Constitution, but belongs conjointly to the President and Senate, we have no right to deprive the Senate of their Constitutional prerogative; and it has been the opinion of sensible men that the power was lodged in this manner. A publication of no inconsiderable eminence in the class of political writings on the Constitution, has advanced this sentiment. The author, or authors, (for I have understood it to be the production of two gentlemen of great information,) of the work published under the signature of Publius, has these words:

"It has been mentioned as one of the advantages to be expected from the co-operation of the Senate in the business of appointments, that it would contribute to the stability of the Administration. The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as appoint. A change of the Chief Magistrate, therefore, would not occasion so violent or so general a revolution in the officers of the Government, as might be expected if he were the sole disposer of offices. Where a man in any station has given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him, by the apprehension that the discountenance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt, and bring some degree of discredit upon himself. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady Administration, will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body, which, from the greater permanency of its own composition, sition, will, in all probability, be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government."

Here this author lays it down, that there can be no doubt of the power of the Senate in the business of removal. Let this be as it may, I am clear that the President alone has not the power. Examine the Constitution; the powers of the several branches of Government are there defined; the President has particular powers assigned him; the Judiciary have in like manner powers assigned them; but you will find no such power as removing from office given to the President. I call upon gentlemen to show me where it is said that the President shall remove from office. I know they cannot do it. Now, I infer from this, that, as the Constitution has not given the President the power of removability, it meant that he should not have that power; and this inference is supported by that clause in the Constitution which provides that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and on conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Here is a particular mode prescribed for removing; and if there is no other mode directed, I contend that the Constitution contemplated only this mode. But let me ask gentlemen if any other mode is necessary. For what cause should a man be removed from office? Do gentlemen contend that sickness or ignorance would be a sufficient cause? I believe, if they will reflect, they cannot instance any person who was removed for ignorance. I venture to say there never was an instance of this nature in the United States. There have been instances where a person has been removed for offences. The same may again occur, and are therefore judiciously provided for in the Constitution. But in this case, is he removed for his ignorance, or his error, which is the consequence of his ignorance? I suppose it is for his error, because the public are injured by it, and not for incapacity. The President is to nominate the officer, and the Senate to approve. Here is provision made against the appointment of ignorant officers. They cannot be removed for causes which subsisted before their coming into office. Their ignorance, therefore, must arise after they are appointed. But this is an unlikely case, and one that cannot be contemplated as probable.

I imagine, sir, we are declaring a power in the President which may hereafter be greatly abused; for we are not always to expect a Chief Magistrate in whom such entire confidence can be placed as in the present. Perhaps gentlemen are so much dazzled with the splendor of the virtues of the present President, as not to be able to see into futurity. The framers of the Constitution did not confine their views to the first person who was looked up to to fill the Presidential chair. If they had, they might have omitted those checks and guards, with which the powers of the Executive are surrounded. They knew, from the course of human events, that they could not expect to be so highly favored of heaven as to have the blessing of his administration more than seven or fourteen years; after which, they supposed a man might get into power, who, it was possible, might misbehave. We ought to follow their example, and contemplate this power in the hands of an ambitious man, who might apply it to dangerous purposes. If we give this power to the President, he may, from caprice, remove the most worthy men from office. His will and pleasure will be the slight tenure by which an officer is to be held, and of consequence you render the officer the mere State-dependent, the abject slave of a person who may be disposed to abuse the confidence his fellow-citizens have placed in him.

Another danger may result. If you desire an officer to be a man of capacity and integrity, you may be disappointed. A gentleman possessed of these qualities, knowing he may be removed at the pleasure of the President, will be loth to risk his reputation on such insecure ground. As the matter stands in the Constitution, he knows, if he is suspected of doing any thing wrong, he shall have a fair trial, and the whole of his transactions be developed by an impartial tribunal. He will have confidence in himself when he knows he can only be removed for improper behaviour. But if he is subjected to the whim of any man, it may deter him from entering into the service of his country; because, if he is not subservient to that person's pleasure, he may be turned out, and the public may be led to suppose, for improper behaviour. This impression cannot be removed, as a public inquiry cannot be obtained. Besides this, it ought to be considered, that the person who is appointed will probably quit some other office or business in which he is occupied. Ought he, after making this sacrifice in order to serve the public, to be turned out of place, without even a reason being assigned for such behaviour? Perhaps the President does not do this with an ill intention; he may have been misinformed. For it is presumable that a President may have around him men envious of the honors and emoluments of persons in office, who will insinuate suspicions into his honest breast, that may produce a removal. Be this as it may, the event is still the same to the removed officer. The public suppose him guilty of malpractices. Hence his reputation is blasted, his property sacrificed. I say his property is sacrificed, because I consider his office as his property. He is stripped of this, and left exposed to the malevolence of the world, contrary to the principles of the Constitution, and contrary to the principles of all free Governments, which are, that no man shall be despoiled of his property, but by a fair and impartial trial.

These are serious considerations, and such, I trust, as will make impressions on the minds of gentlemen anxious to promote the public welfare, and secure distributive justice to themselves and their posterity.

When this subject was laid before the committee, it was said that it appeared absurd that an inferior officer should be removed only by impeachment. There is a clause in the Constitution empowering Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in courts of law, or heads of departments. These offices may also be established on such terms as the Legislature shall judge proper; but neither the appointment or removal of heads of departments can be otherwise performed than is directed by the Constitution.

To return to my argument. I have stated that if the power is given by the Constitution, the declaration in the law is nugatory; and I will add, if it is not given, it will be nugatory also to attempt to vest the power. If the Senate participate, on any principle whatever, in the removal, they will never consent to transfer their power to another branch of the Government; therefore, they will not pass a law with such a declaration in it.

Upon this consideration alone, if there was no other, the words should be struck out, and the question of right, if it is one, left to the decision of the Judiciary. It will be time enough to determine the question when the President shall remove an officer in this way. I conceive it can properly be brought before that tribunal; the officer will have a right to a mandamus to be restored to his office, and the judges would determine whether the President exercised a Constitutional authority or not.

Some gentlemen think the Constitution takes no notice of this officer, as the head of a department; they suppose him an inferior officer in aid of the Executive. This, I think, is going too far; because the Constitution, in the words authorizing the President to call on the heads of departments for their opinions in writing, contemplates several departments. It says, "the principal officer in each of the Executive departments."

I have seriously reflected on this subject, and am convinced that the President has not this power by the Constitution, and that, if we had the right to invest him with it, it would be dangerous to do so.

Mr. HUNTINGTON.—I think the clause ought not to stand. It was well observed that the Constitution was silent respecting the removal, otherwise than by impeachment. I would likewise add, that it mentions no other cause of removal, than treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. It does not, I apprehend, extend to cases of infirmity or incapacity. Indeed, it appears hard to me, that after an officer has become old in an honorable service, he should be impeached for this infirmity. The Constitution, I think must be the only rule to guide us on this occasion; as it is silent with respect to the removal, Congress ought to say nothing about it, because it implies that we have a right to bestow it, and I believe this power is not to be found among the enumerated powers delegated by the Constitution to Congress.

It was said, if the President had this authority, it would make him more responsible for the conduct of the officer. But if we have a vicious President, who inclines to abuse this power, which God forbid, his responsibility will stand us in little stead. Therefore, that idea does not satisfy me that it is proper the President should have this power.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—I wish the words to be struck out, because I conceive them to be unnecessary in this place. I do conceive, Mr. Speaker, that this officer will be the mere creature of the law; and that very little need be said to prove to you that of necessity this ought to be the case. I apprehend, likewise, that it requires but a small share of abilities to point out certain causes for which a person ought to be removed from office, without being guilty of treason, bribery, or malfeasance; and the nature of things demands that it should be so. Suppose, sir, a man becomes insane by the visitation of God, and is likely to ruin our affairs, are the hands of Government to be confined from warding off the evil? Suppose a person in office, not possessing the talents he was judged to have at the time of the appointment, is the error not to be corrected? Suppose he acquires vicious habits, an incurable indolence, or total neglect of the duties of his office, which forebode mischief to the public welfare, is there no way to arrest the threatened danger? Suppose he becomes odious and unpopular by reason of the measures which he pursues, (and this he may do without committing any positive offence against the law,) must he preserve his office in despite of the public will? Suppose him grasping at his own aggrandizement, and the elevation of his connections, by every means short of the treason defined by the Constitution, hurrying your affairs to the precipice of destruction, endangering your domestic tranquillity, plundering you of the means of defence, by alienating the affections of your allies, and promoting the spirit of discord; is there no way suddenly to seize the worthless wretch, and hurl him from the pinnacle of power? Must the tardy, tedious, desultory road, by way of impeachment, be travelled to overtake the man who, barely confining himself within the letter of the law, is employed in drawing off the vital principles of the Government? Sir, the nature of things, the great objects of society, the express objects of this Constitution, require that this thing should be otherwise.

Well, sir, this is admitted by gentlemen; but they say the Senate is to be united with the President in the exercise of this power. I hope, sir, this is not the case; because it would involve us in the most serious difficulty. Suppose a discovery of any of those events which I have just enumerated were to take place when the Senate is not in session, how is the remedy to be applied? This is a serious consideration, and the evil could be avoided no other way than by the Senate's sitting always. Surely no gentleman of this House contemplates the necessity of incurring such an expense. I am sure it will be very objectionable to our constituents; and yet this must be done, or the public interest be endangered by keeping an unworthy officer in place until that body shall be assembled from the extremes of the Union.

It has been said that there is danger of this power being abused, if exercised by one man. Certainly the danger is as great with respect to the Senate, who are assembled from various parts of the continent, with different impressions and opinions. It appears to me that such a body is more likely to misuse this power than the man whom the united voice of America calls to the Presidential chair. As the nature of the Government requires the power of removal, I think it to be exercised in this way by a hand capable of exerting itself with effect, and the power must be conferred upon the President by the Constitution, as the executive officer of the Government.

I believe some difficulty will result from determining this question by a mandamus. A mandamus is used to replace an officer who has been removed contrary to law; now, this officer being the creature of the law, we may declare that he shall be removed for incapacity, and, if so declared, the removal will be according to law.

Mr. MADISON.—If the construction of the Constitution is to be left to its natural course, with respect to the Executive powers of this Government, I own that the insertion of this sentiment in law may not be of material importance, though, if it is nothing more than a mere declaration of a clear grant made by the Constitution, it can do no harm; but if it relates to a doubtful part of the Constitution, I suppose an exposition of the Constitution may come with as much propriety from the Legislature, as any other department of the Government. If the power naturally belongs to the Government, and the Constitution is undecided as to the body which is to exercise it, it is likely that it is submitted to the discretion of the Legislature, and the question will depend upon its own merits.

I am clearly of opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that we ought in this, and every other case, to adhere to the Constitution, so far as it will serve as a guide to us, and that we ought not to be swayed in our decisions by the splendor of the character of the present Chief Magistrate, but to consider it with respect to the merit of men who, in the ordinary course of things, may be supposed to fill the Chair. I believe the power here declared is a high one, and, in some respects, a dangerous one; but, in order to come to a right decision on this point, we must consider both sides of the question; the possible abuses which may spring from the single will of the First Magistrate, and the abuse which may spring from the combined will of the Executive and Senatorial disqualification.

When we consider that the First Magistrate is to be appointed at present by the suffrages of three millions of people, and, in all human probability, in a few years' time by double that number, it is not to be presumed that a vicious or bad character will be selected. If the Government of any country on the face of the earth was ever effectually guarded against the election of ambitious or designing characters to the first office of the State, I think it may with truth be said to be the case under the Constitution of the United States. With all the infirmities incident to a popular election, corrected by the particular mode of conducting it, as directed under the present system, I think we may fairly calculate that the instances will be very rare in which an unworthy man will receive that mark of the public confidence which is required to designate the President of the United States. Where the people are disposed to give so great an elevation to one of their fellow-citizens, I own that I am not afraid to place my confidence in him, especially when I know he is impeachable for any crime or misdemeanor before the Senate, at all times; and that, at all events, he is impeachable before the community at large every four years, and liable to be displaced if his conduct shall have given umbrage during the time he has been in office. Under these circumstances, although the trust is a high one, and in some degree, perhaps, a dangerous one, I am not sure but it will be safer here than placed where some gentlemen suppose it ought to be.

It is evidently the intention of the Constitution, that the first Magistrate should be responsible for the Executive department; so far therefore as we do not make the officers who are to aid him in the duties of that department responsible to him, he is not responsible to his country. Again, is there no danger that an officer, when he is appointed by the concurrence of the Senate, and has friends in that body, may choose rather to risk his establishment on the favor of that branch, than rest it upon the discharge of his duties to the satisfaction of the Executive branch, which is constitutionally authorized to inspect and control his conduct? And if it should happen that the officers connect themselves with the Senate, they may mutually support each other, and for want of efficacy reduce the power of the President to a mere vapor; in which case, his responsibility would be annihilated, and the expectation of it unjust. The high Executive officers, joined in cabal with the Senate, would lay the foundation of discord, and end in an assumption of the Executive power; only to be removed by a revolution in the Government. I believe no principle is more clearly laid down in the Constitution than that of responsibility. After premising this, I will proceed to an investigation of the merits of the question upon Constitutional ground.

I have, since the subject was last before the House, examined the Constitution with attention, and I acknowledge that it does not perfectly correspond with the ideas I entertained of it from the first glance. I am inclined to think, that a free and systematic interpretation of the plan of Government will leave us less at liberty to abate the responsibility than gentlemen imagine. I have already acknowledged that the powers of the Government must remain as apportioned by the Constitution. But it may be contended, that where the Constitution is silent, it becomes a subject of legislative discretion; perhaps, in the opinion of some, an argument in favor of the clause may be successfully brought forward on this ground: I, however, leave it for the present untouched.

By a strict examination of the Constitution, on what appears to be its true principles, and considering the great departments of the Government in the relation they have to each other, I have my doubts whether we are not absolutely tied down to the construction declared in the bill. In the first section of the first article, it is said, that all Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States. In the second article, it is affirmed that the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. In the third article, it is declared that the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. I suppose it will be readily admitted, that so far as the Constitution has separated the powers of these great departments, it would be improper to combine them together; and so far as it has left any particular department in the entire possession of the powers incident to that department, I conceive we ought not to qualify them further than they are qualified by the Constitution. The Legislative powers are vested in Congress, and are to be exercised by them uncontrolled by any other department, except the Constitution has qualified it otherwise. The Constitution has qualified the Legislative power, by authorizing the President to object to any act it may pass, requiring, in this case, two-thirds of both Houses to concur in making a law; but still the absolute Legislative power is vested in the Congress with this qualification alone.

The Constitution affirms, that the Executive power shall be vested in the President. Are there exceptions to this proposition? Yes, there are. The Constitution says, that in appointing to office, the Senate shall be associated with the President, unless in the case of inferior officers, when the law shall otherwise direct. Have we a right to extend this exception? I believe not. If the Constitution has invested all Executive power in the President, I venture to assert that the Legislature has no right to diminish or modify his Executive authority.

The question now resolves itself into this, Is the power of displacing, an Executive power? I conceive that if any power whatsoever is in its nature Executive, it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws. If the Constitution had not qualified the power of the President in appointing to office, by associating the Senate with him in that business, would it not be clear that he would have the right, by virtue of his Executive power, to make such appointment? Should we be authorized, in defiance of that clause in the Constitution,—“The Executive power shall be vested in a President,” to unite the Senate with the President in a President, I think it may be disputed whether we have a right to associate them in removing persons from office, the one power being as much of an Executive nature as the other; and the first only is authorized by being excepted out of the general rule established by the Constitution, in these words, “the Executive power shall be vested in the President.”

The Judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court; but will gentlemen say the judicial power can be placed elsewhere, unless the Constitution has made an exception? The Constitution justifies the Senate in exercising a judiciary power in determining on impeachments; but can the judicial power be further blended with the powers of that body? They cannot. I therefore say it is incontrovertible, if neither the Legislative nor Judicial powers are subjected to qualifications, other than those demanded in the Constitution, that the Executive powers are equally unabateable as either of the others; and inasmuch as the power of removal is of an Executive nature, and not affected by any Constitutional exception, it is beyond the reach of the Legislative body.

If this is the true construction of this instrument, the clause in the bill is nothing more than explanatory of the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore not liable to any particular objection on that account. If the Constitution is silent, and it is a power the Legislature have a right to confer, it will appear to the world, if we strike out the clause, as if we doubted the propriety of vesting it in the President of the United States. I therefore think it best to retain it in the bill.

Mr. VINING.—I hoped, Mr. Chairman, after the discussion this subject had received on a former occasion, that it would have been unnecessary to re-examine it. The arguments against the clause are reiterated; but, I trust, without a chance of success. They were fully answered before; and I expect the impressions made at that time are not already effaced. The House, as well as the Committee of the Whole, have determined that those words shall be inserted in the bill; the special committee could therefore do no less than place them where they are; a deference is due to the decision of the House.

The House has determined to make a declaration of their construction on the Constitution. I am perfectly in sentiment with the majority on this occasion; and contend, that if this power is not in the President, it is not vested in any body whatever. It cannot be within the Legislative power of the Senate, because it is of an adverse nature; it cannot be within the Executive power of the Senate, because they possess none but what is expressly granted by the Constitution. If gentlemen will point out where the Constitution confers this power upon the Senate, I will read my recantation, and subscribe to the justness of their doctrine.

I am not satisfied that removability shall be acquired only by impeachment. Were the advocates of this doctrine aware of its consequences, when they advanced it? The Senate has the sole power of trying impeachments; the President is here out of the question. If no officer can be Constitutionally removed but by impeachment, it applies to subordinate officers as well as heads of departments. For the Constitution only gives power to Congress to establish officers by law, and vests the appointment in the President. If these officers are not removable but by impeachment, what is to become of our affairs, when any of the accidents occur which were enumerated by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SEDGWICK?) Are we to take the circuitous route of impeachment? The dilatory and inefficient process by that mode, will not apply the remedy to the evil till it is too late to be of advantage. Experience has fixed an eternal stigma upon the system of impeachment; witness the case I mentioned, the other day, of Warren Hastings before the British Lords; what delays and uncertainty with the forms of trial, details of evidence, arguments of counsel, and deliberate decision! I ask gentlemen, can there be a greater evil than this in any Government? Why, then, will gentlemen advocate a doctrine so obnoxious to the principles of the Constitution, when a more favorable construction is at hand?

As to the principle of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WHITE,) that he who appoints must remove; it may be a good one, but it is not a general one. Under this Government, officers appointed by the people are removed by the representatives of the State Legislatures. I take it that the best principle is, that he who is responsible for the conduct of the officer, ought to have the power of removing him; by adhering to this principle, we shall be led to make a right decision on the point in debate. Perhaps it might be equally right that the responsible person should have the appointment of those who are to aid him. But this case is qualified by an express stipulation in the Constitution; and, therefore, must be submitted to. Yet, nevertheless, the responsibility is kept up: the President takes the lead in the business; he nominates, wherefore he becomes answerable for the officer. But whose officer is he? Not the Senate's; for they have no Executive business to perform. The executive duties are all vested in the President. Then the President exercises the duties of foreign affairs. He is answerable for his conduct—to whom? To be sure, to the Senate. But he does not appoint the officer; he first selects, without advice of the Senate; he cannot appoint. This is a check to an improper choice; but does not destroy the responsibility of the President, if he nominates a vicious or improper character.

It may be contended, on the gentleman's principles, that the President shall have the power of removal; because it is he who appoints. The Constitution says, he shall nominate, and, under certain qualifications, appoint. The Senate do not appoint; their judgment only is required to acquiesce in the President's nomination. Where, then, is the natural responsibility placed? Because, where that is, ought to be the power of removal. The Constitution contemplates no other principle. If we were to insert a contrary one, the Government must go to destruction.

Mr. WHITE.—Mention has been made of impeachment, as the only mode of removing an officer. I will explain my ideas on this point, in order that the committee may be masters of my particular objections to the clause. I consider impeachments necessary to be employed in cases respecting an officer who is appointed during good behaviour. Thus the judges can only be removed by impeachment. The President and Vice President hold their offices for the terms mentioned in the Constitution, not liable to be removed from office in any other way. These circumstances are a deviation from my general principle; but have nevertheless a proper ground to be supported on. The electors who appoint the President, cannot assemble to exercise the authority which would naturally be in them. With respect to the judges, it is found necessary for the proper and uncorrupt administration of justice, and the security of freedom, to have them independent in their stations, so that they be not removable at pleasure. To them, therefore, the doctrine of impeachment is peculiarly applicable. It may properly be extended further, in cases where the President is desirous of retaining an officer who ought not to be retained. This House has the power of controlling him, and may impeach the officer before the Senate. In either of these three cases impeachments are necessary.

I have no doubt in my mind, but an officer can be removed without a public trial. I think there are cases in which it would be improper that his misdeeds should be publicly known. The tranquillity and harmony of the Union might be endangered, if his guilt was not secreted from the world. I have therefore no hesitation in declaring as my sentiment, that the President and Senate may dismiss him.

The Constitution contemplates a removal in some other way besides that by impeachment; or why is it declared in favor of the judges only, that they shall hold their offices during good behaviour? Does not this strongly imply, that, without such an exception, there would have been a discretionary power in some branch of the Government to dismiss even them?

My colleague (Mr. MADISON) has acknowledged the clause to be unnecessary, if the Constitution is allowed its free operation. Now it is my wish that it should have such an operation, and not be wrested by a declaration in a law contrary to what I take to be the true construction. If we are silent on this point, it will probably be allowed a fair interpretation when the power is required to be exercised; but if it could not be adjusted easily in that place, I would rather the Judiciary should decide the point, because it is more properly within their department.

I differ also with my colleague in the principle that he has laid down, that this is in its nature an Executive power. The Constitution supposes power incident to Government, and arranges it into distinct branches, with or without checks; but it enumerates under each Department the powers it may exercise. The Legislature may exert its authority in passing laws relating to any of its particular powers. The Executive power is vested in the President; but the Executive powers so vested, are those enumerated in the Constitution. He may nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint all officers, because the Constitution gives this power, and not because the power is in its nature a power incident to his department. My ideas of the Legislative and Executive powers are precisely the same. The Legislature may do certain acts because the Constitution says they shall have power to do them, and the Executive Magistrate is authorized to exercise powers because they are vested in him by the same instrument. It has given him the power of appointment under certain qualifications; the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment, and both equally dependent upon the arrangement made in the Constitution; consequently, a dismissal from office must be brought about by the same modification as the appointment.

Several objections have arisen from the inconvenience with which the power must be exercised, if the Senate is blended with the Executive; and therefore it is inferred that the President ought exclusively to have this power. If we were framing a Constitution, these arguments would have their proper weight, and I might approve such an arrangement. But at present, I do not consider we are at liberty to do that. The Constitution is already formed, and we can go no further in distributing the powers than the Constitution warrants.

It was objected that the President could not remove an officer unless the Senate was in session; but yet the emergency of the case might demand an instant dismissal. I should imagine that no inconvenience would result on this account; because, on my principle, the same power which can make a temporary appointment, can make an equal suspension; the powers are apposite to each other.

The gentleman says, we ought not to blend the Executive and Legislative powers further than they are blended in the Constitution. I contend we do not. There is no expression in the Constitution which says that the President shall have the power of removal from office; but the contrary is strongly implied; for it is said, that Congress may establish officers by law, and vest the appointment, and consequently the removal, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or heads of Departments. Now, this shows that Congress are not at liberty to make any alteration by law in the mode of appointing superior officers; and, consequently, that they are not at liberty to alter the manner of removal.

Let us, then, leave the constitution to a free operation, and let the President, with or without the Senate, carry it into execution. Then, if any one supposes himself injured by their determination, let him have recourse to the law, and its decision will establish the true construction of the Constitution.

Mr. BOURNOR.—This is a question, Mr. Speaker, that requires full consideration, and ought only to be settled on the most candid discussion. It certainly involves the right of the Senate to a very important power. At present, I am so impressed with the importance of the subject, that I dare not absolutely decide on any principle, although I am firmly persuaded we ought to retain the clause in the bill; and, so far as it has been examined, I agree that it is a Legislative construction of the Constitution necessary to be settled for the direction of your officers. But if it is a deviation from the Constitution, or in the least degree an infringement upon the authority of the other branch of the Legislature, I shall most decidedly be against it. But I think it will appear, on a full consideration of this business, that we can do no otherwise than agree to this construction, in order to preserve to each Department the full exercise of its powers, and to give this House security for the proper conduct of the officers who are to execute the laws.

The arguments adduced, are to show that the power of removal lies either in the President and Senate, or the President alone, except in the cases of removal by impeachment. There is nothing, I take it, in the Constitution, or the reason of the thing, that officers should be only removable by impeachment. Such a provision would be derogatory to the powers of Government, and subversive of the rights of the people. What says the Constitution on the point? (I fear, sir, it has not been rightly comprehended.) That the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment; that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; and judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold it in future. Then comes the clause declaring absolutely that he shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and on conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors. It is this clause which guards the rights of the House, and enables them to pull down an improper officer, although he should be supported by all the power of the Executive. This, then, is a necessary security to the people, and one that is wisely provided in the Constitution. But I believe it is nowhere said that officers shall never be removed but by impeachment; but it says they shall be removed on impeachment. Suppose the Secretary of Foreign Affairs shall misbehave, and we impeach him; notwithstanding the clearest proof of guilt, the Senate might only impose some trifling punishment, and retain him in office, if it were not for this declaration in the Constitution. Neither this clause, nor any other, goes so far as to say it shall be the only mode of removal; therefore we may proceed to inquire what the other is. Let us examine whether it belongs to the Senate and President. Certainly, sir, there is nothing that gives the Senate this right in express terms: but they are authorized, in express words to be concerned in the appointment. And does this necessarily include the power of removal? If the President complains to the Senate of the misconduct of an officer, and desires their advice and consent to the removal, what are the Senate to do? Most certainly they will inquire if the complaint is well founded. To do this, they must call the officer before them to answer. Who, then, are the parties? The supreme Executive officer against his assistant; and the Senate are to sit as judges to determine whether sufficient cause of removal exists. Does not this set the Senate over the head of the President?

H. or R.]

Department of Foreign Affairs.

[JUNE, 1789.]

But suppose they shall decide in favor of the officer, what a situation is the President then in, surrounded by officers with whom, by his situation, he is compelled to act, but in whom he can have no confidence, reversing the privilege given him by the Constitution, to prevent his having officers imposed upon him who do not meet his approbation?

But I have another more solid objection, which places the question in a more important point of view. The Constitution has placed the Senate as the only security and barrier between the House of Representatives and the President. Suppose the President has desired the Senate to concur in removing an officer, and they have declined; or suppose the House has applied to the President and Senate to remove an officer obnoxious to them, and they determine against the measure, the House can have recourse to nothing but an impeachment, if they suppose the criminality of the officer will warrant such a procedure. Will the Senate then be that upright court which they ought to appeal to on this occasion, when they have prejudged your cause? I conceive the Senate will be too much under the control of their former decision, to be a proper body for this House to apply to for impartial justice.

As the Senate are the dernier resort, and the only court of judicature which can determine on cases of impeachment, I am for preserving them free and independent, both on account of the officer and this House. I therefore conceive that it was never the intention of the Constitution to vest the power of removal in the President and Senate; but, as it must exist somewhere, it rests on the President alone. I conceive this point was made fully to appear by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON,) inasmuch as the President is the supreme Executive officer of the United States.

If the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina is true, then it follows, that every officer has perpetuity in office, at least during good behavior. If this is to be the case, there was no necessity for declaring in the Constitution that the judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. This would be destroying the responsibility of the President, and establishing such a principle in the Government as would be extremely dangerous.

It was asked, if ever we knew a person removed from office by reason of sickness or ignorance. If there never was such a case, it is, perhaps, nevertheless proper that they should be removed for those reasons; and we shall do well to establish the principle.

Suppose your Secretary of Foreign Affairs rendered incapable of thought or action by a paralytic stroke: I ask whether there would be any propriety in keeping such a person in office, and whether the salus populi, the first object of republican Governments, does not absolutely demand his dismissal. Can it be expected that the President is responsible for an officer under these circumstances, although when he went into office he might have been a wise and virtuous man, and the President well inclined to risk his own reputation upon the integrity and abilities of the person?

I conceive it will be improper to leave the determination of this question to the judges. There will be some indelicacy in subjecting the Executive action in this particular to a suit at law; and there may be much inconvenience if the President does not exercise this prerogative until it is decided by the courts of justice.

From these considerations, the safety of the people, the security of this House, and the adherence to the spirit of the Constitution, I am disposed to think the clause proper; and as some doubts respecting the construction of the Constitution have arisen, I think it also necessary. Therefore, I hope it will remain.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—I have attended to the arguments of the gentlemen who oppose the motion for striking out, and I apprehend that their reasoning is not perfectly consistent. The construction of some gentlemen is, that the power of removal is given to the President by the Constitution. Others are of opinion that the Constitution is silent; and therefore the House ought to give it. To oppose these adverse arguments, I must return to my strong ground on which my opponents dare not venture. I state again, that if the Constitution has given the power, it is unnecessary to give it here; or if it has not given it, we have no right to confer it, because it is not within the enumerated powers delegated to Congress.

Gentlemen have said that it is proper to give a legislative construction of the Constitution. I differ with them on this point. I think it an infringement of the powers of the judiciary. It is said, we ought not to blend the legislative, executive, or judiciary powers, further than is done by the Constitution; and yet the advocates for preserving each department pure and untouched by the others, call upon this House to exercise the powers of the judges in expounding the Constitution. What authority has this House to explain the law? But if it has this privilege, the Senate is also invested with it as part of the Legislature; and, in exercising it on the present question, we shall be likely to differ. If the Constitution is silent, and gentlemen admit this, it is possible the Senate may view it with a favorable eye to their own right, and reject the bill on account of this clause. A great deal of mischief has arisen in the several States, by the Legislatures undertaking to decide Constitutional questions. Sir, it is the duty of the Legislature to make laws; your judges are to expound them.

It has been said, that cases of impeachment do not extend to officers who are indolent or delirious. I said before, that if a person become indolent, he will neglect his duty, and for that cause I presume he may be impeached. Gentlemen have found out that impeachment is a tedious process; I apprehend the person who is impeached will not think it a dilatory process, but such a one as is wisely inserted in the Constitution for the protection of his person and property. The delay of which gentlemen complain is the greatest bulwark of liberty. Our ancestors, who were tenacious of their privileges, guarded them in the best manner they could devise to prevent the inroads of despotism. As well may gentlemen complain of the tedious process in other criminal cases, by indictment of a grand jury and trial by a petit jury. I hope it is not contemplated (if it is, I hope never to see adopted in this country a summary process) to hurry on judgment without reflection. Such doctrine may suit the meridian of Turkey, where a Cadi can give the order and the bowstring at the same moment.

If the Constitution does not extend to insanity, or disability by reason of sickness, then let the law declare him removed until his recovery. But gentlemen's arguments go to prove that the Constitution authorizes the removal for this reason. Why, the same argument would apply to the President and Vice President, if they were to become delirious; yet I think they could not Constitutionally be removed for such a cause.

The Constitution declares that an officer shall be removed by impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors; yet the doctrine of gentlemen will enable the President, or the President with the advice of the Senate, to inflict the punishment without trial, when the Constitution requires it to be done on impeachment and conviction. This appears to me so inconsistent, that I can by no means be reconciled to it. If this be wrong in the Constitution, it may be proper to amend it in that particular; and when the subject of amendments is taken up, let Congress recommend it with the other improvements to that system. But we cannot now proceed on this idea. For my part, I think, under the Constitution as it now stands, we have no other way to remove an officer than by impeachment.

The gentleman from Virginia has said, that the power of removal is Executive in its nature. I do not believe this to be the case. I have turned over the Constitutions of most of the States, and I do not find that any of them have granted this power to the Governor. In some instances, I find the Executive Magistrate suspends, but none of them have the right to remove officers; and I take it that the Constitution of the United States has distributed the powers of Government on the same principles which most of the State Constitutions have adopted. For it will not be contended that the State Governments did not furnish the members of the late convention with the skeleton of this Constitution.

The gentlemen have observed, that it would be dangerous if the President had not this power. But is there not danger in making your Secretary of Foreign Affairs dependent upon the will and pleasure of the President? Can gentlemen see the danger on one side only? Suppose the President adverse to a just and honorable war which Congress have embarked in, can he not countenance the Secretary of War (for it is in contemplation to establish such an officer) in the waste of public stores, and misapplication of the supplies? Nay, cannot he dragoon your officer into a compliance with his designs, by threatening him with a removal by which his reputation and property would be destroyed? If the officer were established on a better tenure, he would dare to be honest; he would know himself invulnerable in his integrity, and defy the shafts of malevolence, though aimed with Machiavelian policy. He would be a barrier to your Executive officer, and save the State from ruin.

But, Mr. Chairman, the argument does not turn upon the expediency of the measure. The great question is with respect to its constitutionality. And as yet I have heard no argument advanced sufficiently cogent to prove to my mind that the Constitution warrants such a disposition of the power of removal; and until I am convinced that it is both expedient and constitutional, I cannot agree to it.

Mr. GERRY.—Some gentlemen consider this as a question of policy; but to me it appears a question of constitutionality, and I presume it will be determined on that point alone. The best arguments I have heard urged on this occasion came from the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON.) He says the Constitution has vested the Executive power in the President; and that he has a right to exercise it under the qualifications therein made. He lays it down as a maxim, that the Constitution vesting in the President the Executive power, naturally vests him with the power of appointment and removal. Now I would be glad to know from that gentleman by what means we are to decide this question. Is his maxim supported by precedent drawn from the practice of the individual States? The direct contrary is established. In many cases the Executives are not in particular vested with the power of appointment; and do they exercise that power by virtue of their office? It will be found that other branches of the Government make appointments. How then can gentlemen assert that the powers of appointment and removal are incident to the Executive Department of Government? To me it appears at best but problematical. Neither is it clear to me that the power that appoints naturally possesses the power of removal. As we have no certainty on either of these points, I think we must consider it as established by the Constitution.

It has been argued, that if the power of removal vests in the President alone, it annuls or renders nugatory the clause in the Constitution which directs the concurrence of the Senate in the case of appointments; it behooves us not to adopt principles subversive of those established by the Constitution. It has been frequently asserted on former occasions, that the Senate is a permanent body, and was so constructed in order to give durability to public measures. If they are not absolutely permanent, they are formed on a renovating principle, which gives them a salutary stability. This is not the case either with the President or House of Representatives; nor is the Judiciary equally lasting, because the officers are subject to natural dissolution. It appears to me that a permanency was expected in the Magistracy; and therefore the Senate were combined in the appointment to office. But if the President alone has the power of removal, it is in his power at any time to destroy all that has been done. It appears to me that such a principle would be destructive of the intention of the Constitution expressed by giving the power of appointment to the Senate. It also subverts the clause which gives the Senate the sole power of trying impeachments, because the President may remove the officer in order to screen him from the effects of their judgment on an impeachment. Why should we construe any part of the Constitution in such a manner as to destroy its essential principles, when a more consonant construction can be obtained?

It appears very clear to me, that however this power may be distributed by the Constitution, the House of Representatives have nothing to do with it. Why then should we interfere in the business? Are we afraid that the President and Senate are not sufficiently informed to know their respective duties? Our interposition argues that they want judgment, and are not able to adjust their powers without the wisdom of this House to assist them; to say the least on this point, it must be deemed indelicate for us to intermeddle with them. If the fact is, as we seem to suspect, that they do not understand the Constitution, let it go before the proper tribunal; the judges are the Constitutional umpires on such questions. Why, let me ask gentlemen, shall we commit an infraction of the Constitution for fear the Senate or President should not comply with its directions? It has been said by my colleague, that these officers are the creatures of the law; but it seems as if we were not content with that; we are making them the mere creatures of the President. They dare not exercise the privilege of their creation, if the President shall order them to forbear; because he holds their thread of life, his power will be sovereign over them, and will soon swallow up the small security we have in the Senate's concurrence to the appointment, and we shall shortly need no other than the authority of the Supreme Executive officer to nominate, appoint, continue, or remove.

Mr. Ames.—When this question was agitated at a former period, I took no part in the debate. I believe it was then proposed, without any idea or intention of drawing on a lengthy discussion, and to me it appeared to be well understood, and settled by the House; but since it has been reiterated and contested again, I feel it my bounden duty to deliver the reasons for voting in the manner I then did, and shall now do. Mr. Chairman, I look upon every question which touches the Constitution as serious and important, and therefore worthy of the fullest discussion, and the most solemn decision. I believe, on the present occasion, we may come to something near certainty, by attending to the leading principles of the Constitution. In order that the good purposes of a Federal Government should be answered, it was necessary to delegate considerable powers; and the principle upon which the grant was made, intended to give sufficient power to do all possible good, but to restrain the rulers from doing mischief.

The Constitution places all Executive power in the hands of the President, and could he personally execute all the laws, there would be no occasion for establishing auxiliaries; but the circumscribed powers of human nature in one man, demand the aid of others. When the objects are widely stretched out, or greatly diversified, meaning through such an extent of territory as that the United States possess, a minister cannot see with his own eyes every transaction, or feel with his hands the minutiae that pass through his department. He must therefore have assistants. But in order that he may be responsible to his country, he must have a choice in selecting his assistants, a control over them, with power to remove them when he finds the qualifications which induced their appointment cease to exist. There are officers under the Constitution who hold their office by a different tenure; and from are appointed during good behaviour; your judges are the delicacy and peculiar nature of their trust, it is right it should be so, in order that they may be independent and impartial in administering justice between the Government and its citizens. But the removability of the one class, or immovability of the other, is founded on the same principle, the security of the people against the abuse of power. Does any gentleman imagine that an officer is entitled to his office as to an estate? Or does the Legislature establish them for the convenience of an individual? For my part, I conceive it intended to carry into effect the purposes for which the Constitution was intended.

The Executive powers are delegated to the President, with a view to have a responsible officer to superintend, control, inspect, and check the officers necessarily employed in administering the laws. The only bond between him and those he employs, is the confidence he has in their integrity and talents; when that confidence ceases, the principal ought to have power to remove those whom he can no longer trust with safety. If an officer shall be guilty of neglect or infidelity, there can be no doubt but he ought to be removed; yet there may be numerous causes for removal which do not amount to a crime. He may propose to do a mischief; but I believe the mere intention would not be cause of impeachment. He may lose the confidence of the people upon suspicion, in which case it would be improper to retain him in service; he ought to be removed at any time, when, instead of doing the greatest possible good, he is likely to do an injury to the public interest by being continued in the administration.

I presume gentlemen will generally admit that officers ought to be removed when they become obnoxious; but the question is, how shall this power be exercised? It will not, I apprehend, be contended, that all officers hold their offices during good behaviour. If this be the case, it is a most singular government, I believe there is not another in the universe that bears the least semblance to it in this particular; such a principle, I take it, is contrary to the nature of things. But the manner how to remove is the question. If the officer misbehaves, he can be removed by impeachment; but in this case is impeachment the only mode of removal? It would be found very inconvenient to have a man continued in office after being impeached, and when all confidence in him was suspended or lost. Would not the end of impeachment be defeated by this means? If Mr. Hastings, who was mentioned by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. VINING,) preserved his command in India, could he not defeat the impeachment now pending in Great Britain? If that doctrine obtains in America, we shall find impeachments come too late; while we are preparing the process, the mischief will be perpetrated, and the offender will escape. I apprehend it will be as frequently necessary to prevent crimes as to punish them; and it may often happen that the only prevention is by removal. The superintendent power possessed by the President will, perhaps, enable him to discover a base intention before it is ripe for execution. It may happen that the Treasurer may be disposed to betray the public chest to the enemy, and so injure the Government beyond the possibility of reparation; should the President be restrained from removing so dangerous an officer, until the slow formality of an impeachment was completed with, when the nature of the case rendered the application of a sudden and decisive remedy indispensable?

But it will, I say, be admitted, that an officer may be removed. The question then is, by whom? Some gentlemen say by the President alone; and others, by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate. By the advocates of the latter mode, it is alleged, that the Constitution is in the way of the power of removal being by the President alone. If this is absolutely the case, there is an end to all further inquiry. But before we suffer this to be considered as an insuperable impediment, we ought to be clear that the Constitution prohibits him the exercise of what, on a first view, appears to be a power incident to the Executive branch of the Government. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MADISON) has made so many observations to evince the constitutionality of the clause, that it is unnecessary to go over the ground again. I shall therefore confine myself to answer only some remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH.) The powers of the President are defined in the Constitution; but it is said that he is not expressly authorized to remove from office. If the Constitution is silent also with respect to the Senate, the argument may be retorted. If this silence proves that the power cannot be exercised by the President, it certainly proves that it cannot be exercised by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The power of removal is incident to Government; but, not being distributed by the Constitution, it will come before the Legislature, and, like every other omitted case, must be supplied by law.

Gentlemen have said, when the question was formerly before us, that all powers not intended to be given up to the General Government were retained. I beg gentlemen, when they undertake to argue from implication, to be consistent, and admit the force of other arguments drawn from the same source. It is a leading principle in every free Government, it is a prominent feature in this, that the Legislative and Executive powers should be kept distinct; yet the attempt to blend the Executive and Legislative departments in exercising the power of removal, is such a mixing as ought not to be carried into practice on arguments grounded on implication. And the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WARREN's) reasoning is wholly drawn from implication. He supposes, as the Constitution qualifies the President's power of appointing to office, by subjecting his nomination to the concurrence of the Senate, that the qualification follows of course in the removal.

If this is to be considered as a question decided by the Constitution, and submitted on the footing of expediency, it will be well to consider where the power can be most usefully deposited for the security and benefit of the people. It has been said, by the gentleman on the other side of the House, (Mr. SMITH,) that there is an impriety in allowing the exercise of this power; that it is a dangerous authority, and much evil may result to the liberty and property of the officer, who may be turned out of business without a moment's warning. I take it, the question is not whether such power shall be given or retained; because it is admitted on all hands, that the officer may be removed; so that it is no grant of power; it raises no new danger. If we strike out the clause, we do not keep the power, nor prevent the exercise of it; so that the gentleman will derive none of the security he contemplates by agreeing to the motion for striking out. It will be found that the nature of the business requires it to be conducted by the head of the Executive; and I believe it will be found even there that more injury will arise from not removing improper officers than from displacing good ones. I believe experience has convinced us that it is an irksome business; and officers are more frequently continued in place after they become unfit to perform their duties, than turned out while their talents and integrity are useful. But advantages may result from keeping the power of removal in terrorem over the heads of the officers; they will be stimulated to do their duty to the satisfaction of the principal, who is to be responsible for the whole Executive department.

The gentleman has supposed there will be great difficulties in getting officers of abilities to engage in the service of their country upon such terms. There has never yet been any scarcity of proper officers in any department of the Government of the United States; even during the war, when men risked their lives and property by engaging in such service, there were candidates enough. But why should we connect the Senate in the removal? Their attention is taken up with other important business, and they have no constitutional authority to watch the conduct of the Executive officers, and therefore cannot use such authority with advantage. If the President is inclined to shelter himself behind the Senate, with respect to having continued an improper person in office, we lose the responsibility, which is our greatest security; the blame among so many will be lost. Another reason occurs to me against blending these powers. An officer who superintends the public revenue will naturally acquire a great influence. If he obtains support in the Senate, upon an attempt of the President to remove him, it will be out of the power of the House, when applied to by the First Magistrate, to impeach him with success; for the very means of proving charges of mal-conduct against him will be under the power of the officer; all the papers necessary to convict him may be withheld while the person continues in his office. Protection may be rendered for promotion, and as this officer has such extensive influence, it may be exerted to procure the reelection of his friends. These circumstances, in addition to those stated by the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. BOURNICKOT,) must clearly evince to every gentleman the impropriety of connecting the Senate with the President in removing from office.

I do not say these things will take effect now, and if the question only related to what might take place in a few years, I should not be uneasy on this point, because I am sensible the gentlemen who form the present Senate are above corruption; but in future ages, (and I hope this Government may be perpetuated to the end of time,) such things may take place, and it is our duty to provide against evils which may be foreseen, but, if now neglected, will be irremediable.

I beg leave to observe further, that there are three opinions entertained by gentlemen on this subject. One is, that the power of removal is prohibited by the Constitution; the next is, that it requires it by the President; and the other is, that the Constitution is totally silent. It therefore appears to me proper for the House to declare what is their sense of the Constitution. If we declare justly on this point, it will serve for a rule of conduct to the Executive Magistrate: if we declare improperly, the judiciary will revise our decision; so that at all events, I think we ought to make the declaration.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I am for striking out this clause, Mr. Chairman, upon the principles of the Constitution, from which we are not at liberty to deviate. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SENEWICK,) calls the Minister of Foreign Affairs the creature of the law, and that very properly; because the law establishes the office, and has the power of creating him in what shape the Legislature pleases. This being the case, we have a right to create the office under such limitations and restrictions as we think proper, provided we can obtain the consent of the Senate; but it is very improper to draw as a conclusion, from having the power of giving birth to a creature, that we should therefore bring forth a monster, merely to show that we had such power. I call that creature a monster that has not the proper limbs and features of its species. I think the creature we are forming is unnatural in its proportions. It has been often said, that the Constitution declares the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint this officer. This, to be sure, is very true, and so is the conclusion which an honorable gentleman (Mr. WHITTE) from Virginia drew from it, that an officer must be discharged in the way he was appointed.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, this question depends upon a just construction of a short clause in the Constitution. "The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States." Here is no difference with respect to the power of the President to make treaties and appoint officers, only it requires in the one case a larger majority to concur than in the other. I will not by any means suppose that gentlemen mean, when they argue in favor of removal by the President alone, to contemplate the extension of the power to the repeal of treaties; because, if they do, there will be little occasion for us to sit here. But let me ask these gentlemen, as there is no real or imaginary distinction between the appointment of ambassadors and ministers, or Secretaries of Foreign Affairs, whether they mean that the President should have the power of recalling or discarding ambassadors and military officers, for the words in the Constitution are "all other officers," as well as he can remove your Secretary of Foreign Affairs. To be sure they cannot extend it to the judges, because they are secured under a subsequent article, which declares they shall hold their offices during good behaviour; they have an inheritance which they cannot be divested of, but on conviction of some crime. But I presume gentlemen mean to apply it to all those who have not an inheritance in their offices. In this case, it takes the whole power of the President and Senate to create an officer, but half the power can uncreate him. Surely a law passed by the whole Legislature cannot be repealed by one branch of it; so I conceive, in the case of appointments it requires the same force to supersede an officer as to put him in office.

I acknowledge that the clause relative to impeachment is for the benefit of the people; it is intended to enable their representatives to bring a bad officer to justice who is screened by the President; but I do not conceive, with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that it by any means excludes the usual ways of superseding officers. It is said in the Constitution that the House shall have the power of choosing their own officers. We have chosen a clerk, and, I am satisfied, a very capable one; but will any gentleman contend we may not discharge him and choose another, and another, as often as we see cause? And so it is in every other instance; where they have the power to make, they have likewise the power to unmake. It will be said by gentlemen that the power to make does not imply the power of unmaking; but I believe they will find very few exceptions in the United States.

Were I to speak of the expediency, every one of my observations would be against it. When an important and confidential trust is placed in a man, it is worse than death to him to be displaced without cause; his reputation depends on the single will of the President, who may ruin him on bare suspicion. Nay, a new President may turn him out on mere caprice, or in order to make room for a favorite. This contradicts all my notions of propriety; every thing of this sort should be done with due deliberation; every person ought to have a hearing before he is punished. It is on these considerations that I wish the general principles laid down by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE) may be adhered to.

I will add one word more and have done. This seems, Mr. Chairman, altogether to be aimed at the Senate. What have they done to chagrin us? Or why should we attempt to abridge their powers, because we can reach them by our regulations in the shape of a bill? I think we had better let it alone. If the Constitution has given them this power, they will reject this part of the bill, and they will exercise that one privilege judiciously, however they may the power of removal. If the Constitution has not given it to them, it has not vested it any where else; consequently, this House would have no right to confer it.

On motion, the committee rose and reported progress.

— WEDNESDAY, June 17.

GEORGE MATTHEWS, from Georgia, appeared and took his seat.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill establishing an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs; Mr. TAUNBULL in the Chair. The clause, "to be removable by the President," being under consideration—

Mr. HARTLEY.—I was not present when this question was first brought before the House; but I heard the arguments which were yesterday urged against the President's exercising the power of removal, and am by no means satisfied that they are well founded. If no better are brought forward, I shall be against striking out. It was contended by one gentleman that the appointment to this office was to be during good behaviour; and asserted by others that the President had not the power of removal without the advice and consent of the Senate. I mean to offer a few remarks on these positions; but first I would observe that this is an office of considerable importance, if we are to judge by the duties assigned in the body of the bill. In all commercial countries it will require men of high talents to fill such an office, and great responsibility. It is necessary to connect the business in such a manner as to give the President of the United States a complete command over it; so, in whatever hands it is placed, or however modulated, it must be subjected to his inspection and control. This certainly is the fair construction of the Constitution, and a practical recognition of the principles upon which republican Governments are founded in general, and this in particular.

I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that this officer cannot be considered as appointed during good behaviour, even in point of policy; but with respect to the Constitutionality, I am pretty confident he cannot be viewed in that light. The Constitution declares the tenure of the officers it recognises, and says one class of them shall hold their offices during good behaviour—they are the judges of your Supreme and other Courts; but as to any other officer being established on this firm tenure, the Constitution is silent. It then necessarily follows, that we must consider every other according to its nature, and regulate it in a corresponding manner. The business of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs is of an executive nature, and must consequently be attached to the Executive Department.

I think the gentleman from South Carolina goes too far in saying, that the clause respecting impeachments implies that there is no other mode of removing an officer. I think it does not follow, that because one mode is pointed out by the Constitution, there is no other, especially if that provision is intended for nothing more than a punishment for a crime. The fourth section of the second article says, that all civil officers shall be removed on conviction of certain crimes. But it cannot be the intention of the Constitution to prevent by this a removal in every other way: such a principle, if once admitted, would be attended with very inconvenient and mischievous consequences.

The gentleman further contends, that every man has a property in his office, and ought not to be removed but for criminal conduct; he ought not to be removed for inability. I hope this doctrine will never be admitted in this country. A man when in office ought to have abilities to discharge the duties of it; if he is discovered to be unfit, he ought to be immediately removed, but not on the principles that gentleman contends for. If he has an estate in his office, his right must be purchased, and a practice like what obtains in England will be adopted here; we shall be unable to dismiss an officer without allowing him a pension for the interest he is deprived of. Such doctrine may suit a nation which is strong in proportion to the number of dependents upon the Crown, but will be very pernicious in a Republic like ours. When we have established an office, let the provision for the support of the officer be sufficient to compensate his services; but never let it be said that he has an estate in his office when he is found unfit to perform his duties. If officers are to be held during good behaviour, it is easy to foresee that we shall have as many factions as heads of departments. The consequence would be corruption in one of the great departments of Government; and if the balance is once destroyed, the Constitution must fall amidst the ruins. From this view of the subject, I have no difficulty to declare, that the Secretary of Foreign Affairs is an officer during pleasure, and not during good behaviour, as contended for.

One gentleman (Mr. WHITE) holds the same principles, but differs with respect to the power which ought to exercise the privilege of removal. On this point, we are reduced to a matter of construction; but it is of high importance to the United States that a construction should be rightly made. But gentlemen say it is inconsistent with the Constitution to make this declaration; that, as the Constitution is silent, we ought not to be explicit. The Constitution has expressly pointed out several matters which we can do, and some which we cannot do; but in other matters it is silent, and leaves them to the discretion of the Legislature. If this is not the case, why was the last clause of the eighth section of the first article inserted? It gives power to Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry the Government into effect.

I look upon it that the Legislature have therefore a right to exercise their discretion on such questions; and however attentively gentlemen may have examined the Constitution on this point, I trust they have discovered no clause which forbids this House interfering in business necessary and proper to carry the Government into effect.

The Constitution expressly grants to the President the power of filling all vacancies during the recess of the Senate. This is a temporary power like that of removal, and liable to very few of the objections which have been made. When the President has removed an officer, another must be appointed; but this cannot be done without the advice and consent of the Senate: where then is the danger of a system of favoritism? The President, notwithstanding the supposed depravity of mankind, will hardly remove a worthy officer, to make way for a person whom the Senate may reject. Another reason why the power of removal should be lodged with the President, rather than the Senate, arises from their connexion with the people. The President is the representative of the people in a near and equal manner; he is the guardian of his country. The Senate are the representatives of the State Legislatures; but they are very unequal in that representation. Each State sends two members to that House, although their proportions are as ten to one. Hence arises a degree of insecurity to an impartial administration; but if they possessed every advantage of equality, they cannot be the proper body to inspect into the proper behaviour of officers, because they have no Constitutional powers for this purpose. It does not always imply criminality to be removed from office, because it may be proper to remove for other causes; neither do I see any danger which may result from the exercise of this power by the President, because the Senate is to be consulted in the appointment which is afterwards to take place. Under these circumstances, I repeat it, that I have no doubt in my own mind, that this office is during pleasure, and that the power of removal which is a mere temporary one, ought to be in the President, whose powers, taken together, are not very numerous, and the success of this Government depends upon their being unimpairable.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I was in hopes, as this question was pretty fully discussed before, the House would not have been troubled again with it. But as much has again been said in opposition, I should not feel a conscious discharge of my duty, unless I offered those sentiments which have forcibly impressed my mind with their weight, and induced me to vote in favor of the clause.

It has been objected against this clause, that the granting of this power is unconstitutional; it was also objected, that if not unconstitutional, it is unnecessary; that the Constitution must contain in itself the power of removal, and have given it to some body or person of the Government to be exercised; that therefore the law could make no disposition of it, and the attempt to grant it was unconstitutional, or the law is unnecessary; for if the power is granted in the way the clause supposes, the Legislature can neither add to nor diminish the power by making the declaration.

With respect to the unconstitutionality of the measure, I observe that if it is so, the Constitution must have given the power expressly to some person or body other than the President; otherwise it cannot be said with certainty that it is unconstitutional in us to declare that he shall have the power of removal. I believe it is not contended that the Constitution expressly gives this power to any other person; but it is contended that the objection is collected from the nature of the body which has the appointment, and the particular clause in the Constitution which declares that all officers shall be removed on conviction. It will be necessary to examine the expressions of that clause; I believe it will be found not to comprehend the case we have under consideration. I suppose the Constitution contemplates somewhere the power of removal for other causes besides those expressed as causes of impeachment. I take it, that the clause in the Constitution respecting impeachments, makes a provision for removal against the will of the President; because the House can carry the offender before a tribunal which shall remove him, notwithstanding the desire of the Chief Magistrate to keep him in office. If this is not to be the construction, then a particular clause in the Constitution will be nugatory. The Constitution declares that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour. This implies that other officers shall hold their offices during a limited time; or according to the will of some person; because if all persons are to hold their offices during good behaviour, and to be removed only by impeachment, then this particular declaration in favor of the judges will be useless. We are told that an officer must misbehave before he can be removed. This is true with respect to those officers who hold their commissions during good behaviour, but it cannot be true of those who are appointed during pleasure, they may be removed for incapacity, or if their want of integrity is suspected; but the question is, to find where this power of removal resides.

It has been argued, that we are to find this in the construction arising from the nature of the authority which appoints. Here I would meet the gentlemen, if it was necessary to rest it entirely on that ground. Let me ask the gentlemen, who appoints? The Constitution gives an advisory power to the Senate; but it is considered that the President makes the appointment. The appointment and responsibility are actually his; for it is expressly declared, that he shall nominate and appoint, though their advice is required to be taken. If from the nature of the appointment we are to collect the authority of removal, then I say the latter power is lodged in the President; because by the Constitution he has the power of appointment; instantly as the Senate have advised the appointment, the act is required to be executed by the President. The language is explicit: "He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint;" so that if the gentlemen's general principle, that the power of appointing shall remove be true, it follows that the removal is to be President.

It has been stated as an objection, that we should extend the powers of the President, if we give him the power of removal; and we are not to construe the Constitution in such way as to enlarge the Executive power to the injury of any other; that, as he is limited in the power of appointment by the control of the Senate, he ought to be equally limited in the removal.

If there be any weight in this argument it applies as forcibly against vesting the power conjointly in the President and Senate; because if we are not to extend the powers of the Executive beyond the express detail of duties found in the Constitution, neither are we at liberty to extend the duties of the Senate beyond those precise points fixed in the same instrument; of course, if we cannot say the President alone shall remove, we cannot say the President and Senate may exercise such power.

It is admitted, that the Constitution is silent on this subject, but it is also silent with respect to the appointments it has vested in the Legislature. The Constitution declares, that Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or heads of departments; yet says nothing with respect to the removal. Now, let us suppose the Legislature to have vested the power of appointment in the President in cases of inferior officers; can the intention of the Constitution in this, contemplating this mode of appointment, for the sake of convenience, be ever carried into effect? If we say nothing respecting the removal, what would be the consequence if the Legislature should not make the declaration?

Could it be supposed that he would not have the authority to dismiss the officer he had so appointed? To be sure he could; then, of course, in those cases in which the Constitution has given the appointment to the President, he must have the power of removal for the sake of consistency. For no person will say, that, if the President should appoint an inferior officer, he should not have the power to remove him when he thought proper, if no particular limitation was determined by the law. Thus stands the matter with respect to the Constitution. There is no express prohibition of the power nor positive grant. If then we collect the power by inference from the Constitution, we shall find it pointed strongly in favor of the President, much more so than in favor of the Senate combined with him.

This is a case omitted, or is it not. If it is omitted, and the power is necessary and essential to the Government and to the great interests of the United States, who are to make the provision and supply the defect? Certainly the Legislature is the proper body. It is declared they shall establish offices by law. The establishment of an office implies every thing relative to its formation, constitution, and termination; consequently, the Congress are authorized to declare their judgment on each of these points. But, if the arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. SMITH) prevail, that as the Constitution has not mediated the removal of an officer in any other way than by impeachment, it would be an assumption in Congress to vest the President, courts of law, or heads of departments, with power to dismiss their officers in any other manner. Would a regulation of this kind be effectual to carry into effect the great objects of the Constitution? I contend it would not. Therefore, the principle which opposes the carrying of the Constitution into effect, must be rejected as dangerous, and incompatible with the general welfare. Hence, all those suppositions, that, because the Constitution is silent, the Legislature must not supply the defect, are to be treated as chimeras and illusory inferences.

I believe it is possible that the Constitution may be misconstrued by the Legislature; but, will any gentleman contend, that it is more probable that the Senate, one branch only of the Legislature, should make a more upright decision on any point than the whole Legislature, especially on a point in which they are supported by some gentlemen to be so immediately interested, even admitting that honorable body to have more wisdom and more integrity than this House? Such an inference can hardly be admitted; but I believe it seldom or never was contended, that there was more wisdom or security in a part than in the whole.

But, supposing the power to vest in the Senate, is it more safe in their hands than where we contend it should be? Would it be more satisfactory to our constituents for us to make such a declaration in their favor? I believe not.

With respect to this and every case omitted, but which can be collected from the other provisions made in the Constitution, the people look up to the Legislature, the concurrent opinion of the two branches, for their construction; they conceive those cases proper subjects for legislative wisdom; they naturally suppose, where provisions are to be made, they ought to spring from this source, and this source alone.

From a view of these circumstances, we may be induced to meet the question in force. Shall we now venture to supply the defect? For my part, I have no hesitation. We should supply the defect; we should place the power of removal in the great Executive officer of the Government.

In the Constitution, the heads of departments are considered as the mere assistants of the President, in the performance of his Executive duties. He has the superintendence, the control, and the inspection of their conduct; he has an intimate connexion with them; they must receive from him his orders and directions; they must answer his inquiries in writing when he requires it. Shall the person having these superior powers to govern, with such advantages of discovering and defeating the base intentions of his officers, their delinquencies, their defective abilities, or their negligence, be restrained from applying these advantages to the most useful, nay, in some cases, the only useful purpose which can be answered by them?

It appears to me, that the power can be safely lodged here. But it has been said by some gentlemen, that if it is lodged here, it will be subject to abuse; that there may be a change of officers, and a complete revolution throughout the whole Executive department, upon the election of every new President. I admit this may be the case, and contend that it should be the case, if the President thinks it necessary. I contend, that every President ought to have those men about him in whom he can place the most confidence, provided the Senate approve his choice. But we are not from hence to infer, that changes will be made in a wanton manner, and from capricious motives; because the Presidents are checked and guarded in a very safe manner with respect to the appointment of their successors; from all which it may be fairly presumed, that changes will be made on principles of policy and propriety only.

Will the man chosen by three millions of his fellow-citizens be such a wretch as to abuse them in a wanton manner? For my part, I should think with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) that a character thus selected and honored by his country is entitled to my confidence; and I see no reason why we should suppose he is more inclined to do harm than good. Elected as he is, I trust, we are secure. I do not draw these observations from the safety I conceive under the present Administration, or because our Chief Magistrate is possessed of irradiated virtues, whose lustre brightens this Western hemisphere, and incites the admiration of the world. But I calculate upon what our mode of election is likely to bring forward, and the security which the Constitution affords. If the President abuses his trust, will he escape the popular censure when the period which terminates his elevation arrives? And would he not be liable to impeachment for displacing a worthy and able man, who enjoyed the confidence of the people?

We ought not to consider one side alone, we should consider the benefit of such an arrangement as well as the difficulties. We ought also to consider the difficulties arising from the exercise of the power of removing by the Senate. It was well observed by an honorable gentleman (Mr. Sedgwick) on this point, that the Senate must continue in session the whole year, or be hastily assembled from the extremes and all parts of the continent, whenever the President thinks a removal necessary. Suppose an ambassador or minister plenipotentiary negotiating or intriguing contrary to his instructions, to the injury of the United States, before the Senate can be assembled to accede to his recall; the interest of his country may be betrayed, and the evil irreparably perpetrated. A great number of such instances might be enumerated, sufficient to convince gentlemen that, with respect to the expediency, the power of removal ought not to be in the Senate.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that it is proper for the Legislature to speak their sense upon those points on which the Constitution is silent. I believe the judges will never decide that we are guilty of a breach of the Constitution, by declaring a Legislative opinion in cases where the Constitution is silent. If the laws shall be in violation of any part of the Constitution, the judges will not hesitate to decide against them; where the power is incident to the Government, and the Constitution is silent, it can be no impediment to a Legislative grant; I hold it necessary in such cases to make provision. In the case of removal, the Constitution is silent; the wisdom of the Legislature should therefore declare where the power resides.

Mr. Jackson.—Much time, Mr. Chairman, has been taken up in discussing this question; but, considering its importance, I trust no complaint will be made on this account. Although I am at all times unwilling to trespass on the committee, I cannot sit still and pass this subject with a silent vote. As a Constitutional question, it is of great moment, and worthy of full discussion. I am, sir, a friend to the full exercise of all the powers of Government, and deeply impressed with the necessity there exists of having an energetic Executive. But, friend as I am to an efficient Government, I value the liberties of my fellow-citizens beyond every other consideration; and where I find them endangered, I am willing to forego every other blessing to secure them. I hold it as good a maxim as it is an old one, of two evils to choose the least.

It has been mentioned, that in all Governments the Executive Magistrate has the power of dismissing officers under him. This may hold good in Europe, where monarchs claim their powers jure divino, but it never can be admitted in America, under a Constitution delegating only enumerated powers. It requires more than a mere ipse dixit to demonstrate that any power is in its nature Executive, and consequently given to the President of the United States by the present Constitution; but if this power is incident to the Executive branch of Government, it does not follow that it vests in the President alone, because he alone does not possess all Executive powers. The Constitution has lodged the power of forming treaties, and all Executive business, I presume, connected therewith, in the President, but it is qualified by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senate agree therein; the same has taken place with respect to appointing officers. From this I infer, that those arguments are done away which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) used to prove, that it was contrary to the principles of the Constitution that we should blend the Executive and Legislative powers in the same body. It may be wrong that the great powers of Government should be blended in this manner; but we cannot separate them; the error is adopted in the Constitution, and can only be eradicated by wedding it out of that instrument; it may therefore be a proper subject for amendment, when we come to consider that business again.

It has been observed, that the President ought to have this power to remove a man when he becomes obnoxious to the people or disagreeable to himself. Are we, then, to have all the officers the mere creatures of the President? This thirst of power will introduce a treasury bench into the House, and we shall have ministers obtrude upon us to govern and direct the measures of the Legislature, and to support the influence of their master. And shall we establish a different influence between the people and the President? I suppose these circumstances must take place, because they have taken place in other countries. The Executive power falls to the ground in England, if it cannot be supported by the Parliament; therefore a high game of corruption is played, and a majority secured to the ministry by the introduction of placemen and pensioners.

The gentlemen have brought forward arguments drawn from possibility. It is said, that our Secretary of Foreign Affairs may become unfit for his office by a fit of lunacy, and therefore a silent remedy should be applied. It is true such a case may happen, but it may also happen in cases where there is no power of removing. Suppose the President should be taken with a fit of lunacy, would it be possible by such arguments to remove him? I apprehend he must remain in office during his four years. Suppose the Senate should be seized with a fit of lunacy, and it was to extend to the House of Representatives; what could the people do but endure this mad Congress till the term of their election expired? We have seen a King of Great Britain in an absolute fit of lunacy, which produced an interregnum in the Government. The same may happen here with respect to our President; and although it is improbable that the majority of both Houses of Congress may be in that situation, yet it is not impossible. But gentlemen have brought forward another argument with respect to the judges. It is said they are to hold their offices during good behaviour: I agree that it ought to be the case. But is not a judge liable to the act of God as well as any other officer of Government? How ever great his legal knowledge, his judgment, and integrity, it may be taken from him at a stroke, and he rendered the most unfit of all men to fill such an important office. But can you remove him? Not for this cause, it is impossible; because madness is no treason, crime, or misdemeanor. If he does not choose to resign, like Lord Mansfield, he may continue in office for ninety or one hundred years, although seldom so long have any men retained their faculties.

But let me ask gentlemen, if it is possible to place their officers in such a situation as to deprive them of their independency and firmness; for I apprehend it is not intended to stop with the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. Let it be remembered, that the Constitution gives the President the command of the military. If you give him complete power over the man with the strong box, he will have the liberties of America under his thumb. It is easy to see the evil which may result. If he wants to establish an arbitrary authority, and finds the Secretary of Finance not inclined to second his endeavors, he has nothing more to do than to remove him, and get one appointed of principles more congenial with his own. Then, says he, I have got the army; let me have but the money, and I will establish my throne upon the ruins of your visionary republic. Let no gentleman say I am contemplating imaginary dangers, the mere chimeras of a heated brain. Behold the baleful influence of the royal prerogative when officers hold their commission during the pleasure of the Crown!

At this moment, see the King of Sweden, timorous at arbitrary power, shutting up the doors of his Senate, and compelling, by force of arms, his shuddering counsellors to acquiesce in his despotic mandates. I agree that this is the hour in which we ought to establish our Government; but it is an hour in which we should be wary and cautious, especially in what respects the Executive Magistrate; with the present, I grant, every power may be safely lodged. Black indeed is the heart of that man who even suspects him to be capable of abusing them. But alas! he cannot be with us forever: he is liable to the vicissitudes of life; he is but mortal, and though I contemplate it with great regret, yet I know the period must come which will separate him from his country; and can we know the virtues or vices of his successor in a very few years? May not a man, with a Pandora's box in his breast, come into power, and give us sensible cause to lament our present confidence and want of foresight?

A gentleman has declared, that as the Constitution has given the power of appointment, it has consequently given the power of removal. I agree with him in all the Constitution expressly grants, but I must differ in the constructive reasoning. It was said by the advocates of this Constitution, that the powers not given up in that instrument were reserved to the people. Under this impression, it has been proposed, as a favorite amendment to the Constitution, that it should be declared that all powers not expressly given should be retained. As to what gentlemen have said of its giving satisfaction to the people, I deny it; they never can be pleased that we should give new and extraordinary powers to the Executive; we must confine ourselves to the powers described in the Constitution, and the moment we pass it, we take an arbitrary stride towards a despotic Government.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. LAWRENCE) contends that the President appoints, and, therefore, he ought to remove. I shall agree to give him the same power in cases of removal that he has in appointing; but nothing more. Upon this principle, I would agree to give him the power of suspension during the recess of the Senate. This, in my opinion, would effectually provide against those inconveniences which have been apprehended, and not to expose the Government to those abuses we have to dread from the wanton and uncontrolled authority of removing officers at pleasure. I am the friend of an energetic Government; but while we are giving vigor to the Executive arm, we ought to be careful not to lay the foundation of future tyranny. I think this power too great to be safely trusted in the hands of a single man, especially in the hands of a man who has so much Constitutional power. I believe if those powers had been more contracted, the system of Government would have been more generally agreeable to our constituents; that is, at present, it would conform more to the popular opinion at least. For my part, though I came from a State where the energy of Government can be useful, and where it is at this moment wanting, I cannot agree to extend this power; because I conceive it may, at some future period, be exercised in such a way as to subvert the liberties of my country; and no consideration shall ever induce me to put them in jeopardy. It is under this impression that I shall vote decidedly against the clause.

Mr. CLYMER.—If I were to give my vote merely on Constitutional ground, I should be totally indifferent whether the words were struck out or not; because I am clear that the Executive has the power of removal as incident to his department; and, if the Constitution had been silent with respect to the appointment, he would have had that power also. The reason, perhaps, why it was mentioned in the Constitution, was to give some further security against the introduction of improper men into office. But in cases of removal there is not such necessity for this check. What great danger would arise from the removal of a worthy man, when the Senate must be consulted in the appointment of his successor? Is it likely they will consent to advance an improper character? The presumption therefore is, that he would not abuse this power; or, if he did, only one good man would be changed for another.

If the President is divested of his power, his responsibility is destroyed; you prevent his efficiency, and disable him from affording that security to the people which the Constitution contemplates. What use will it be of calling the citizens of the Union together every four years to obtain a purified choice of a representative, if he is to be a mere cipher in the Government? The Executive must act by others; but you reduce him to a mere shadow, when you control both the power of appointment and removal; if you take away the latter power, he ought to resign the power of superintending and directing the Executive parts of Government into the hands of the Senate at once, and then we become a dangerous aristocracy, or shall be more destitute of energy than any Government on earth. These being my sentiments, I wish the clause to stand as a Legislative declaration, that the power of removal is constitutionally vested in the President.

Mr. PAGE.—After so much has been said, I should not presume to trouble the House with my sentiments, but that I seconded the motion. I do contend it must appear to every person who reads the Constitution, without hearing the ingenious explanations that have been made, that the clause in the bill is unconstitutional. How is it to be reconciled to the clause which relates to impeachment, or the clause vesting the appointment in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate? But, independent of these considerations, it must appear improper. I venture to assert, that this clause of the bill contains in it the seeds of royal prerogative. If gentlemen lay such stress on the energy of the Government, I beg them to consider how far this doctrine may go. Every thing which has been said in favor of energy in the Executive, may go to the destruction of freedom, and establish despotism. This very energy, so much talked of, has led many patriots to the Bastille, to the block, and to the halter. If the Chief Magistrate can take a man away from the head of a department, without assigning any reason, he may as well be invested with power, on certain occasions, to take away his existence. But will you contend, that this idea is consonant with the principles of a free Government, where no man ought to be condemned unheard, not till after a solemn conviction of guilt on a fair and impartial trial? It would, in my opinion, be better to suffer, for a time, the mischief arising from the conduct of a bad officer, than admit principles which would lead to the establishment of despotic prerogatives. Gentlemen may be, and no doubt are, actuated by honest motives in supporting this clause; but I lament them as laboring under a fatal error, which may ruin their country.

There can be little occasion for the President to exercise this power, unless you suppose that the appointments will be made in a careless manner, which by no means is likely to be the case; if, then, you have a good officer, why should he be made dependent upon the will of a single man? Suppose a colonel in your army should disobey his orders, or cowardly flee before the enemy; what would the general do? Would he be at liberty to dismiss the officer? No; he would suspend him until a court martial was held to decide the degree of guilt. If gentlemen had been content to say that the President might suspend, I should second their motion, and afterwards the officer might be removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but to make every officer of the Government dependent on the will and pleasure of one man, will be vesting such arbitrary power in him, as to occasion every friend to liberty to tremble for his country. I confess it seems to me a matter of infinite concern, and I should feel very unhappy if I supposed the clause would remain in the bill.

Mr. SHARMAN.—I consider this as a very important subject in every point of view, and therefore worthy of full discussion. In my mind it involves three questions: First, whether the President has, by the Constitution, the right to remove an officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate? No gentleman contends but that the advice and consent of the Senate are necessary to make the appointment in all cases, unless in inferior offices where the contrary is established by law; but then they allege that, although the consent of the Senate is necessary to the appointment, the President alone, by the nature of his office, has the power of removal. Now, it appears to me, that this opinion is ill-founded, because this provision was intended for some useful purpose, and by that construction would answer none at all. I think the concurrence of the Senate as necessary to appoint an officer as the nomination of the President; they are constituted as mutual checks, each having a negative upon the other.

I consider it as an established principle, that the power which appoints can also remove, unless there are express exceptions made. Now the power which appoints the judges cannot displace them, because there is a Constitutional restriction in their favor; otherwise the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, being the power which appointed them, would be sufficient to remove them. This is the construction in England, where the King has the power of appointing judges; it was declared to be during pleasure, and they might be removed when the monarch thought proper. It is a general principle in law, as well as reason, that there shall be the same authority to remove as to establish. It is so in legislation, where the several branches whose concurrence is necessary to pass a law, must concur in repealing it. Just so I take it to be in cases of appointment; and the President alone may remove when he alone appoints, as in the case of inferior offices to be established by law.

Here another question arises, whether this officer comes within the description of inferior officers? Some gentlemen think not, because he is the head of the Department of Foreign Affairs. Others may perhaps think that, as he is employed in the Executive department, in aid of the President, he is not such an officer as is understood by the term Heads of Departments; because the President is the head of the Executive department, in which the Secretary of Foreign Affairs serves. If this is the construction which gentlemen put upon the business, they may vest the appointment in the President alone, and the removal will be in him of consequence. But if this reasoning be not admitted, we can by no means vest the appointment, or removal either, in the Chief Magistrate alone. As the officer is the mere creature of the Legislature, we may form it under such regulations as we please, with such powers and duration as we think good policy requires. We may say he shall hold his office during good behaviour, or that he shall be annually elected. We may say he shall be displaced for neglect of duty, and point out how he shall be convicted of it; without calling upon the President or Senate.

The third question is, if the Legislature has the power to authorize the President alone to remove this officer, whether it is expedient to invest him with it? I do not believe it is absolutely necessary that he should have such power, because the power of suspending would answer all the purposes which gentlemen have in view by giving the power of removal. I do not think that the officer is only to be removed by impeachment, as is argued by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) because he is the mere creature of the law, and we can direct him to be removed on conviction of mismanagement or inability, without calling on the Senate for their concurrence. But I believe, if we make no such provision, he may constitutionally be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and I believe it would be most expedient for us to say nothing in the clause on this subject.

Mr. STONE.—I think it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to determine the question before us. I do not think it would do to leave it to the determination of courts of law hereafter. It should be our duty, in cases like the present, to give our opinion on the construction of the Constitution.

When the question was brought forward I felt unhappy, because my mind was in doubt; but since then I have deliberately reflected upon it, and have made up an opinion perfectly satisfactory to myself. I consider, that in general, every officer who is appointed should be removed by the power that appoints him. It is so in the nature of things. The power of appointing an officer arises from the power over the subject on which the officer is to act. It arises from the principal who appoints having an interest in and a right to conduct the business, which he does by means of an agent. Therefore, this officer appears to be nothing more than an agent, appointed for the convenient dispatch of business. This is my opinion on this subject, and the principle will operate from a Minister of State down to a tide-waiter. The Constitution, it is admitted by every gentleman, recognises the principle. Because it has not been denied, whenever general appointments are made under the Constitution, that they are to be at will and pleasure; that where an appointment is made during good behaviour, it is an exception to the general rule. There you limit the exercise of the power which appoints. It is thus in the case of the judges.

Department of Foreign Affairs.

Let us examine, then, whence originates the power of Congress with respect to the officer under consideration. I presume it is expressly contained in the Constitution, or clearly deducible from that instrument, that we have a right to erect the Department of Foreign Affairs. No gentlemen will consent to a reduction or relinquishment of that power. The Constitution has given us the power of laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; this includes the power of organizing a Revenue Board. It gives us power to regulate commerce; this includes the power of establishing a Board of Trade. To make war, and organize the militia; this enables us to establish a Minister at War, and generally to make all laws necessary to carry these powers into effect. Now it appears to me that the erection of this department is expressly within the Constitution. But there is a provision in the Constitution which takes away from us the power of appointing officers of a certain description. They are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Then the Constitution limits the Legislature in appointing certain officers, which would otherwise be within their power.

It will then become a considerable question, as it has been in my mind, that as, in the nature of things, the power which appoints removes also, and as the power of appointment by the Constitution is placed in the President and Senate, whether the removal does not follow as incidental to that power? But I am averse to that construction, as the terms of the Constitution are sufficient to invest the Legislature with complete power for performing its duties. And as it has given the power of making treaties, and judging of them, to the Senate and President, I should be inclined to believe, that as they have an immediate concern in and control over this business, they therefore ought to have the power of removal. It may be said, with respect to some other officers, that, agreeably to this principle, the President alone ought to have the sole power of removal; because he is interested in it, and has the control over the business they manage. For example, take the Minister at War. The President is the commander-in-chief of the army and militia of the United States; but the ground is narrowed by the Senate being combined with him in making treaties; though even here again the ground is reduced, because of the power combined in the whole Legislature to declare war and grant supplies. If it is considered that Congress have a right to appoint these officers, or dictate the mode by which they shall be appointed, (and I calculate, in my own opinion, the manner of dismissal from the mode of appointment.) I should have no doubt but we might make such regulations as we may judge proper. If the Constitution had given no rule by which officers were to be appointed, I should search for one in my own mind; but as the Constitution has laid down the rule, I consider the mode of removal as clearly defined as by implication it can be. It ought to be the same as that of the appointment. What quality of the human mind is necessary for the one that is not necessary for the other? Information, impartiality, and judgment in the business to be conducted, are necessary to make a good appointment. Are not the same properties requisite for a dismissal? It appears so to me.

I cannot subscribe to the opinion delivered by some gentlemen, that the Executive, in its nature, implies the power to appoint the officers of Government. Why does it imply it? The appointment of officers depends upon the qualities that are necessary for forming a judgment on the merits of men; and the displacing of them, instead of including the idea of what is necessary for an Executive officer, includes the idea necessary for a Judicial one. Therefore it cannot exist, in the nature of things, that an Executive power is either to appoint or displace the officers of Government. Is it a political dogma? Is it founded in experience? If it is, I confess it has been very long wrapped up in mysterious darkness. As a political rule, it is not common in the world, except in monarchies where this principle is established, that the interest of the State is included in the interest of the Prince: that whatever injures the State is an injury to the Sovereign; because he has a property in the State and the Government, and he is to take care that nothing of that kind is to be injured or destroyed. He being so intimately connected with the well-being of the nation, it appears a point of justice only to suffer him to manage his own concerns. Our principles of Government are different; and the President, instead of being master of the people of America, is only their great servant. But if it arises from a political dogma, it must be subject to exceptions, which hold good as they are applied to Governments which give greater or less proportions of power to their Executive. I shall only remark, that the Constitution, in one part of it, so far as I can see, supposes that the President is the sole judge of the merits of an appointment. It is very forcible to my mind, that the Constitution has confined his sole appointment to the case of inferior officers. It also strikes me, from the clause that gives the President the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment, that the Constitution reposes a confidence in the Senate which it has not done in this officer; and therefore there is no good reason for destroying that participation of power which the system of Government has given to them.

Whether it would be expedient to give the power of removal to the President alone, depends on this consideration: they are both bodies chosen, with equal care and propriety; the people show as much confidence in the one as in the other. The best President and the best Senate will always be chosen, it is to be presumed, that they can get. Now I would ask, in all cases where the integrity and confidence is the same, whether it is more likely that one man should do right, and exercise his power with propriety, than a number of men with the aid of each other's deliberations? Is it more likely that a number of men should do wrong than one man? Let us examine, shortly, the temptations of one and the other. It would be more difficult for a majority to be obtained in a body composed of members of thirteen independent States, in favor of despotic measures, than might justly be expected from the caprice or want of judgment in a single individual. Is it likely the danger would be so great? I apprehend it is not. All the difficulties and embarrassments that have been mentioned, can be removed by giving to the President the power of suspension during the recess of the Senate; and I think that an attention to the Constitution will lead us to decide that this is the only proper power to be vested in the President of the United States.

Department of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANISON.—However various the opinions which exist upon the point now before us, it seems agreed on all sides, that it demands a careful investigation and full discussion. I feel the importance of the question, and know that our decision will involve the decision of all similar cases. The decision that is at this time made, will become the permanent exposition of the Constitution; and on a permanent exposition of the Constitution will depend the genius and character of the whole Government. It will depend, perhaps, on this decision, whether the Government shall retain that equilibrium which the Constitution intended, or take a direction towards aristocracy or anarchy among the members of the Government. Hence, how careful ought we to be to give a true direction to a power so critically circumstanced! It is incumbent on us to weigh with particular attention, the arguments which have been advanced in support of the various opinions with cautious deliberation. I own to you, Mr. Chairman, that I feel great anxiety upon this question; I feel an anxiety, because I am called upon to give a decision in a case that may affect the fundamental principles of the Government under which we act, and liberty itself. But all that I can do on such an occasion is, to weigh well every thing advanced on both sides with the purest desire to find out the true meaning of the Constitution, and to be guided by that, and an attachment to the true spirit of liberty, whose influence I believe strongly predominates here.

Several constructions have been put upon the Constitution relative to the point in question. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHERMAN) has advanced a doctrine which was not touched upon before. He seems to think (if I understood him rightly) that the power of displacing from office is subject to Legislative discretion; because it having a right to create, it may limit or modify as it thinks proper. I shall not say but at first view this doctrine may seem to have some plausibility. But when I consider that the Constitution clearly intended to maintain a marked distinction between the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers of Government; and when I consider, that, if the Legislature has a power, such as is contended for, they may subject and transfer at discretion powers from one department of our Government to another; they may, on that principle, exclude the President altogether from exercising any authority in the removal of officers; they may give it to the Senate alone, or the President and Senate combined; they may vest it in the whole Congress, or they may reserve it to be exercised by this House. When I consider the consequences of this doctrine, and compare them with the true principles of the Constitution, I own that I cannot subscribe to it.

Another doctrine, which has found very respectable friends, has been particularly advocated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SUMNER.) It is this: when an officer is appointed by the President and Senate, he can only be displaced for malfeasance in his office by impeachment. I think this would give a stability to the Executive department, so far as it may be described by the heads of departments, which is more incompatible with the genius of republican Governments in general, and this Constitution in particular, than any doctrine which has yet been proposed. The danger to liberty, the danger of mal-administration, has not yet been found to lie so much in the facility of introducing improper persons into office, as in the difficulty of displacing those who are unworthy of the public trust. If it is said that an officer once appointed shall not be displaced without the formality required by impeachment, I shall be glad to know what security we have for the faithful administration of the Government? Every individual, in the long chain which extends from the highest to the lowest link of the Executive Magistracy, would find a security in his situation which would relax his fidelity and promptitude in the discharge of his duty.

The doctrine, however, which seems to stand most in opposition to the principles I contend for, is, that the power to annul an appointment is, in the nature of things, incidental to the power which makes the appointment. I agree that if nothing more was said in the Constitution than that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should appoint to office, there would be a great force in saying that the power of removal resulted by a natural implication from the power of appointing. But there is another part of the Constitution, no less explicit than the one on which the gentleman's doctrine is founded; it is that part which declares that the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States. The association of the Senate with the President in exercising that particular function, is an exception to this general rule; and exceptions to general rules, I conceive, are ever to be taken strictly. But there is another part of the Constitution, which inclines, in my judgment, to favor the construction I put upon it; the President is required to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If the duty to see the laws faithfully executed be required at the hands of the Executive Magistrate, it would seem that it was generally intended he should have that species of power which is necessary to accomplish that end. Now, if the officer when once appointed is not to depend upon the President for his official existence, but upon a distinct body, (for where there are two negatives required either can prevent the removal.) I confess I do not see how the President can take care that the laws be faithfully executed. It is true, by a circuitous operation he may obtain an impeachment, and even without this it is possible he may obtain the concurrence of the Senate, for the purpose of displacing an officer; but would this give that species of control to the Executive Magistrate which seems to be required by the Constitution? I own, if my opinion was not contrary to that entertained by what I suppose to be the minority on this question, I should be doubtful of being mistaken, when I discovered how inconsistent that construction would make the Constitution with itself. I can hardly bring myself to imagine the wisdom of the convention who framed the Constitution contemplated such incongruity.

There is another maxim which ought to direct us in expounding the Constitution, and is of great importance. It is laid down, in most of the Constitutions or bills of rights in the republics of America; it is to be found in the political writings of the most celebrated civilians, and is every where held as essential to the preservation of liberty, that the three great departments of Government be kept separate and distinct; and if in any case they are blended, it is in order to admit a partial qualification, in order more effectually to guard against an entire consolidation. I think, therefore, when we review the several parts of this Constitution, when it says that the Legislative powers shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, under certain exceptions, and the Executive power vested in the President with certain exceptions, we must suppose they were intended to be kept separate in all cases in which they are not blended, and ought, consequently, to expound the Constitution so as to blend them as little as possible.

Every thing relative to the merits of the question as distinguished from a Constitutional question, seems to turn on the danger of such a power vested in the President alone. But when I consider the checks under which he lies in the exercise of this power, I own to you I feel no apprehensions but what arise from the dangers incidental to the power itself; for dangers will be incidental to it, rest it where you please. I will not reiterate what was said before with respect to the mode of election, and the extreme improbability that any citizen will be selected from the mass of citizens who is not highly distinguished by his abilities and worth; in this alone we have no small security for the faithful exercise of this power. But, throwing that out of the question, let us consider the restraints he will feel after he is placed in that elevated station. It is to be remarked, that the power in this case will not consist so much in continuing a bad man in office, as in the danger of displacing a good one. Perhaps in the great danger, as has been observed, of abuse in the Executive power, lies in the improper continuance of bad men in office. But the power we contend for will not enable him to do this; for if an unworthy man be continued in office by an unworthy President, the House of Representatives can at any time impeach him, and the Senate can remove him, whether the President chooses or not. The danger then consists merely in this: the President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House, before the Senate for such an act of mal-administration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. But what can be his motives for displacing a worthy man? It must be that he may fill the place with an unworthy creature of his own. Can he accomplish this end? No; he can place no man in the vacancy whom the Senate shall not approve; and if he could fill the vacancy with the man he might choose, I am sure he would have little inducement to make an improper removal. Let us consider the consequences. The injured man will be supported by the popular opinion; the community will take side with him against the President; it will facilitate those combinations, and give success to those exertions which will be pursued to prevent his re-election. To displace a man of high merit, and who from his station may be supposed a man of extensive influence are considerations in the mind of any man who may fill the Presidential chair. The friends of those individuals and the public sympathy will be against him. If this should not produce his impeachment before the Senate, it will amount to an impeachment before the community, who will have the power of punishment, by refusing to re-elect him. But suppose this persecuted individual cannot obtain revenge in this mode; there are other modes in which he could make the situation of the President very inconvenient, if you suppose him resolutely bent on executing the dictates of resentment. If he had not influence enough to direct the vengeance of the whole community, he may probably be able to obtain an appointment in one or the other branch of the Legislature; and being a man of weight, talents, and influence, in either case he may prove to the President troublesome indeed. We have seen examples in the history of other nations, which justifies the remark I now have made. Though the prerogatives of the British King are great as his rank, and it is unquestionably known that he has a positive influence over both branches of the legislative body, yet there have been examples in which the appointment and removal of ministers have been found to be dictated by one or other of those branches. Now if this be the case with an hereditary Monarch, possessed of those high prerogatives and furnished with so many means of influence; can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the Legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself; I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such abuse of power exceeds my conception. If any thing takes place in the ordinary course of business of this kind, my imagination cannot extend to it on any rational principle. But let us not consider the question on one side only; there are dangers to be contemplated on the other. Vest this power in the Senate jointly with the President, and you abolish at once that great principle of unity and responsibility in the Executive department, which was intended for the security of liberty and the public good. If the President should possess alone the power of removal from office, those who are employed in the execution of the law will be in their proper situation, and the chain of dependence be preserved; the lowest officers, the middle grade, and the highest, will depend, as they ought, on the President, and the President on the community. The chain of dependence therefore terminates in the supreme body, namely, in the people, who will possess, besides, in aid of their original power, the decisive engine of impeachment. Take the other supposition; that the power should be vested in the Senate, on the principle that the power to displace is necessarily connected with the power to appoint. It is declared by the Constitution, that we may by law vest the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of departments; the power of removal being incidental, as stated by some gentlemen. Where does this terminate? If you begin with the subordinate officers, they are dependent on their superior, he on the next superior, and he on—whom? On the Senate, a permanent body; a body, by its particular mode of election, in reality existing forever; a body possessing that proportion of aristocratic power which the Constitution no doubt thought wise to be established in the system, but which some have strongly expected against. And let me ask gentlemen, is there equal security in this case as in the other? Shall we trust the Senate, responsible to individual Legislatures, rather than the person who is responsible to the whole community? It is true, the Senate do not hold their offices for life, like aristocracies recorded in the historic page; yet the fact is, they will not possess that responsibility for the exercise of Executive powers which would render it safe for us to vest such powers in them. But what an aspect will this give to the Executive? Instead of keeping the departments of Government distinct, you make an Executive out of one branch of the Legislature; you make the Executive a two-headed monster, to use the expression of the gentleman from New Hampshire. (Mr. Livermore,) you destroy the great principle of responsibility, and perhaps have the creature divided in its will, defeating the very purposes for which a unity in the Executive was instituted. These objections do not lie against such an arrangement as the bill establishes. I conceive that the President is sufficiently accountable to the community; and if this power is vested in him, it will be vested where its nature requires it should be vested; if any thing in its nature is executive, it must be that power which is employed in superintending and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. The laws cannot be executed but by officers appointed for that purpose; therefore, those who are over such officers naturally possess the Executive power. If any other doctrine be admitted, what is the consequence? You may set the Senate at the head of the Executive department, or you may require that the officers hold their places during the pleasure of this branch of the Legislature, if you cannot go so far as to say we shall appoint them; and by this means, you link together two branches of the Government which the preservation of liberty requires to be constantly separated.

Another species of argument has been urged against this clause. It is said, that it is improper, or at least unnecessary, to come to any decision on this subject. It has been said by one gentleman, that it would be officious in this branch of the Legislature to expound the Constitution, so far as it relates to the division of power between the President and Senate; it is incontrovertibly of as much importance to this branch of the Government as to any other, that the Constitution should be preserved entire. It is our duty, so far as it depends upon us, to take care that the powers of the Constitution be preserved entire to every department of Government; the breach of the Constitution in one point, will facilitate the breach in another; a breach in this point may destroy that equilibrium by which the House retains its consequence and share of power; therefore we are not chargeable with an officious interference. Besides, the bill, before it can have effect, must be submitted to both those branches who are particularly interested in it; the Senate may negative, or the President may object, if he thinks it unconstitutional.

But the great objection drawn from the source to which the last arguments would lead us is, that the Legislature itself has no right to expound the Constitution; that wherever its meaning is doubtful, you must leave it to take its course, until the Judiciary is called upon to declare its meaning. I acknowledge, in the ordinary course of Government, that the exposition of the laws and Constitution devolves upon the Judiciary. But I beg to know, upon what principle it can be contended, that any one department draws from the Constitution greater powers than another, in marking out the limits of the powers of the several departments? The Constitution is the charter of the people to the Government; it specifies certain great powers as absolutely granted, and marks out the departments to exercise them. If the Constitutional boundary of either be brought into question, I do not see that any one of these independent departments has more right than another to declare their sentiments on that point.

Perhaps this is an omitted case. There is not one Government on the face of the earth, so far as I recollect, there is not one in the United States, in which provision is made for a particular authority to determine the limits of the Constitutional division of power between the branches of the Government. In all systems there are points which must be adjusted by the departments themselves, to which no one of them is competent. If it cannot be determined in this way, there is no resource left but the will of the community, to be collected in some mode to be provided by the Constitution, or one dictated by the necessity of the case. It is therefore a fair question, whether this great point may not as well be decided, at least by the whole Legislature as by a part, by us as well as by the Executive or Judiciary? As I think it will be equally Constitutional, I cannot imagine it will be less safe, that the exposition should issue from the Legislative authority than any other; and the more so, because it involves in the decision the opinions of both those departments, whose powers are supposed to be affected by it. Besides, I do not see in what way this question could come before the judges, to obtain a fair and solemn decision; but even if it were the case that it could, I should suppose, at least while the Government is not led by passion, disturbed by faction, or deceived by any discolored medium of sight, but while there is a desire in all to see and be guided by the benignant ray of truth, that the decision may be made with the most advantage by the Legislature itself.

My conclusion from these reflections is, that it will be Constitutional to retain the clause; that it expresses the meaning of the Constitution as must be established by fair construction, and a construction which, upon the whole, not only consists with liberty, but is more favorable to it than any one of the interpretations that have been proposed.

Mr. GERRY.—I am clearly of opinion with the gentleman last up, that it is of importance to decide this question on its true principles; and am free to declare, that I shall be as ready to oppose every innovation or encroachment on the rights of the Executive as upon those of the Legislature. I conceive myself bound to do this, not only by oath, but by an obligation equally strong—I mean the obligation of honor.

I wish, sir, to consider this question so far, as to ascertain whether it is, or is not, unconstitutional. I have listened with attention to the arguments which have been urged on both sides; and it does appear to me, that the clause is as inconsistent with the Constitution as any set of words which could possibly be inserted in the bill.

There are two questions relative to this clause: The first, whether the sovereignty of the Union has delegated to the Government the power of removal? And the second, to whom? That they have delegated such power has been clearly proved by the gentlemen who advocate the cause; who justly say, if the power is not delegated, the clause in the Constitution declaring the appointment of judges to be during good behaviour would be nugatory, unless some branch of Government could otherwise have removed them from office. As to the second question, it depends upon the first; if the power is delegated, it must vest in some part of the Government. The gentlemen will agree, that this House has not the power of removal; they will also agree that it does not vest in the Judiciary; then it must vest in the President, or the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; in either of these cases, the clause is altogether useless and nugatory. It is useless if the power vests in the President; because, when the question comes before him, he will decide upon the provision made in the Constitution, and not on what is contained in this clause. If the power vests in the President and Senate, the Senate will not consent to pass the bill with this clause in it; therefore the attempt is nugatory. But if the Senate will assent to the exercise of the power of removal by the President alone, whenever he thinks proper to use it so, then in that case the clause is, as I said before, both useless and nugatory.

The second question which I proposed to examine is, to whom the power of removal is committed. The gentlemen in favor of this clause have not shown that, if the construction that the power vests in the President and Senate, is admitted, it will be an improper construction. I call on gentlemen to point out the impropriety, if they discover any. To me, it appears to preserve the unity of the several clauses of the Constitution; while their construction produces a clashing of powers, and renders of none effect some powers the Senate by express grants possess. What becomes of their power of appointing, when the President can remove at discretion? Their power of judging is rendered vain by the President's dismission; for the power of judging implies the power of dismissing, which will be totally insignificant in its operation, if the President can immediately dismiss an officer whom they have judged and declared innocent.

It is said, that the President will be subject to an impeachment for dismissing a good man. This in my mind involves an absurdity. How can the House impeach the President for doing an act which the Legislature has submitted to his discretion?

But what consequence may result from giving the President the absolute control over all officers? Among the rest, I presume he is to have an unlimited control over the officers of the Treasury. I think if this is the case, you may as well give him at once the appropriation of the revenue; for of what use is it to make laws on this head, when the President, by looking at the officer, can make it his interest to break him? We may expect to see institutions arising under the control of the revenue, and not of the law.

Little then will it answer to say we can impeach the President, when he can easily cover all his crimes by an application of the revenue to those who are to try him. This application would certainly be made in case of a corrupt President; and it is against corruption in him that we must endeavor to guard; not that we fear any thing from the virtuous character who now fills the Executive chair; he is perhaps to be safer trusted with such a power than any man on earth; but it is to secure us against those who may hereafter obtrude themselves into power.

But, if we give the President the power to remove, (though I contend the Constitution has not given it him, there is no power on earth that can except the people, by an alteration of the Constitution, though I will suppose it for argument's sake,) you virtually give him a considerable power over the appointment, independent of the Senate; for if the Senate should reject his first nomination, which will probably be his favorite, he must continue to nominate until the Senate concur; then immediately after the recess of the Senate he may remove the officer, and introduce his own creature, as he has this power expressly by the Constitution. The influence created by this circumstance, would prevent his removal from an office which he held by a temporary appointment from his patron.

This has been supposed by some gentlemen to be an omitted case, and that Congress have the power of supplying the defect. Let gentlemen consider the ground on which they tread. If it is an omitted case, an attempt in the Legislature to supply the defect, will be in fact an attempt to amend the Constitution. But this can only be done in the way pointed out by the fifth article of that instrument, and an attempt to amend it in any other way may be a high crime or misdemeanor, or perhaps something worse. From this view of our situation, gentleman may perhaps be led to consent to strike out the clause.

In Great Britain there are three estates, King, Lords, and Commons; neither of these can be represented by the other, but they conjointly can form constructions upon the rights of the people which have been obtained sword in hand from the Crown. These, with the legislative acts, form the British Constitution; and if there is an omitted case, Parliament has a right to make provision for it. But this is not the case in America, consisting of a single estate. The people have expressly granted certain powers to Congress, and they alone had the right to form the Constitution; in doing so, they directed a particular mode of making amendments, which we are not at liberty to depart from.

The system, it cannot be denied, is in many parts obscure; if Congress are to explain and declare what it shall be, they certainly will have it in their power to make it what they please. It has been a strong objection to the Constitution, that it was remarkably obscure; nay, some have gone so far as to assert that it was studiously obscure, that it might be applied to every purpose by Congress. By this very act the House are assuming a power to alter the Constitution. The people of America can never be safe, if Congress have a right to exercise the power of giving constructions to the Constitution different from the original instrument. Such a power would render the most important clause in the Constitution nugatory, and one without which, I will be bold to say, this system of Government would never have been ratified. If the people were to find that Congress meant to alter it in this way they would revolt at the idea; it would be repugnant to the principles of the Revolution, and to the feelings of every freeman in the United States.

It is said, that the power to advise the President in appointing officers, is an exception to a general rule. To what general rule? That the President, being an Executive officer, has the right of appointing. From whence is this general rule drawn? Not from the Constitution, nor from custom, because the State Governments are generally against it. Before the gentleman had reasoned from this general rule, he ought to have demonstrated that it was one; he ought to have shown that the President, ex officio, had the power to appoint and remove from office; that it was necessarily vested in the Executive branch of the Government.

It is said to be the duty of the President to see the laws faithfully executed, and he could not discharge this trust without the power of removal. I ask the gentleman, if the power of suspension, which we are willing to give, is not sufficient for that purpose? In case the Senate should not be sitting, the officer could be suspended, and at their next session the causes which require his removal might be inquired into.

It is said to be incumbent on us to keep the departments distinct. I agree to this; but then, I ask, what department is the Senate of, when it exercises its power of appointment or removal? If legislative, it shows that the power of appointment is not an executive power; but if it exercises the power as an executive branch of Government, there is no mixing of the departments; and therefore the gentleman's objections fall to the ground.

The dangers which lie against investing this power jointly in the Senate and President, have been pointed out; but I think them more than counterbalanced by the dangers arising from investing it in the President alone. It was said, that the community would take part with the injured officer against the President, and prevent his re-election. I admit that the injured officer may be a man of influence and talents, yet it is fifty to one against him, when he is opposed by such a powerful antagonist. It is said, that if the Senate should have this power, the Government would contain a two-headed monster; but it appears to me, that if it consists in blending the power of making treaties and appointing officers, as executive powers, with their legislative powers, the Senate is already a two-headed monster; if it is a two-headed monster, let us preserve it a consistent one; for surely it will be a very inconsistent monster, while it has the power of appointing, if you deprive it of the power of removing. It was said, that the judges could not have the power of deciding on this subject, because the Constitution is silent; but I ask, if the judges are not ex officio judges of the law; and whether they would not be bound to declare the law a nullity, if this clause is continued in it, and is inconsistent with the Constitution? There is a clause in this system of Government that makes it their duty. I allude to that which authorizes the President to obtain the opinions of the heads of departments in writing; so the President and Senate may require the opinion of judges respecting this power, if they have any doubts concerning it. View the matter in any point of light, and it is utterly impossible to admit this clause. It is both useless and unnecessary; it is inconsistent with the Constitution, and is an officious interference of the House in a business which does not properly come before them. We expose ourselves to most dangerous innovations by future Legislatures, which may finally overturn the Constitution itself.

Mr. BENTON.—The question has been stated as respecting a construction of the Constitution; and it has been asked, how this meaning is to be determined? I suppose a legislative construction is to be admitted, as I conceive there must be given, generally, to the Government, the power of removal at pleasure; because it cannot be rationally intended that all offices should be held during good behaviour, because the Constitution has declared one office to be held by this tenure. If the Constitution intends that all other offices shall be held during will and pleasure, the question will be, during whose will and pleasure? If we declare in the bill that the officer shall be removable by the President, it has the appearance of conferring the power upon him. Now, I think this improper; because it would be admitting which House to be possessed of an authority which would destroy those checks and balances which are cautiously introduced into the Constitution, to prevent an amalgamation of the legislative and executive powers. For this reason, I shall take the liberty of submitting an alteration, or change in the manner of expression, so that the law may be nothing more than a declaration of our sentiments upon the meaning of a Constitutional grant of power to the President. Can the gentleman be serious who tells us, that this is a case to be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution? Does he suppose, whenever a doubt arises in this House, (and it will be a doubt, if an individual doubts,) with respect to the meaning of any part of the Constitution, we must take that mode? Or does he really suppose that we are never to take any part of the Constitution by construction? This I conceive to be altogether inadmissible; for it is not in the compass of human wisdom to frame a system of Government so minutely, but that a construction will, in some cases, be necessary. This is such a case; and we ought most assuredly to declare our sentiments on the occasion.

I will not repeat what has been said, to prove that the true construction is, that the President alone has the power of removal; but will state a case to show the embarrassment which must arise by a combination of the Senatorial and Legislative authority in this particular. I will instance the officer to which the bill relates. To him will necessarily be committed negotiations with the Ministers of foreign Courts. This is a very delicate trust. The supreme Executive officer, in superintending this department, may be entangled with suspicions of a very delicate nature, relative to the transactions of the officer, and such as from circumstances would be injurious to name; indeed, he may be so situated that he will not, cannot, give the evidence of his suspicion. Now, thus circumstanced, suppose he should propose to the Senate to remove the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; are we to expect the Senate will, without any reason being assigned, implicitly submit to his proposition? They will not. Suppose he should say, he suspected the man's fidelity; they would say, we must proceed further, and know the reason for this suspicion; they would insist on a full communication. Is it to be supposed that this man will not have a single friend in the Senate who will contend for a fair trial and a full hearing? The President then becomes the plaintiff, and the Secretary the defendant. The Senate are sitting in judgment between the Chief Magistrate of the United States and a subordinate officer. Now, I submit to the candor of the gentlemen, whether this looks like good government? Yet in every instance when the President thinks proper to have an officer removed, this absurd scene must be displayed. How much better, even on principles of expediency, will it be, that the President alone have the power of removal.

It has been warmly contended, that the power of removal is incidental to the power of appointment. It may be true in general, but upon examination, we shall find there is a distinction in this case from what the general principle supposes. If the President and Senate are to be considered as one body, deliberating together on the business of appointments, every individual of which participates equal powers, the reasoning that has been urged will hold good. But I take it for granted that they are two distinct bodies, and can only give a simple affirmative or negative. No member of the Senate has power to offer an original proposition. In short, the moment we depart from this simple idea, that the provision in the Constitution is intended for any other purpose but to prevent the President from introducing improper persons into office, we shall find it difficult to form any certain principle upon which they ought to act; and our opinions and deliberations will be discordant and distracted.

Gentlemen ask, will not the power of suspending an officer be sufficient to prevent mal-conduct? Here is some inconsistency in their arguments. They declare that Congress have no right to construe the Constitution in favor of the President, with respect to removal; yet they propose to give a construction in favor of the power of suspension being exercised by him. Surely gentlemen do not pretend that the President has the power of suspension granted expressly by the Constitution; if they do, they have been more successful in their researches into that instrument than I have been. If they are willing to allow a power of suspending, it must be because they construe some part of the Constitution in favor of such a grant. The construction in this case must be equally unwarrantable. But admitting it proper to grant this power, what then? When an officer is suspended, does the place become vacant? May the President proceed to fill it up? Or must the public business be likewise suspended? When we say an officer is suspended, it implies that the place is not vacant; but the parties may be heard, and, after the officer is freed from the objections that have been taken to his conduct, he may proceed to execute the duties attached to him. What would be the consequence of this? If the Senate, upon its meeting, were to acquit the officer, and replace him in his station, the President would then have a man forced on him whom he considered as unfaithful; and could not, consistent with his duty, and a proper regard to the general welfare, go so far as to entrust him with full communications relative to the business of his department. Without a confidence in the Executive department, its operations would be subject to perpetual discord, and the administration of the Government become impracticable.

But, suppose the Senate to be joined with the President in the exercise of the power of removal, what mode will they proceed in? Shall the President always propose the removal, or shall the Senate undertake this part of the business? If so, how are they to act? There is no part of the Constitution which obliges the President to meet them, to state his reasons for any measure he may recommend. Are they to wait upon the President? In short, it appears to me, that introducing this clashing of the powers which the Constitution has given to the Executive, will be destructive of the great end of Government. So far will restraining the powers of that department be from producing security to the liberties of the people, that they would inevitably be swallowed up by an aristocratic body.

The amendment which I propose will be to this effect: (it will have to come in some other part of the bill,) that "whenever the said officer shall be removed by the President," and strike out the words "to be removable by the President."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.—The gentlemen, by their arguments in favor of this clause, show us what ought to be, rather than what is, in the Constitution; but I do not think this the ground on which this question should be contested. I think, if the power be not found in the Constitution, we ought not to grant it. I am sorry to take up the time of this committee, at this late hour of the day, but I cannot deny myself the privilege of replying to some of the arguments which have been urged in opposition to those I have advanced. I mean to do this in as summary a manner as I possibly can. It has been inferred from the clause in the Constitution, declaring the judges to hold their offices during good behaviour, that there are no other officers who hold their offices by this tenure. Now, I apprehend, that this clause was inserted to distinguish them from other officers who hold their offices for a limited period: for example, the House of Representatives for two years, the Senate for six, the President and Vice President for four; and, in order to prevent the Legislature from declaring that they should be elected during a limited period, it was seen to be proper to have them independent; and that could only be secured by such a declaration in the Constitution. It would be improper that they should depend on this House for the degree of permanency which is essential to secure the integrity of judges. With respect to the other offices to be established by law, there is nothing to prevent us from limiting their appointment to two or three years. Let us then limit the duration of Secretary of Foreign Affairs for as short a period as is thought to be salutary. Here we are not restricted. But I conceive, as the Constitution now stands, they cannot be removed in any other way but by impeachment.

Another gentleman, in his arguments, has declared, as his opinion; that, in fact, the President has the power of appointment; and infers from that, upon the general principle that those who appoint may remove, that the President has the power of removal also. But it appears extraordinary, that the gentlemen who have urged the great security arising from an appointment from the President and Senate, should now contend that the President alone has that power; if this be true, where is that boasted security?

It has been said also, that the same reason which applies against giving this power to the President, applies against vesting it in the Senate; but I do not think they apply with equal force. On this point, I need only refer gentlemen to the authority I quoted before. Publius shows clearly the superior advantage of having the President and Senate combined in the exercise of this power.

It is contended that the Legislature have the power of supplying the defect, if this is an omitted case. I cannot be of that opinion. But it is unnecessary to extend this argument, after what has been urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. GENAY.) If the Legislature can supply defects, they may virtually repeal the Constitution.

Gentlemen say we ought not to suppose such an abuse of power in the President. But the Constitution wisely guards against his caprice in the appointment; and why should we abate the security in cases of removal? The Constitution contemplates infirmity in the Chief Magistrate; makes him removable by impeachment, and provides the Vice President to exercise the office, upon such a contingency taking place. But it is supposed that the President may be impeached for an abuse of this power. How can that event take place? He will tell you he thought it incumbent on him to displace the officer, because he apprehended the public tranquillity was in danger; and if he erred, it was the error of the head, not of the heart. And will any House of Representatives ever be found to impeach the Chief Magistrate of the United States for an error in opinion?

It was observed, that it would be inconvenient, as the Senate were not always in session. The same objection lies against associating the Senate with the President in making treaties. If this is an inconvenience, it is imposed upon us by the Constitution, and must be submitted to. If he finds the advice of the Senate necessary in either case, he must convene them to obtain their assistance; they are neither of them likely to happen frequently; the inferior officers may be regulated by law, leaving the heads of departments only subject to the operation of this power.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. Sherman,) seemed to think this officer might be considered as an inferior officer, and therefore subject to Legislative directions respecting his appointment and removal; because the President is the Executive head of the department, and this officer is only to aid the President. Some gentlemen have spoken of a two-headed monster in the Government; but I think, in this view, we shall find the Executive a three-headed monster, a real Cerberus. The resolution upon which this bill is founded comprised three heads of departments; if these are appendages to the Executive, what kind of a monster do you form? And yet your Constitution admits these officers to be heads of departments.

It has been said, that the Legislature may give their opinion on the Constitution. I agree with gentlemen if they mean that, as an individual, we may give our single opinion; but I never can admit it to be right in our Legislative capacity to influence the judges, and throw our weight into either scale to warp their decision. I think it highly criminal to attempt to bias their judgment in any way.

It was said, that there was more danger in continuing a bad man in office than in displacing a good one; and that the Constitution seemed to suppose this, by giving the House of Representatives the power of removal. I grant there is more danger in one case than in the other; but I am afraid the President will have it in his power to continue a bad man in office, and this part of the argument I believe has not yet been touched upon; I shall, however, be concise in my observations. It is declared in the Constitution, that judgments, in cases of impeachment, may extend to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States. Suppose it in contemplation to remove some creature of the President's by means of impeachment, in order to displace him from all his employments, and to prevent his ever thereafter disseminating poison through the councils of his country. If the impeachment is permitted to succeed, the poison is removed, and the nation is rid of him. But suppose the President snatches him from his fate, by interposing his authority, saying, you complain of the man, I will save you the trouble of proceeding by that circuitous route of impeachment; I will remove him without delay. By this collusion, the wretch's fame is in some measure preserved; and when the President has waited until the storm of obloquy has ceased to blow, and the public mind has returned to a tranquil state, he obtrudes the man again into office, when, in fact, he might ever to be disqualified from participating in any thing honorable or profitable which the Government has to bestow.

Thus, then, may be accomplished the evil which is most to be dreaded, and which the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) says the Constitution meant to guard against, by giving the House of Representatives the power of trying impeachments.

An honorable gentleman has said, he did not see how this case could be brought before a court of justice in order to obtain their decision. That gentleman is no stranger to a just and venerable law maxim. Wherever a man has a right, he has a remedy; if he suffers a wrong, he can have a redress; he would be entitled to damages for being deprived of his property in his office.

One of the greatest arguments brought forward on this occasion is, that this authority is implied in the grant of Executive authority which is made in the Constitution; the Executive power shall be vested in the President. This I apprehend proved too much, and therefore proves nothing; because it implies that powers which are expressly given by the Constitution, would have been in the President without the express grant. I ask the gentleman, if the Constitution had been silent with respect to his exercising the power of granting reprieves and pardons, whether the President would have that authority? I apprehend it is in some degree an Executive power. It is exercised by some of the Executives even in the United States; but there have been great doubts about the exercise of it in others. It has been said, in some of them, that as this Constitution did not give it, the Governor has no right to it; and this they prove by the Constitutions of other States, in which an express grant is made. For instance, the Constitution of Massachusetts declares that the Governor shall have the power to grant reprieves, &c.; but if it had not been given him, he would not have had it. If the convention who framed the Constitution meant that he should have the power of removal, the propriety of inserting it must have occurred to them, where it is said he should have power to see the laws faithfully executed, and he should commission all officers; there are other places in which it would well come in. As it must have occurred to them, they never intended to give it to him.

I apprehend, if he saw an officer misbehaving, he would transmit the necessary information to us, and leave us to determine whether the person should be impeached or not; and the business could, in my judgment, be satisfactorily accomplished in this way. From all these reasons, there will be no doubt but the Constitution does not give the power; that the Legislature ought not to supply its defects; and that even if it were a matter of doubt, we ought by no means to interfere in adjusting or determining it. Therefore, in whatever point of view you consider it, the clause ought not to stand as part of the bill.

Mr. Vining.—I am extremely solicitous, Mr. Chairman, that this clause should stand as part of the bill, and therefore must beg to add a few words more in its support. I take this power to be necessary, sir, to the execution of your Government. In vain do we contemplate the wisdom of a Legislative branch; in vain do we expect the energy of the Executive arm, and in vain will be the integrity and independence of the Judiciary, if one department after another is to be stripped of its budding powers. The branches will not expand their umbrageous and salutary verdure to shelter our sons from the tempest of calamity, nor delight them with the fair fruits of good government, for which they are in anxious expectation. I have listened, sir, with some degree of avidity to the arguments offered on this subject. I find the point of expediency and responsibility is accorded to, and the question now turns upon the constitutionality of the measure. Here, sir, I agree with gentlemen, it does turn on the construction of the Constitution; and to my mind the construction which we give is irresistibly true. Does the Constitution say such a construction shall be given? I ask gentlemen, does the Constitution, does reason, does experience, does any one principle upon which good government depends, deny our construction? I believe not one of them.

What kind of a monster this will be, I do not pretend to say; whether it will have two heads, three heads, or four heads, as gentlemen contend; but I will be bold to say, it is a monster of a peculiar enormity; for gentlemen are putting the heads where the tails should be, or rather making it without any head at all. If we do not permit the President to exercise this power, surely this will be the most unreasonable thing in nature.

The argument of convenience is strong in favor of the President; for this man is an arm or an eye to him; he sees and writes his secret despatches, he is an instrument over which the President ought to have a complete command. I hope gentlemen, who request us not to be dazzled with the splendor of the President, will not themselves be misled by the brightness of Senatorial dignity, and suffer officers to skulk out of the President's enfeebled reach within the effluence of their lustre, which is most likely to lay the foundation of universal empire over the liberties of the people. If the President removes a valuable officer, which seems to be the great danger of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Sumner) apprehends, it would be an act of tyranny which the good sense of the nation would never forget; but if the Senate turns out a good man, they might be re-elected by the Legislatures. But the Senate may remove a good officer without feeling any injury; they are not feelingly sensible of the advantages arising from his labors, because they do not act in concert with him; while the President, by such a removal, deprives himself of a valuable and necessary aid. When a good officer is obtained, the President has every motive of justice, self-interest, and public good, to retain him in his situation. None of these motives operate, or but faintly operate, upon the Senate.

Does the Constitution any where say the President shall not have the power? It does not. But the principles of the Constitution declare that the Legislative and Executive Departments shall be kept distinct. An express declaration of this kind is sought for as an amendment to the Constitution; and would gentlemen be so weak as to confound them in the first operation of the Government?

It has been asked, if the same properties are not requisite in removing a man from office as to appoint him? I apprehend a difference in the degree of information necessary. A man's ability may be known to many persons; they may entertain even a good opinion of his integrity; but no man, without a superintending power, can bring this fidelity to the test. The President will have every opportunity to discover the real talents and honesty of the officer; the Senate will have none but from common fame. How then are their properties equal?

The Departments of Foreign Affairs and War are peculiarly within the powers of the President, and he must be responsible for them; but take away his controlling power, and upon what principle do you require his responsibility?

The gentlemen say the President may suspend. They were asked if the Constitution gave him this power any more than it gave him the power of removing. Do they contend the one to be a more inherent power than the other? If they do not, why shall it be objected to us that we are making a Legislative construction of the Constitution, when they are contending for the same thing?

I look upon it as begging the question, to say the power that appoints must likewise remove. The position ought to be proved. For my part, I think where the responsibility is, and where the power of overseeing and controlling resides, that there also must be the power of removal.

If the Constitution does not prohibit the exercise of this power, I conceive it to be granted, either as incidental to the Executive Department, or under that clause which gives to Congress all powers necessary and proper to carry the Constitution into effect. This being the case, we are at liberty to construe, from the principles and expressions of the Constitution, where this power resides. This, I trust, is what we are about to do; and after the full discussion which the subject has had, I flatter myself we shall do it with a degree of unanimity which I most ardently wish.

On motion, the committee then rose, and the SPEAKER resumed the Chair. of the Whole on the bill for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair. The clause "to be removable by the President," being still under consideration.

Mr. WAITE.—This question, complicated in its nature, and interesting in its consequences, has occasioned a serious and solemn debate; although some gentlemen have thought it to clear in its nature, and trivial in its consequences, as to exercise in their surprise at its being brought a second time under the consideration of the House. For my own part, I consider it as the most important question that has yet come before the Legislature of the Union; I am sure it is the most important question I ever had a voice in discussing, or a vote in determining; except that of adopting the Constitution itself in the Convention of Virginia. I consider the day on which the sense of the House is to be taken on this subject as a memorable day in the annals of America. I do not consider the question as, simply, whether the power of removing the great officers of the Government shall be vested in the President, or the President and Senate? The Constitution has determined that point. I do not consider it a question before us to determine, whether officers are to be held during good behaviour, or during the pleasure of those who appoint them? I suppose on a fair and necessary construction of the Constitution, that matter is also settled. All these arguments, therefore, tending to show that the one or the other mode of appointment or removal is proper of improper, or that they ought to be despatched by impeachment, are inapplicable to the present case; but the respectability of the characters who support these arguments entitle them to some respect. But I shall pass over them, and proceed to inquire, whether we may grant the Constitution has not ourselves, powers which the Constitution has not given, either in express terms or by necessary implication? This I conceive to be the true question; and it is a question of the importance which has been stated.

It is not contended, that the power which this bill proposes to vest is given to the President in express terms by the Constitution; or that it can be inferred from any particular clause in that instrument. It is sought for from another source, the general nature of Executive power. It is on this principle the clause is advocated, or I mistake the arguments urged by my colleague, (Mr. MADISON.) It was said by that gentleman, that the Constitution having invested the President with a general Executive power, thereby all those powers were vested which were not expressly excepted; and therefore he possessed the power of removal. This is a doctrine not to be learned in American Governments; is no part of the Constitution of the Union. Each State has an Executive Magistrate; but look at his powers, and I believe it will not be found that he has in any one, of necessity, the right of appointing or removing officers. In Virginia, I know, all the great officers are appointed by the General Assembly. Few, if any, of a subordinate nature are appointed by the Governor, without some modification. The case is generally the same in the other States. If the doctrine of the gentleman is to be supported by examples, it must be by those brought from beyond the Atlantic; we must also look there for rules to circumscribe the latitude of this principle, if indeed it can be limited. Upon the principle by which the Executive powers are expounded, must the Legislative powers be determined. Hence we are to infer, that Congress have all Legislative powers not expressly excepted in the Constitution. If this is the case, and the President is invested with all Executive powers not excepted, I do not know that there can be a more arbitrary Government. The President will have the powers of the most absolute Monarch, and the Legislature all the powers of the most sovereign Legislature, except in those particular instances in which the Constitution has defined their limits. This I take to be a clear and necessary deduction from the principle on which the clause in the bill is founded. I will mention the exceptions, and then let gentlemen form their opinion of the Government, if it is thus constituted. The President is limited in the appointment of ambassadors, consuls, judges, and all other officers, and in making treaties, but no further. Take from him these, and give him all other powers exercised by Monarchs, and see what they will be. There are also exceptions to the Legislative power; such as, they shall not for a certain period prohibit the importation of slaves; that direct taxes shall be apportioned in a particular manner; that duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform; that they shall grant no titles of nobility, no bill of attainder; no ex post facto law shall be passed; no preference in commerce to be given; no money to be drawn but by law. These are the exceptions to the Legislative powers. Now give them all the powers which the Parliament of Great Britain have, and what kind of a Government is yours? I cannot describe it. It appears to me as absolute and extensive as any despotism. Then we must adhere to the limits described in the Constitution. If we advance one step beyond its boundaries, where are we to draw the line to circumscribe our powers, or secure the liberties of our fellow-citizens?

I understand our system as differing in form and spirit from all other Governments in the world. It is in part national, and in part federal; and though it is more extensive in its powers than most other Governments, yet the Congress is not to be compared to National Legislatures; to these general powers are granted, with or without particular reservations in favor of the rights of the people; to these the gentlemen's arguments will apply, but to no other. Here is no analogy. This is a Government constituted for particular purposes only; and the powers granted to carry it into effect are specifically enumerated, and disposed among the various branches. If these powers are insufficient, or if they are improperly distributed, it is not our fault, nor within our power to remedy. The people who bestowed them must grant further powers, organize those already granted in a more perfect manner, or suffer from the defect. We can neither enlarge nor modify them.

This was the ground on which the friends of Government supported the Constitution. It was a safe ground; and I venture to say it could not have been supported on any other. If this principle had not been successfully maintained by its advocates in the convention of the State from which I came, the Constitution would never have been ratified. I do not mean to retail the solemn debates which took place upon this point, or the popular harangues intended to defeat its adoption. I will only quote the ratification by the State of Virginia, in which you will discover, in strong terms, the sense of the federal party on this subject; I say the federal party, because they drew it up without the interference of any other, though it was a clause agreeable to both sides of the House. [The part of the ratification alluded to was a clause proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, to reserve to the States individually the powers not delegated by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it, to the States.]

How far the establishment of the principle which I oppose may tend to the completion of the Union, I will not undertake to say. I will only remark, that the State of North Carolina has expressed nearly the same sense as Virginia, with this difference only, that she would not adopt the Constitution until she was satisfied of the establishment of this great principle, that we should not, by constructive acts, enlarge our powers, in order, at a future day, to swallow up the State Governments. And Virginia took, in my opinion, the more prudent course; she adopted the Constitution under a firm belief that this security would be obtained.

I would suggest to gentlemen the local situation of that State. It is contiguous to Kentucky, and, united with it, forms a territory of amazing extent, from the Atlantic shores to the banks of the Ohio. The people of this tract are in such a situation that a single spark from this House would kindle a flame which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to extinguish, and excite such a dread as would render them utterly irreconcilable to our Government.

This is not a vain fear or apprehension. The opposers of the Constitution formed their arguments upon it. They contended that the Constitution was defective, that you would go beyond it and make constructions in your favor, and assume powers which the people never intended to grant. My apprehensions, therefore, are not mere chimeras of my own invention; I hope they are ill founded, and may be contradicted by the event.

The measure proposed, I acknowledge, is advocated by respectable and known friends of the Union within these doors, and by many without. But I believe much of this arises from the clause in question conferring the power on a man whom all the world admire, and whom they know will never abuse it. But on this occasion I would forget who is President; yet I would not forget that the worst of precedents are often established in the best of times. We may give a power to a particular man in office, because he will not abuse it; but we cannot take it away from his successor, who may be disposed to make an ill use of it. I do not mean to infer from this, that if the Constitution had invested the power in the President, it would be dangerous or improper that he should have it. I do not determine this question, or give an opinion upon it; because it is unnecessary to decide it; the true question before us being simply a Constitutional one.

Without entering into the evils which may arise, as gentlemen on both sides of the House have done, let us consider whether greater evils will not arise from our explaining the Constitution at this time; if such events as I have apprehended should arise from our attempt to exercise an unconstitutional authority, it would more than counterbalance any possible good that can result from our decision within a moderate period of time. But is there any necessity for the measure? If the Constitution has given this power to the President, which some gentlemen suppose, cannot he exercise it without our passing an act on the subject? If the Constitution has not given it to him, shall we go beyond the limits that are set us in order to extend it to him? I hope not. But it seems a difficult point to determine whether he has or has not this power by the Constitution, because some gentlemen contend he has, others that he has not. Why need we be concerned to determine this point? It will be better to leave the construction to himself; if it should become necessary to exercise this authority, let him consider its powers. I will venture to say, the occasion for the exercise of it will be a better comment on the Constitution than any we can give; it will better explain it to the people, and more perfectly reconcile it to them than any law from the Legislature.

It would be better for the President to extend his powers on some extraordinary occasions, even where he is not strictly justified by the Constitution, than that the Legislature should grant an improper power to be exercised at all times. I believe there is not an Executive power but which goes sometimes beyond the strict letter of the law. But a partial evil is easier sustained than a general one. I will relate an example. In Virginia, when the operations of the war required the exertions of the Chief Magistrate beyond the authority of the law, our late Governor, Nelson, whose name must be dear to every friend to liberty, was obliged to issue his warrants, and impress supplies for the army; though it was well known he exceeded his authority. His warrants were executed, his country was benefited by this resolute measure, and he himself afterwards indemnified by the Legislature. This corresponds with the practice under every limited Government. And although I do not wish to encourage acts of this kind, I say it would be better for the Executive to assume the exercise of such a power on extraordinary occasions, than for us to delegate to him authority to exercise an extraordinary power on all occasions.

Some gentlemen have supposed that the Constitution has made no provision for the removal of officers; and they have called it an omitted case, or defect. They ask if we may not supply that defect? I say, in general, we may not; for if we can assume the right of supplying defects and making alterations, we may go on and make the Constitution just what we please. But as a further answer, I say it is not an omitted case; for the Constitution having directed by whom officers shall be appointed, it does direct also by whom they shall be removed. But that doctrine was so well supported yesterday by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. STONE,) that I need not add any thing on that head, and I will not trouble the committee with repetitions. This must have been in the contemplation of the gentlemen who formed the Constitution. Is it probable they never thought about the manner in which an officer should be displaced, when they provided so many regulations relative to it? When they directed that the judges should hold their offices during good behaviour, did they not intend all others should be held during pleasure? So far then from being an omitted case, I contend it is fully provided for by fair construction of the Constitution. I mean, before I sit down, to say something on construction in general, which will throw light on this sentiment.

Gentlemen have supposed that the President may suspend; and that as he has a right to make a temporary appointment, he has also a right to make a temporary removal: I think he has, so far as it corresponds with his power of appointment.

It has been said, if the concurrence of the Senate be necessary, they may refuse to concur when a removal is proper. If we are to suppose that the Government cannot be executed in its present form, there is no remedy for such a misfortune. But we are not to suppose it; we are to presume the Senate will do their duty. You may go on without end in supposing. You may suppose the President may not do what is right; you may even suppose this House may not do what is right; what is the consequence? Why, our constituents must bear with us till they have an opportunity of applying a remedy. But shall we, because the Senate may do wrong, give the President the power to act without them? Is it contended that the President has any superior agency in this business because he nominates? We may as well contend, on the same principle, that because this House has the exclusive power of originating money bills, we may repeal a law of that nature without the consent of the Senate. It has been asked, whether a person in the elevated station of the President would abuse his trust? I do not presume he will, but I presume he may: to prevent such evils, the Constitution has wisely guarded the exercise of every power. But I would ask, is there more danger of the Senate's abusing their trust than the President's? A gentleman (Mr. SHERMAN) has resorted to that part of the Constitution which says, that Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments; and infers from hence, that the President is to consider himself as the head of all these departments. These arguments come from a gentleman whom I always hear with pleasure, on account of his sound reasoning and perspicuity of expression; but, in this case, I differ from him widely. Who are the heads of departments? We are to have a Secretary for Foreign Affairs, another for War, and another for the Treasury; now, are not these the principal officers in those departments? They are denominated such in the bills, and in the former resolution of the House; if they are, they are the heads of those departments. But who are the inferior officers? The chief clerks, and all others who may depend upon them. These, then, are the inferior officers, whose appointments may be vested in the respective heads of departments. I would beg just to observe here, that the gentlemen who formed the Constitution seem not inclined, at all events, to give to the President the power of appointing even these inferior officers, to which is attached the power of removal.

When I set out, I said that the Constitution marks the precise limits to the deliberations of Congress, and also something with respect to construction; it may, at first view, appear somewhat inconsistent. I promised to explain on this head. I say, sir, that whatever is granted in general terms, that which is in its own nature attached to it, and necessary to render that grant of effect, must also go with it, without particular explanation. Without this principle Congress could not execute the system of Government. To elucidate this point, you will observe, that the Constitution vests in the Government the power of appointing supreme and inferior judges. By natural and necessary construction, therefore, the Legislature may say how many judges there shall be, how often, and where they may hold their terms, and what their salaries shall be. These are natural and safe constructions; but constructions of every other kind are beyond the limits of the Constitution.

I should not have troubled the committee so long; but on a matter of so much importance, one that lies so heavily on my mind, and for which I am so anxiously concerned, I could not avoid expressing my sentiments fully. I am strongly impressed with the idea, that giving powers which are not within the letter of the Constitution, will be to the people a circumstance of alarm and terror. I would wish to avoid exciting apprehensions, and therefore leave the power to the discretion of the Chief Magistrate; let him exercise it, if he judges it necessary, on any occasion; and that circumstance may reconcile the people to it. This brings to my mind an observation made on Legislative construction. I imagine the Legislature may construe the Constitution with respect to the powers annexed to their department, but subject to the decision of the judges. The same with regard to the Executive: the President and Senate may construe the power in question, and as they determine respecting the mode of removal, so they may act, but liable also to the decision of the Judiciary.

Mr. PAGE.—I cannot acquit myself of the duty I owe to my constituents and my own feelings, to pass this subject with a silent vote. I recollect when this argument was first brought forward, that great stress was laid upon increasing the President's responsibility. I think it had more weight with some gentlemen than it deserved; for, instead of increasing his responsibility, I think it diminishes it—because I hold it an incontrovertible maxim, that the more power you give him, the more his responsibility is lessened. By making the heads of all the departments dependent upon the President, you enable him to swallow up all the powers of Government; you increase his influence, and every one will be studious to please him alone. This was never the intention of the Constitution, or he would have the sole power of appointing. The framers of the Government had confidence in the Senate, or they would not have combined them with the Executive in the performance of his duties. The Constitution also has confidence in the heads of departments: the President is directed to have their advice relative to the particular duties of their stations. Now, what necessity let me ask gentlemen, was there for a Constitutional provision to enable the President to obtain their advice if it was understood that all such officers were to be the mere creatures of the President, dependent upon his will alone? Would not such a situation compel them to do every thing he directed?

The clause in the Constitution which provides that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, high crimes and misdemeanors, plainly includes all officers and offences which it is in contemplation to make the President sole judge of. I ask gentlemen, then, if the clause in the bill is not subversive of the right which the Senate holds under this clause of the Constitution?

I would caution those gentlemen who are so fond of energy in their Government, that they do not go too far, and lay the foundation of a future despotism. By this grant of power you secure the President against impeachment; you fence him round with a set of dependent officers, through whom alone it is probable you could come at the evidence of the President's guilt, in order to obtain his conviction on impeachment.

It has been said, if we strike out the words in the bill, we shall leave this power to the Senate. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that it is safer to leave it to the President and Senate than to the President alone; but I do not conceive that we decide the question, by any means; when we strike out the clause, we leave it only where we found it.

Some gentlemen contend that the Senate are a dangerous and aristocratic body; but I contend that they are a safe and salutary branch of the Government, representing the republican Legislatures of the individual States, and intended to preserve the sovereignty and independence of the State Governments, which they are more likely to do than the President, who is elected by the people at large. A popular President, influenced by the sentiments of his electors, may be induced to believe that it would be best for the general interest that those Governments were destroyed; but as long as we have that body independent of him, and secured in their authority, we may defy such impotent attempts; they will watch his conduct, and prevent the exercise of despotic power. But if they are weakened and stripped of their essential authority, they will become weak barriers against the strides of an uncontrolled power. If you take from them their right to check the President in the removal of officers, they cannot prevent the dismissal of a faithful servant, who has opposed the arbitrary mandates of an ambitious President. The principles laid down in the Constitution clearly evince that the Senate ought not only to have a voice in the framing of laws, but ought also to see to their execution.

If this clause is inserted in the bill, it will excite the jealousy of the people; and I venture to predict, there will be a tenfold clamor for amendments to the Constitution. I myself shall never be satisfied unless I see fourfold checks upon the President. It will inevitably lead to the establishment of those odious prerogatives which we, by an arduous conflict, have been endeavoring to get rid of.

I will not take up more of your time, Mr. Chairman; but I call on the gentlemen to reflect. They must see plainly, that conferring this power, so far from making the President more responsible, diminishes his responsibility, and inclines to establish him an independent monarch.

Mr. SENECA.—Notwithstanding the length of the debate, and the fatigue gentlemen have undergone, I still flatter myself that the importance of the subject will entitle me to a further indulgence. It is not, however, my intention to traverse the vast field which lies before me, nor attempt a general discussion, after what has taken place. My intention at present is to remark upon two or three cases that have particularly struck my mind. First, it is contended, on each side of the question, that it is already a matter of Constitutional determination; and, if so, gentlemen on one side say there is no necessity for the interpretation of the Legislature upon it. Again, it is contended that the power of removing is incidental to the power of appointing, and necessarily consequential upon it. In forming the Union, did it necessarily follow that the convention should give the one as incidental to the other? I believe gentlemen will hardly extend their arguments so far. Then the rule is by no means well founded; and the Constitution might have given the power of appointment to one branch of the Government, and the removal to another.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WARRE) has laid down a leading principle in the Government, that where a general authority is granted to one branch, every thing subordinate and necessary to effect the object follows of course. The power of creating offices is given to the Legislature. Under this general grant, the Legislature have it under their supreme decision to determine the whole organization, to affix the tenure, and declare the control. This right of determining arises, not from express words, but by natural construction. So the Legislature may determine that an office may be held three, five, or seven years; to be removed by the President, the President and Senate, or the Legislature, or any other person whom they might introduce into office, merely for that particular purpose. This appears to me to be the true construction; and unless something as decisive is shown from the Constitution, I shall favor this opinion.

I am obliged to contradict, and would therefore ask pardon for the observation. It is not conceded on one side, though affirmed on the other, that the power of appointing vests in any sense in the Senate. The words in the Constitution, (and the arguments have been drawn only from their construction,) lead to a different object. It is therein said that the President shall nominate and appoint: the words are clear. Now, if we take another power, which is made analogous in the same clause, the power of making treaties, will any one contend that treaties are made by the Senate?

The words in this instance are: "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties." So the legislative power is lodged in the Senate and House of Representatives; yet this legislative power is exercised to a certain degree under the influence of the Executive Magistrate. But has it ever been considered, that the President constitutes part of the Legislature? Why, therefore, will gentlemen contend, that the influence which one branch of the Legislature has over the Executive, vests that branch with Executive powers? The doctrine of the Constitution is the reverse of this. I shall not undertake to say that it is with more plausibility contended that the power of removal is constitutionally in the President; because the powers of Government, being distributed among distinct bodies, and all executive authority being vested in him, he therefore has it of course. But I think the fact may be as fairly inferred upon the principle of the gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. WHITTE,) in favor of the President, who expressly nominates and appoints, as in favor of the President and Senate. But these arguments have been held up in so many points of view, that it will be time misapplied further to dwell upon them: it was with another view that I arose.

It will be agreed on all hands, that this officer, without observing on the subject at large, is merely to supply a natural incompetency in man. In other words, if we could find a President capable of executing this and all other business assigned to him, it would be unnecessary to introduce any other officer to aid him. It is, then, merely from necessity that we institute such an office; because all the duties detailed in the bill are, by the Constitution, pertaining to the department of the Executive Magistrate. If the question respected the expediency, I should be content to advocate it on that ground. If expediency is at all to be considered, gentlemen will perceive that this man is as much an instrument in the hands of the President, as the pen is the instrument of the Secretary in corresponding with foreign Courts. If, then, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs is the mere instrument of the President, one would suppose, on the principle of expediency, this officer should be dependent upon him. It would seem incongruous and absurd, that an officer who, in the reason and nature of things, is dependent on his principal, and appointed merely to execute such business as is committed to the charge of his superior, (for this business, I contend, is committed solely to his charge,) I say it would be absurd, in the highest degree, to continue such a person in office contrary to the will of the President, who is responsible that the business be conducted with propriety, and for the general interest of the nation. The President is made responsible; and shall he not judge of the talents, abilities, and integrity of his instruments? Will you depend on a man who has imposed upon the President, and continue him in office when he is evidently disqualified, unless he can be removed by impeachment? If this idea should prevail, which God forbid, what would be the result? Suppose even that he should be removable, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, what a wretched situation might not our public councils be involved in! Suppose the President has a Secretary, in whom he discovers a great degree of ignorance, or a total incapacity to conduct the business he has assigned him; suppose him inimical to the President, or suppose any of the great variety of cases which would be good cause for removal, and impress the propriety of such a measure strongly on the mind of the President, without any other evidence than what exists in his own ideas, from a contemplation of the man's conduct and character day by day—what, let me ask, is to be the consequence, if the Senate are to be applied to? If they are to do any thing in this business, I presume they are to deliberate, because they are to advise and consent. If they are to deliberate, you put them between the officer and the President. They are then to inquire into the causes of removal; the President must produce his testimony. How is the question to be investigated? Because, I presume, there must be some rational rule for conducting this business. Is the President to be sworn to declare the whole truth, and to bring forward facts? or are they to admit suspicion as testimony? or is the word of the President to be taken at all events?

If so, this check is not of the least efficacy in nature. But if proof be necessary, what is then the consequence? Why, in nine cases out of ten, where the case is very clear to the mind of the President that the man ought to be removed, the effect cannot be produced, because it is absolutely impossible to produce the necessary evidence. Are the Senate to proceed without evidence? Some gentlemen contend not. Then the object will be lost. Shall a man, under these circumstances, be saddled upon the President, who has been appointed for no other purpose but to aid the President in performing certain duties? Shall he be continued, I ask again, against the will of the President? If he is, where is the responsibility? Are you to look for it in the President, who has no control over the officer, no power to remove him if he acts unfeelingly or unfaithfully? Without you make him responsible, you weaken and destroy the strength and beauty of your system. What is to be done in cases which can only be known from a long acquaintance with the conduct of an officer? But so much has been said on this subject, that I will add no further observations upon it.

Let me ask, what will be the consequence of striking out these words? Is the officer to be continued during an indefinite time? For it has been contended that he cannot be removed but by impeachment. Others have contended that he is always in the power of those who appoint him. But who will undertake to remove him? Will the President undertake to exercise an authority which has been so much doubted here, and which will appear to be determined against him, if we consent to strike out the words? Will the Senate undertake to exercise this power? I apprehend they will not. But if they should, would they not also be brought before the judges, to show by what authority they did it? Because it is supposed by one gentleman, that the case might go before that tribunal, if the President alone removed the officer. But how is this to be done? Gentlemen tell you, that the man who is displaced must apply for a mandamus to admit him to his office. I doubt much if this would be adequate to the purpose. It would be difficult to say whether the mandamus should be directed to the President, to the President and Senate, to the Legislature, or to the people. Could the President be compelled to answer in a civil suit, for exercising the powers vested in him by law and by the Constitution? The question upon either of those points would be involved in doubt and difficulty.

If these observations strike the committee in the same point of light, and with the same force that they have struck my mind, they will proceed to determine the present question, and I have no doubt they will determine rightly.

Mr. LEE.—I agree with my worthy colleague, (Mr. WHITTE,) that the day on which this question shall be decided will be a memorable day, not only in the history of our own times, but in the history of mankind; that on a proper or improper decision, will be involved the future happiness or misery of the people of America. Viewing the subject in this light, I am influenced by its importance, and weigh with scrupulous attention the arguments which induce a preponderation in either scale. Hitherto, they appear favorable to that decision which accords with my sentiments of expediency and Constitutionality. I hope that a great majority of this House coalesce in these sentiments; for I trust, upon mature reflection and full discussion, the reasoning of the gentlemen in opposition will be found to be more specious than solid.

My colleague has said, that if the principle that all powers of an Executive nature, except such as are qualified in the Constitution, belong by implication to the President, and the same principle is applied to the Legislature, this Government would be the most tyrannical on earth.

[Mr. WHITTE interrupted Mr. LEE, and declared he never made use of such an expression: he said it would possess the powers of the most absolute Government.]

Mr. LEE.—The gentleman should remember that this Government is not vested with those ample powers which he contemplated when he made this observation. This Government is invested with powers for enumerated purposes only, and cannot exercise any others whatever.

He advises us to adhere strictly to the Constitution. I hope we shall. But I would not act under the influence of arguments addressed to the passions of the committee. This, sir, is a subject to be decided on cool and dispassionate reasoning, and not in the heat of fervid declamation, or under the fears and apprehensions arising from the situation of North Carolina or Kentucky: such references, therefore, appear to me unfit to be made on the present occasion. I hope no gentleman will conceive that this is a power that can in any way endanger the general welfare; I believe it can do no such thing.

It has been said by my colleague, (Mr. WHITTE,) that the Constitution does not vest the power of making this declaration by law. Here, sir, I disagree with him; because the Constitution vests in Congress power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. Now, he admits that the Constitution vests the power of removal, by necessary implication, in the Government of the United States. Have not Congress, therefore, the power of making what laws they think proper to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States?

It is laid down as a maxim in Government by all judicious writers, that the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers, should be kept as separate and distinct as possible, in order to secure the liberties of the people. And this maxim is founded on the experience of ages; for we find, that however Governments have been established, however modified in their names or forms, if these powers are blended in or exercised by one body, the effects are ever the same; the public liberty is destroyed.

The several States, in forming their constitutions, have attended particularly to this sacred maxim. We find they sedulously separated these powers of Government; and many of their declarations of rights were intended to perpetuate the inviolable truth. The framers of the Constitution of the United States came from among the people, who venerated this general principle; they were the select and honored sons of those people, who, like them, were impressed with sovereign respect for a truth which supported the great object of a good and free Government. Characters like these, with such impressions, were not likely to forego principles in which they were nurtured. Did they forego them? Examine the result of their deliberations, and see how carefully they are preserved. They have divided our Government into three principal branches, with express declarations, that all Legislative power shall rest in one, all Executive in another, and the whole Judicial in a third. It is our bounden duty to imitate their great example, and to support the separation which they have formed. The Legislature has the power to create and establish offices; but it is their duty so to modify them as to make them conform to the general spirit of the Constitution. The people ought to know what belongs to each department; what belongs to the Executive Magistrate, and what is expected from him. Upon what can their sense be exercised, unless they know the particular powers invested in every branch? If a mischievous Legislative act be passed, they look to the Legislature, they remonstrate with you, and ask, why was this done? If a wicked Executive act is perpetrated, they look to the Executive Magistrate, and ask, why did you do this, or suffer it to be done? If an improper decision takes place in a court of law, they ask of the Judiciary to correct the error. It is by separating and keeping distinct these powers, that the public jealousy can be directed to those objects which are most necessary to be watched; they can discover the error, and know who to blame. But if the powers are blended, their attention is divided, and the responsibility, if not annihilated, is greatly diminished. On the public jealousy, therefore, the freedom of the Government exists; for if the Government is not watched, it either becomes negligent or tyrannical; and to induce the people to keep an observing eye over the actions of men in power, they must have their object specific and single.

Now, as I contend we have the power to modify the establishment of officers, so ought we, Mr. Chairman, to modify them in such a way as to promote the general welfare, which can only be done by keeping the three branches distinct; by informing the people where to look, in order to guard against improper Executive acts. It is our duty, therefore, to vest all Executive power belonging to the Government, where the convention intended it should be placed. It adds to the responsibility of the most responsible branch of the Government, and, without responsibility, we should have little security against the depredations and gigantic strides of arbitrary power. I say it is necessary, sir, to hold up a single and specific object to the public jealousy to watch; therefore it is necessary to connect the power of removal with the President. The Executive is the source of all appointments; it is his responsibility complete unless he has the power of removal. If he has this power, it will be his fault if any wicked or mischievous action is committed; and he will hardly expose himself to the resentment of three millions of people, of whom he holds his power, and to whom he is accountable every four years.

If the power of removal is vested in the Senate, it is evident, at a single view, that the responsibility is dissipated, because the fault cannot be fixed on any individual; besides, the members of the Senate are not accountable to the people; they are the representatives of the State Legislatures; but even if they were, they have no powers to enable them to decide with propriety in the case of removals, and therefore are improper persons to exercise such authority.

Mr. Boudinot.—Notwithstanding the long investigation which this question has undergone, I must beg the attention of the committee to a few sentiments further. I have attended with the greatest care to the arguments which have been brought forward on both sides. I respect the characters of the gentlemen who advocate the amendment; their arguments have struck me with considerable force, and induced me to tread with caution. Sir, the efficacy of our Government must depend upon the determination of this House respecting the present question. For my part, I shall certainly attend to the terms of the Constitution in making a decision; indeed, I never wish to see them departed from or construed, if the Government can possibly be carried into effect in any other manner. But I do not agree with the gentlemen that Congress have no right to modify principles established by the Constitution; for, if this doctrine be true, we have no business here. Can the Constitution be executed if its principles are not modified by the Legislature? A Supreme Court is established by the Constitution; but do gentlemen contend that we cannot modify that court, direct the manner in which its functions shall be performed, and assign and limit its jurisdiction? I conceive, notwithstanding the ingenious arguments of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE,) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that there has not been, nor can be, any solid reason adduced to prove that this House has not power to modify the principles of the Constitution. But is the principle now in dispute to be found in the Constitution? If it is to be found there, it will serve as a line to direct the modification by Congress. But we are told that the members of this House appear to be afraid to carry the principles of the Constitution into effect. I believe, sir, we were not sent here to carry into effect every principle of the Constitution; but I hope, whenever we are convinced it is for the benefit of the United States to carry any of them into effect, we shall not hesitate. Under these impressions, the committee will conceive with me, that every thing relative to the situation of North Carolina and Kentucky ought to be thrown out of the question. What influence ought North Carolina to have over this body? They are not represented; we are to consider the question on its own merits, and, if we find it calculated to increase the public security, we need not hesitate from an apprehension so uncertain, so visionary, as the one that has been laid before us.

Having premised thus far, I shall offer a few remarks upon what has been advanced by the gentlemen who support the motion for striking out the clause; and I shall endeavor to show, even on their own principles, that this power is vested in the President of the United States, and ought to be so decided by Congress.

Department of Foreign Affairs.

[H. or R.]

The principle of the Constitution is generally to vest the Government in three branches. I conceive this to be completely done, if we allow for one or two instances, where the Executive and Legislative powers are intermixed, and the case of impeachment. These cases I take to be exceptions to a principle which is highly esteemed in America. Let gentlemen attend to what was said by some of the conventions when they ratified the Constitution. One great objection was, that the powers were not totally separated. The same objection is, I believe, to be found among the amendments proposed by the State of North Carolina. Now, I conceive, if we do any thing to conciliate the minds of the people to the Constitution, we ought not to modify the principle of the Government, so as to increase the evil complained of, by a further blending of the Executive and Legislative powers, and that too upon construction, when gentlemen deny that we ought to use construction in any case.

Now let us take the Constitution, and consider, from the terms and principles of it, in whom this power is vested. It is said by some gentlemen to be an omitted case; I shall take up the other principle, which is easier to be maintained, that it is not an omitted case, and say the power of removal is vested in the President. I shall also take up the principle laid down by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE) at the beginning of his argument, that, agreeably to the nature of all Executive powers, it is right and proper that the person who appoints should remove. This leads me to consider in whom the appointment is vested by the Constitution. The President nominates and appoints; he is further expressly authorized to commission all officers. Now, does it appear from this distribution of power that the Senate appoints? Does an officer exercise powers by authority of the Senate? No; I believe the President is the person from whom he derives his authority. He appoints, but under a check; it is necessary to obtain the consent of the Senate; but after that is obtained, I ask who appoints? Who vests the officer with authority? Who commissions him? The President does these acts by his sole power, but they are exercised in consequence of the advice of another branch of the Government. If, therefore, the officer receives his authority and commission from the President, surely the removal follows as a coincidence.

Now, let us examine whether this construction consists with the true interests of the United States, and the general principles of the Constitution. It consists with the general principles of the Constitution; because the Executive power is given to the President, and it is by reason of his incapacity that we are called upon to appoint assistants. Mention, to be sure, is made of the principal officers in departments; but it is from construction only that we derive our power to constitute this particular office. If we were not at liberty to modify the principles of the Constitution, I do not see how we could erect an office of Foreign Affairs. If we establish an office avowedly to aid the President, we leave the conduct of it to his discretion. Hence the whole Executive is to be left with him. Agreeably to this maxim, all Executive power shall be vested in a President. But how does this comport with the true interest of the United States? Let me ask gentlemen where they suspect danger? Is it not made expressly the duty of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs to obey such orders as shall be given to him by the President? And would you keep in office a man who should refuse or neglect to do the duties assigned him? Is not the President responsible for the Administration? He certainly is. How then can the public interest suffer?

Then, if we find it to be naturally inferred from the principles of the Constitution, coincident with the nature of his duty, that this officer should be dependent upon him, and to the benefit of the United States for what purpose shall Congress refuse a legislative declaration of the Constitution, and leave it to remain a doubtful point? Because, if Congress refuses to determine, we cannot conceive that others will be more entitled to decide upon it than we are. This will appear to give ground for what gentlemen have asserted, that we are afraid to carry the Constitution into effect. This, I apprehend, will not be doing our duty.

Gentlemen say they have a sufficient remedy for every evil likely to result from connecting the Senate with the President. This they propose to do by allowing the power of suspension. This, in the first place, does not answer the end, because there is a possibility that the officer may not be displaced after a hearing before the Senate. And, in the second place, it is entirely inconsistent with the whole course of reasoning pursued by the gentlemen in opposition. I would ask them, if the Constitution does not give to the President the power of removal, what part is it that gives the power of suspension? If you will, in one case, construe the Constitution, you may do it in another; for I look upon it as dangerous to give the power of suspension by implication, as to give the full power of removal. Gentlemen observe, that I take it for granted that the President has no express right to the power of suspension, and that, if he is to exercise it, it must be drawn by constructive reasoning alone from the Constitution. If we are to exercise our authority, we had better at once give a power that would answer two valuable purposes, than one altogether nugatory. In the first place, it would entirely separate the Legislative and Executive departments, conformably to the great principles of the Constitution; and, in the second place, it would answer the end of Government better, and secure real benefits to the Union.

The fears of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE) appear to me unfounded. Why does he suppose the inhabitants of North Carolina will take umbrage at our decision? It cannot be because we are averse to uniting the Executive and Legislative departments; because they are avowed opponents to that doctrine. They cannot be afraid of the President, by reason of his having the power to exercise such authority, for the danger does not lie on that side. The great evil, as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) yesterday is, that bad officers shall continue in office, and not that good ones may be removed; yet this last is all that is in the power of the President. If he removes a good officer, he cannot appoint his successor without the consent of the Senate; and it is fairly to be presumed, that if at any time he should be guilty of such an oversight, as to remove a useful and valuable officer, the evil will be small, because another as valuable will be placed in his stead. If it is said that this is an injury to the individual, I confess that it is possible that it may be so. But ought we not in the first place to consult the public good? But on mature consideration, I do not apprehend any very great injury will result to the individual from this practice; because, when he accepts of the office, he knows the tenure by which he is to hold it, and ought to be prepared against every contingency.

These being the principles on which I have formed my opinion, in addition to what was stated, I do conceive that I am perfectly justified to my constituents and to my oath, to support this construction. And when I give my vote that the President ought to have the power of removal from office, I do it on principle; and gentlemen in the opposition will leave us to the operation of our judgments on this, as well as every other question that comes before us. For my part, I conceive it is impossible to carry into execution the powers of the President in a salutary manner, unless he has the power of removal vested in him. I do not mean, that if it was not vested in him by the Constitution, it would be proper for Congress to confer it; though I do believe the Government would otherwise be very defective, yet we would have to bear this inconvenience until it was rectified by an amendment of the Constitution. For my part, I would adhere to every principle contained in it, however defective, and not infringe it for any purpose whatever. In so doing, we shall be justified by our constituents, and have nothing to dread from those apprehensions which have been held out; because I trust in the good sense of our fellow-citizens, that while we do our duty, they will not be backward on their part, to conform to theirs.

Mr. Jackson.—I think it necessary to answer a few of the arguments that have been brought forward on the other side of the House, although I am well satisfied the subject has been worn threadbare. With respect to what has been said about the business being ingeniously handled, I agree with the gentleman that the discussion of the bill has been ingenious; and it has been ingeniously brought forward; for the committee have taken care to bring in the present bill, previous to the bill for organizing the Treasury, that the principle might be established before that more delicate business came into view.

A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Sedgwick) has brought forward some arguments which are of great weight. But whilst I acknowledge their weight generally, I must beg leave to differ with him in one particular. He conceives the President, or President and Senate, to be the head of all the Executive departments of Government. Now I cannot see it in this point of light. I would ask where is the necessity, if this doctrine was true, of grafting into the Constitution a power to authorize the President to receive the advice of the Senate; and require the opinion in writing of the heads of departments? I appeal to the good sense of the committee to determine whether these offices are not established by the Constitution as heads of departments. How then can they be merely instruments of the President, to conform implicitly to his will? For I deny the principle that they are mere creatures of the law. They have Constitutional rights which they may exercise. If the President alone is the head of the whole Executive Department, and these the mere creatures of law, where is the necessity of calling their heads of departments in the Constitution? Surely the convention did not use a redundancy of words, and insert a clause without a meaning. They either must have done this, or contemplated your Secretary of Foreign Affairs as head of an Executive Department. Where else shall we search for a meaning? Shall we look into the bill now before the House? That bill states gentlemen in the face; it acknowledges the Secretary of Foreign Affairs to be the head of a department. Shall the Constitution be taken up and construed? If it is, it should not be construed in the manner which the gentlemen have adopted.

I agree with the honorable member last up, that we have a right to modify the judiciary system, and, in doing this, that construction is necessary. But it is a construction of a different kind from what is now contended for; we have a right to extend the powers of that department by construction. There is a great difference between organizing and modifying a department, and modifying the principles of the Constitution; there would be great danger in this. If we begin once to construe and define the principles of the Constitution, there is no end to our power; we may begin with the alpha and go to the omega, changing, reversing, and subverting every principle contained in it. This never can be the meaning of the Constitution; this never was the intention of our constituents; they never sent us here for the purpose of altering the system of Government; they reserved that power to themselves.

I differ with gentlemen who say that the Senate have no part of the Executive power, or that the President has no part of the Legislative authority. I consider them as checks upon each other, to prevent the abuse of either; and it is in this way the liberties of the people are secured. I appeal for the truth of this sentiment to the writings of Publius. He has proved that the Senate is a check upon the Executive, for the express purpose of securing the freedom of the people.

Department of Foreign Affairs.

[H. or R.]

Gentlemen have come forward and told us that a power of this kind is necessary to prevent a misapplication of the public money; and to make the officer completely controllable by the President, would be the best security for his fidelity. But the vigilance of the House of Representatives, and the power of impeachment and punishment, would be a better security; for, if the President has the power of removing all officers who may be virtuous enough to oppose his base measures, what would become of the liberties of our fellow-citizens? Your treasury would fall into his hands; for nobody in that department would dare to oppose him. Having then the army and the treasury at his command, we might bid a farewell to the liberties of America forever. The balance would be on his side; and if we were to lose the benefit of the Constitution for a day, a month, or a year, it could never be regained, but by an arduous and dreadful conflict. I repeat it again, there are but two things necessary to make a man a despot, the purse and the sword. The Constitution gives to the President the power of the latter, and the Legislature is about to give the power of the former into his hands; when this is done the liberties of the people are surrendered to his discretion.

Gentlemen have said that the power in the hands of the Senate would be equally dangerous; but let me ask them whether most danger is to be apprehended from a power vested in the hands of one or many? Besides, the Senate is a body perpetually changing, returning to, and removing from the mass of the people, which will also be continually watched over by the State Legislatures. It will be readily admitted, that the State Governments are good sentinels and proper checks over their conduct. In this view, I look upon the Senate as a more harmless body than gentlemen seem inclined to suppose it. But it is not so with the President—he is Constitutionally armed with high and dangerous powers, which, if left unchecked and unrestrained, might be productive of dangerous consequences. But to extend those powers would increase the danger to an alarming degree; if you grant him the power of removing whom he pleases from office, you will give him a complete control over the whole Treasury Department. Having got the sword, give him the purse, with the army and navy, and what is there left for him to require? With the command of the strong box, he would be able to raise up a legion of officers to support his measures, secure his election, and thus perpetuate his political existence. Gentlemen will not contend that there is no fear of corruption, when the President has the power of bribing by a disposal of the public treasure among his partisans. Let us look round at this moment, and see the progress we are making towards venality and corruption. We already hear the sounding title of Highness and Most Honorable trumpeted in our ears, which, ten years since, would have exalted a man to a station as high as Haman's gibbet. These titles have been echoed, even in the Boston papers, a town which, fifteen years ago, would acknowledge no lord but the Lord of Hosts.

I call upon gentlemen to show me, why the heads of departments are necessarily dependent upon the President, when the Constitution specifically points them out. I cannot, for my part, admit that any part of the Constitution authorizes the President to exercise an uncontrolled power over them, because I perceive, as a fundamental principle in the Constitution, that the exercise of all power should be properly checked and guarded; and the Senate is the proper check on the President, and the President on the Senate and this House. These being my sentiments, and conceiving it the only way to secure the rights of the people, I shall be against the clause, and hope it may be rejected.

Mr. Scott.—Before I call again for the question, although I confess I have been long since ready for it, I beg leave to say a few words, and I assure the committee I do not mean to be tedious. I have listened to the arguments in support of this motion these three days with great attention, and think, when taken together, they consist in this, the raising of a great number of frightful pictures, which, at first sight, appear very terrible; but when they are attentively contemplated, they appear to be the vagaries of a disordered imagination. Let us examine one or two of these frightful pictures, merely as a sample of the whole set, and see what they amount to. The most frightful of all that has been brought into view is, that the Treasurer must be the mere creature of the President, and conform to all his directions, or he arbitrarily removes him from office, and lays his hands violently upon the money chest; then, having the sword and the purse, you see the President boldly advancing, supported by the army and navy, and the money chest in the back ground, engaging the liberties of the people; armed with all this omnipotence of power, the protector rushes onward with irresistible impetuosity;—so sudden and fatal is the stroke, that the expiring Genius of America has hardly time faintly to say, Farewell Liberty! Thus despotism rides triumphant, and freedom and happiness are trampled in the dust. Strange, that all this should arise from the Executive Magistrate having the power of removal. But gentlemen tell us, that if we keep the Treasurer out of the power of the President, he cannot injure us; that, being thus independent, your strong box will be well guarded, and the President cannot get your money unless he steals it; and if he steals it, and the Treasurer sees him, he will tell. This will lead to an impeachment, and we shall get rid of the cause of our apprehensions. But the Constitution says, that no money shall be taken out of the Treasury but by appropriations: this alone, I think, a sufficient answer to all that has been said, and will serve to soften down the harsh features which the terrible picture I have just now mentioned displayed. I say, sir, our money may be in the Treasary by millions, and, without special appropriation by the Legislature, neither the President, Treasurer, nor both together, can touch a farthing of it, unless they steal it. This being the case, I see as little security to the Treasury in the independence of this officer, as danger arising from his dependence, without a single exception; for if the President, with a strong army at his back, comes violently to lay hold of the money chest, this officer stands but a very poor security against such a power. I think the President, supported with the army and navy, making a descent upon your Treasury, would be very apt to carry away the money. Arguments like these may tend to amuse, but they can make no serious impression; it is only drawing pictures on a wall, in order to batter them down with our own knuckles.

Another picture is drawn, by way of comparison, between the Senate and the President; and we have gone into arguments to prove who are nearest akin to the people. Here we have run deep into the science of calculating kindred; and it seems to be concluded by the supporters of this motion, that the Senate is much nearer related to them than the President. Therefore, the latter, as a stranger, must not be entrusted with the removal of officers, but our kinsmen, the Senate, may. But is this a fair construction of the relationship? Is anything more plain than that the President, above all the officers of Government, both from the manner of his appointment, and the nature of his duties, is truly and justly denominated the man of the people? Is there any other person who represents so many of them as the President? He is elected by the voice of the people of the whole Union; the Senate are the Representatives of the State sovereignties; the Representatives of that species of beings which, if anything stands in the way of the just execution of the Federal Government, they are the creatures. The separate sovereignties of the several States are the most effectual bar to prevent the operations of the present system; yet this body is held up as more nearly related to the people than the President himself, when no man in the United States has their concurrent voice but him. Hence it appears, that, although this picture is not quite so ludicrous as the first, it is equally a caricature; and so of the rest. Sir, I have really felt amazed how these kind of arguments ever found their way into the minds of wise and enlightened men.

Mr. GOODHUE.—It has long been an opinion entertained of the people of America, that they would not trust the Government with the power of doing good lest it should be abused; but, contrary to the expectation of its enemies, a Constitution is formed providing those powers which we suffered so much for want of under the old Confederation. The question on the present occasion seems to stand on nearly the same ground, whether we shall trust the power of doing good to the Executive Magistrate, or deprive him of it for fear he may abuse it. The Constitution has recognised three great branches of the Government, and distributed among them all the powers which are granted. I conceive, therefore, in no case whatever can any kind of construction be put to lessen the powers of either of those branches. The only security which the Constitution means to give us is, to call the officers of Government to account if they abuse their powers, and not to cramp their exercise so as to make them inefficient.

It is contended by some gentlemen, that the Constitution has, by implication, vested the power of removal in the President and Senate; but are we to decide a question by implication in favor of the Senate, and not to construe any part of the Constitution in favor of the President? It has also been said, that the power would be more safe in the hands of the Senate than in that of the President; but I do not view it in that light. It has, however, been justly shown, that it would be a very inconvenient and useless power for them to be possessed of it. It is in nothing similar to the power they have in appointments. There they are really useful by their advice; because it is more probable that the Senate may be better acquainted with the characters of the officers that are nominated than the President himself. But after their appointments such knowledge is little required. The officer is placed under the control of the President; and it is only through him that the improper conduct of a person in a subordinate situation can be known. He therefore is the only person who can properly apply the remedy; unless, indeed, the officer's mal-practices are so conspicuous as to furnish ground for impeachment; and this power, vested by the Constitution in the House of Representatives and Senate, will apply the remedy in such case, if the President should neglect, or if the officer should be a favorite of his. Moreover, it appears very clear to me, that the Senate, who are a judicial body, ought not to meddle with the business of removal; because they will have prejudged the case, if an impeachment should thereafter be made.

Mr. JACKSON.—I admit, sir, the justness of an old observation, that ridicule is the test of truth. I would rather, that my arguments were caricatured against a wall, to be battered down by my own knuckles, than join a system forging chains for my country. It will be a matter of small consolation to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when the hour of repentance arrives, that he has been facetious at the expense of his fellow-citizens' security.

Mr. GERRY.—So far, Mr. Chairman, am I from feeling hurt by the ludicrous situation in which our arguments are placed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I am obliged to him for the relaxation it has afforded. These sportive fancies unbend the mind, and make us in better humor with each other. But no gentleman expects that we shall be laughed out of our reason or our liberty.

The Parliament of England is one of the most important bodies on earth; but they can do nothing without the concurrence of the Executive Magistrate. The Congress of the United States are likely to become a more important body; the Executive Magistrate has but a qualified negative over them. The Parliament of England, with the consent of the King, can expound their Constitution; in fact, they are the Constitution itself. And Congress may, if once the doctrine of construction is established, make the Constitution what they please; and the President can have no control over them.

It has been said by my colleague, (Mr. SEPOWICK,) that the President not only nominates, but appoints the officers; and infers from hence, that as the power of removal is incidental to the power of appointing, the President has the power of removal also. But I should be glad to know how it can, with justice, be said that the President appoints. The Constitution requires the consent of the Senate; therefore they are two distinct bodies, and intended to check each other. If my colleague's is a true construction, it may be extended further, and it may be said, that in the act of nominating, the assent of the Senate is virtually given; and, therefore, he has a right to make the whole appointment himself, without any interference on the part of the Senate. I contend, sir, that there is just as much propriety in the one construction as in the other. If we observe the enacting style of the statutes of Great Britain, we shall find pretty nearly the same words as those used in the Constitution, with respect to appointments.—“Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of Parliament.” Here it might be said that the King enacts all laws; but I believe the truth of this fact will be disputed in that country. I believe no one will pretend to say that the King is the three branches of Parliament; and, unless my colleague will do all this, I never can admit that the President in himself has the power of appointment.

My colleague has gone further, to show the dependence of this officer on the President. He says, the necessity of appointing a Secretary of Foreign Affairs arises from a natural defect in man; that if the President were able to administer all these departments, there would be no occasion of making provision by law. If the President had power superior to the limits of humanity, he might render his country great services; but we are not likely to have any such President; the Constitution itself contemplates none; it makes provision for the infirmities of human nature; it authorizes us to establish offices by law; and this is the ground upon which we stand. Indeed, this is the ground that was assumed yesterday by my colleague, when he said that this officer was the creature of the law. If he is the creature of the law, let him conduct according to law, and let it not be contended that he is the creature of the President; because he is no further the creature of the President, than that he is obliged to give his opinion in writing when required. But it is said, the President is responsible for the conduct of this officer. I wish to know what this responsibility is. Does it mean, if a subordinate Executive officer commits treason, that the President is to suffer for it? This is a strange kind of responsibility. Suppose, in the case of the Secretary of the Treasury, there should be a defalcation of the public revenue; is he to make good the loss? Or if the head of the army should betray his trust, and sacrifice the liberties of his country, is the President's head to be the devoted sacrifice? The Constitution shows the contrary by the provision made for impeachment; and this I take to be one of the strongest arguments against the President having the power of removing one of the principal officers of Government—that he is to bear his own responsibility.

It has been urged by the gentleman over the way, (Mr. SCOTT,) that the President is the man of the people, and their particular representative. Now how this can warrant those strong terms in which it has been asserted, I leave the committee to determine, when he can be elected by electors appointed by the State Legislatures. Is the creature of the deputy of a deputy nearer to the people than the creature of their deputy? Would that gentleman consider the issue of his wife's maid nearer akin to him than the issue of his wife?

The question before the committee must be decided on one of these two grounds: either they must suppose this power is delegated particularly to the President by the Constitution, or it is not. Let us examine these two cases. If gentlemen say that it is delegated by the Constitution, then there is no use for the clause; but if it is not particularly delegated to the President by the Constitution, and we are inclined to authorize him to exercise this power, I would ask gentlemen, whether this is the proper way to do it? Whether a little clause, hid in the body of a bill, can be called a declaratory act? I think it cannot. It looks as if we were afraid of avowing our intentions. If we are determined upon making a declaratory act, let us do it in such a manner as to indicate our intention. But perhaps gentlemen may think we have no authority to make declaratory acts. They may be right in this opinion; for, though I have examined the Constitution with attention, I have not been able to discover any clause which vests Congress with that power. But if the power of making declaratory acts really vests in Congress, and the judges are bound by our decisions, we may alter that part of the Constitution which is secured from being amended by the fifth article; we may say, that the ninth section of the Constitution, respecting the migration or importation of persons, does not extend to negroes; that the word persons means only white men and white women. We then proceed to lay a duty of twenty or thirty dollars per head on the importation of negroes. The merchant does not construe the Constitution in the manner that we have done. He therefore institutes a suit, and brings it before the Supreme Judiciary of the United States for trial. The judges, who are bound by oath to support the Constitution, declare against this law; they would, therefore, give judgment in favor of the merchant. But, say Congress, we are the Constitutional expounders of this clause, and your decision in this case has been improper. Shall the judges, because Congress have usurped power, and made a law founded in construction, be impeached by one branch, and convicted by the other, for doing a meritorious act, and standing in opposition to their usurpation of power? If this is the meaning of the Constitution, it was hardly worth while to have had so much bustle and uneasiness about it. I would ask gentlemen, if the Constitution has given us power to make declaratory acts, where is the necessity of inserting the fifth article for the purpose of obtaining amendments? The word amendment implies a defect; a declaratory act conceives one. Where, then, is the difference between an amendment and a declaratory act? I call upon the gentleman to point out what part of the Constitution says we shall correct that instrument by a declaratory act. If gentlemen once break through the Constitutional limits of their authority, they will find it very difficult to draw a boundary, which will secure to themselves and their posterity that liberty which they have so well contended for.

Several gentlemen rose to speak, but sat down again upon a call for the question, which seemed to be pretty general through the House; when Mr. SUMNER arose, and begged gentlemen not to be so precipitate. If they considered the importance of the question, and the consequences of the decision, they would reflect more deliberately before they gave their votes. For his part, he sat patiently, and attended seriously to the arguments offered on both sides. He had received considerable information from the discussion which had already taken place, and he hoped that more light would still be thrown upon it, if gentlemen were not precluded from pursuing the subject by a precipitate call for the question. He hoped gentlemen would give further time, and let other members speak, who were desirous of delivering their sentiments.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The importance of this question requires mature deliberation; the more I have heard it discussed, the more convinced I am that the clause ought to be struck out. If we suppose (and gentlemen do suppose on this side of the question) that the power is vested in the President by the Constitution, why should we intermeddle in the matter? Why are we officiously to intrude our opinions upon the President? Are we to suppose he is unacquainted with his duty, and is to be taught it by our superior wisdom? I apprehend that the electors who chose the President, thought him competent to understand his duty; what then can induce us to give our advice unasked? If he was in doubt, and was to apply to us for such a purpose, there might be some propriety in it. The convention, who formed this Constitution, thought it would tend to secure the liberties of the people, if they prohibited the President from the sole appointment of all officers. They knew that the Crown of Great Britain, by having that prerogative, has been enabled to swallow up the whole administration; the influence of the Crown upon the Legislature subjects both Houses to its will and pleasure. Perhaps it may be thought, by the people of that kingdom, that it is best for the Executive Magistrate to have such kind of influence; if so, it is very well, and we have no right to complain that it is injurious to them, while they themselves consider it beneficial. But this Government is different, and intended by the people to be different. I have not heard any gentleman produce an authority from law or history which proves, that where two branches are interested in the appointment, one of them has the power of removal. I remember that the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. SENECA,) told us, that the two Houses, notwithstanding the partial negative of the President, possessed the whole Legislative power; but will the gentleman infer from that, that because the concurrence of both branches is necessary to pass a law, a less authority can repeal it? This is all we contend for.

Some gentlemen suppose, if the President has not the power by the Constitution, we ought to vest it in him by law. For my part, I very much doubt if we have the power to do this. I take it we would be placing the heads of departments in a situation inferior to what the Constitution contemplates; but if we have the power, it will be better to exercise it than attempt to construe the Constitution. But it appears to me, that the best way will be to leave the Constitution to speak for itself whenever occasion demands.

It has been said, that the Senate are merely an advisory body. I am not of this opinion, because their consent is expressly required; if this is not obtained, an appointment cannot be made. Upon the whole, I look upon it as necessary, in order to preserve that security which the Constitution affords to the liberty of the people, that we avoid making this declaration, especially in favor of the President, as I do not believe the Constitution vests the authority in him alone.

Mr. AMES.—I believe there are very few gentlemen on this floor who have not made up their opinions; therefore it is particularly disagreeable to solicit their attention, especially when their patience is already exhausted, and their curiosity satisfied; but still I hope to be of some use in collecting the various arguments, and bringing them to a point. I shall rather confine myself to this task, than attempt to offer any thing that is new. I shall just observe, that the arguments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SCOTT,) which are complained of as being ridiculous, were arguments addressed to the understandings of the committee; my own understanding was enlightened by them, although they wore the garb of pleasantry. But to proceed to my main object.

The question, so far as it relates to the Constitution, is this: Whether it has vested the sole power of removing in the President alone, or whether it is to take place by and with the advice and consent of the Senate? If the question of constitutionality was once despatched, we should be left to consider of the expediency of the measure. I take it to be admitted on all hands, though it was at first objected to by a worthy gentleman from South Carolina, that the power of removal from office, at pleasure, resides somewhere in the Government. If it does not reside in the President, or the President and Senate, or if the Constitution has not vested it in any particular body, it must be in the Legislature; for it is absurd to suppose that officers once appointed cannot be removed. The argument tending to prove that the power is in the President alone, by an express declaration, may not be satisfactory to the minds of those gentlemen who deem the Constitution to be silent on that head. But let those gentlemen revert to the principles, spirit, and tendency of the Constitution, and they will be compelled to acknowledge that there is the highest degree of probability that the power does vest in the President of the United States. I shall not undertake to say that the arguments are conclusive on this point. I do not suppose it is necessary that they should be so; for I believe nearly as good conclusions may be drawn from the refutations of an argument as from any other proof. For it is well said, that destructio unius est generatio alterius.

It has been said, and addressed with solemnity to our consciences, that we ought not to destroy the Constitution, to change or modify it; nay, it has been inferred that it is unnecessary and dangerous for us to proceed in this inquiry. It is true we may decide wrong, and therefore there may be danger; but it is not unnecessary. We have entered too far in the discussion to retreat with honor to ourselves, or security to our country. We are sworn as much to exercise Constitutional authority, for the general good, as to refrain from assuming powers that are not given to us. We are as responsible for forbearing to act, as we are for acting. Are we to leave this question undetermined, to be contended for between the President and the Senate? Are we to say, that the question to us is indissoluble, and we therefore throw it upon the shoulders of the President to determine? If it is complex and difficult, it is certainly disingenuous in us to throw off the decision; besides, after so long a debate has been had, a decision must be made, for it never would do to strike out the words; as that would be deciding, and deciding against the power of the President.

It must be admitted that the Constitution is not explicit on the point in contest; yet the Constitution strongly infers that the power is in the President alone. It is declared that the Executive power shall be vested in the President. Under these terms all the powers properly belonging to the Executive department of the Government are given, and such only taken away as are expressly excepted. If the Constitution had stopped here, and the duties had not been defined, either the President had had no powers at all, or he would acquire from that general expression all the powers properly belonging to the Executive department. In the Constitution the President is required to see the laws faithfully executed. He cannot do this without he has a control over officers appointed to aid him in the performance of his duty. Take this power, out of his hands, and you virtually strip him of his authority; you virtually destroy his responsibility—the great security which this Constitution holds out to the people of America.

Gentlemen will say that, as the Constitution is not explicit, it must be matter of doubt where the power vests. If gentlemen's consciences will not let them agree with us, they ought to permit us to exercise the like liberty on our part. But they tell us we must meet them on the ground of accommodation; and give up a declaration that the power of removal is in the President, and they will acquiesce in declaring him to have the power of suspension; but they should recollect, that in so doing we sacrifice the principles of the Constitution.

It has been frequently said, that the power of removing is incidental to the power of appointing; as the Constitution implies that all officers, except the judges, are appointed during pleasure, so the power of removal may, in all cases, be exercised. But suppose this general principle true; yet it is an arbitrary principle, I take it, and one that cannot be proved. If it were denied, it could not be established; and if it were established, it is still doubtful whether it would make for the adverse side of this question or not; because it is doubted whether the Senate do actually appoint or not. It is admitted that they may check and regulate the appointment by the President, but they can do nothing more; they are merely an advisory body, and do not secure any degree of responsibility, which is one great object of the present Constitution. They are not answerable for their secret advice; but if they were, the blame, divided among so many, would fall upon none.

Certainly this assumed principle is very often untrue; but, if it is true, it is not favorable to the gentleman's doctrine. The President, I contend, has expressly the power of nominating and appointing, though he must obtain the consent of the Senate. He is the agent; the Senate may prevent his acting, but cannot act themselves. It may be difficult to illustrate this point by examples which will exactly correspond. But suppose the case of an executor, to whom is devised land, to be sold with the advice of a certain person, on certain conditions; the executor sells, with the consent, and upon the conditions required in the will; the conditions are broken;—may the executor re-enter for the breach of them? Or has the person with whom he was obliged to consult in the sale, any power to restrain him? The executor may remove the wrongful possessor from the land, though perhaps by the will, he may hold it in trust for another person's benefit. In this manner the President may remove from office, though, when vacant, he cannot fill it without the advice of the Senate. We are told it is dangerous to adopt constructions, and that what is not expressly given, is retained. Surely it is as improper in this way to confer power upon the Senate as upon the President; for, if the power is not in the President solely by the Constitution, it never can be in the President and Senate by any grant of that instrument. Any arguments, therefore, that tend to make the first doubtful, operate against the other, and make it absurd. If gentlemen, then, doubt with respect to the first point, they will certainly hesitate with respect to the other. If the Senate have not the power, and it is proved that they have it not, by the arguments on both sides, the power either vests with the President or the Legislature; if it is at the disposal of the latter, and merely a matter of choice with us, clearly we ought not to bestow it on the Senate; for the doubt, whether the President is not already entitled to it, is an argument against placing it in other hands. Besides, the exercise of it by the Senate would be inconvenient; they are not always sitting; it would be insecure, because they are not responsible; it would be subversive of the great principles of the Constitution, and destructive to liberty, because it tends to intermingle Executive and Legislative powers in one body of men; and this blending of powers ever forms a tyranny. The Senate are not to accuse offenders; they are to try them; they are not to give orders, but, on complaint, to judge of the breach of them. We are warned against betraying the liberties of our country; we are told that all power tends to abuse; it is our duty, therefore, to keep them single and distinct. Where the Executive swallows up the Legislature, it becomes a despotism; where the Legislature trenches upon the Executive, it approaches towards despotism; and where they have less power than is necessary, it approximates towards anarchy. We should be careful, therefore, to preserve the limits of each authority in the present question. As it respects the power of the people, it is but of little importance. It is not pretended that the people have reserved the power of removing bad officers. It is admitted on all hands, that the Government is possessed of such power; consequently, the people can neither lose nor gain power by it. We are the servants of the people; we are the watchmen, and we should be unfaithful in both characters, if we should administer the Government as to destroy its great principles and most essential advantages. The question now among us is, which of these servants shall exercise a power already granted? Wise and virtuous as the Senate may be, such a power lodged in their hands will not only tend to abuse, but cannot tend to any thing else. Need I repeat the inconveniences which will result from vesting it in the Senate? No, I appeal to that maxim which has the sanction of experience, and is authorized by the decision of the wisest men; to prevent an abuse of power, it must be distributed into three branches, who must be made independent, to watch and check each other. The people are to watch them all. While these maxims are pursued, our liberties will be preserved. It was from neglecting or despising these maxims that the ancient commonwealths were destroyed. A voice issues from the earth which covers their ruins, and proclaims to mankind the sacredness of the truths that are at this moment in controversy. It is said that the Constitution has blended these powers which we advise to keep separate, and therefore we ought to follow in completing similar regulations. But gentlemen ought to recollect that that has been an objection against the Constitution; and if it is a well-founded one, we ought to endeavor, by all that is in our power, to restrain the evil rather than to increase it. But, perhaps, with the sole power of removal in the President, the check of the Senate in appointments may have a salutary tendency. In removing from office, their advice and consent is liable to all the objections which have been stated. It is very proper to guard the introduction of a man into office by every check that can properly be applied; but after he is appointed, there can be no use in exercising a judgment upon events which have heretofore taken place. If the Senate are to possess the power of removal, they will be enabled to hold the person in office, let the circumstances be what they may that point out the necessity or propriety of his removal. It creates a permanent connexion; it will nurse faction; it will promote intrigue to obtain protectors, and to shelter tools. Sir, it is infusing poison into the Constitution; it is an impure and unchaste connexion; there is ruin in it; it is tempting the Senate with forbidden fruit; it ought not to be possible for a branch of the Legislature even to hope for a share of the Executive power; for they may be tempted to increase it, by a hope to share the exercise of it. People are seldom jealous of their own power; and if the Senate become part of the Executive, they will be very improper persons to watch that department; so far from being champions for liberty, they will become conspirators against it. The Executive department should ever be independent, and sufficiently energetic to defeat the attempts of either branch of the Legislature to usurp its prerogative. But the proposed control of the Senate is setting that body above the President; it tends to establish an aristocracy. And at the moment we are endangering the principles of our free and excellent Constitution, gentlemen are undertaking to amuse the people with the sound of liberty. If their ideas should succeed, a principle of mortality will be infused into a Government, which the lovers of mankind have wished might last to the end of the world. With a mixture of the Executive and Legislative powers in one body, no Government can long remain uncorrupt. With a corrupt Executive, liberty may long retain a trembling existence. With a corrupt Legislature, it is impossible; the vitals of the Constitution would be mortified, and death must follow on every step. A Government thus formed would be the most formidable curse that could befall this country. Perhaps an enlightened people might timely foresee and correct the error; but if a season were allowed for such a compound to grow and produce its natural fruit, it would either banish liberty, or the people would be driven to exercise their unalienable right, the right of uncivilized nature, and destroy a monster whose voracious and capacious jaws would crush and swallow up themselves and their posterity. The principles of this Constitution, while they are adhered to, will perpetuate that liberty which it is the honor of Americans to have well contended for. The clause in the bill is calculated to support those principles; and for this, if there was no other reason, I should be inclined to give it my support.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I think gentlemen ought to consent to strike out the words, even upon their own principles; for we ought not to blend the Legislative with the Executive powers; and surely a declaration like that contained in the bill, is an interference on our part with the Executive Department. Leave them to do their duty, and let us do ours.

The decision of this question depends upon the construction of a short clause in the Constitution, in which is designated the power of the President. It is said he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, justices of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States. Strange constructions have been given to this advice and consent of the Senate, which, if agreed to, will make the whole Constitution nothing, or any thing, just as we please. If we can deprive the Senate of their power in making treaties, and say with truth that they have no authority in the business, the Legislature will become a dangerous branch of the Government. So in the case of appointing officers; if it can be truly said that these heads of departments are the servants of the President alone, we shall make the Executive Department a dangerous one. I should not dwell so strongly on these two points, had not a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SNOWICK) asserted that the power of appointing did not vest, in any sense, in the Senate, nor that they were instrumental in making treaties; that all officers were the servants of the President, and he alone responsible.

Mr. SNOWICK imagined the gentleman had misunderstood him, because he said, when he was last up, that it was not conceded on this side that the power of appointing vested in the Senate, nor in the case that appeared analogous, namely, that of making treaties; but he did not deny that the concurrence of the Senate was necessary to the completion of the act. He had undertaken to say that the Legislature were at liberty to determine that an officer should be removable by the President, or by whom they pleased; that he was absolutely the creature of the law, and subject to Legislative discretion. He also said it was more plausibly contended that the power of removal was more constitutionally in the President than in the President and Senate; but he did not say that the arguments on either side were conclusive.

Mr. LIVERMORE did not desire to lay any stress upon arguments which he had misunderstood. He would therefore pass over what he had intended to say on that head; and he would endeavor vor to give such a construction to the clause he had read, as would justify the House in striking out the words from the bill.

If the consent of the Senate be absolutely requisite with respect to appointments, it is one thing; but if the President has no more to do than to ask their opinion, or to receive their advice, it is another thing. The latter appeared to him to be the sentiment of another gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. AMES.)

[Mr. AMES rose and denied such an opinion. His idea was that the President was the agent, and the Senate a check to regulate his agency.]

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I shall take it, then, with the consent of gentlemen, that the Senate has an absolute control over the President in cases of appointment. Now, being thus appointed, how are officers to be displaced? On this point, I undertake to give my opinion; though, in the first place, I must differ with one of the gentleman on this side of the question, (Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.) I do not admit that any man has an estate in his office. I conceive all officers to be appointed during pleasure, except where the Constitution stipulates for a different tenure, unless indeed the law should create the office or officer, for a term of years. After observing this, I must contend, with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WHITTE,) that the power of removal is incidental to the power of appointment. If it were the President alone that appointed, he alone could displace. If the President and Senate, by a joint agreement, appointed an officer, they alone have the power to supersede him; and, however any gentleman may say he doubts, or does not understand the force of this principle, yet to me it appears as clear and as demonstrable as any principle of law or justice that I am acquainted with. There is another method of displacing officers expressly pointed out by the Constitution; and this implies, in the clearest manner, that in all other cases, officers may be removed at pleasure; and, if removed at pleasure, it must be at the pleasure of the parties who appointed them.

Congress are enabled, by the Constitution, to establish offices by law. In many cases, they will no doubt vest the power of appointing inferior officers in the President alone. They have no express right, by the Constitution, to vest in him the power of removing these officers at pleasure; yet no gentleman will contend that inferior officers ought not to be removable at pleasure. How, then, can the President acquire this authority, unless it be on the principle that the power of removal is incidental, and the natural consequence of the power of appointing. If gentlemen will maintain consistency, they will be compelled to acknowledge the force of this principle; and if they acknowledge the principle, they must agree to strike out the words.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina. As my silence may be construed into a dereliction of my former sentiments, I beg permission of the committee to assure them, that my opinion on the question of constitutionality has undergone no change whatever. Indeed, the arguments of gentlemen in favor of the clause have gone mostly on the point of expediency, and have tended rather to show us what the Constitution ought to be than what it is.

An honorable gentleman, (Mr. Madison,) of great abilities, and who was a member of the convention that formed the Constitution, has given us an interpretation of the first words in the second article, which requires some examination before it is admitted. He says that all powers incidental to the Executive Department, are vested in the President of the United States. What powers are Executive, or incidental to the Executive Department, will depend upon the nature of the Government; because some powers are vested in the Executive of a monarchy that are not in an aristocracy, and in the Executive of an aristocracy that are unknown in a democracy. The Legislatures of republics appoint to office; this power is exercised by the Executive of monarchies. In England the King appoints all officers; and do gentlemen contend that Executive powers vest in the President? The King confers titles of nobility, but the Constitution prohibits the United States from granting any. Does it restrain the President, or Congress, from the exercise of this Executive power? I believe it restrains Congress. If so, the Constitution did not contemplate that the President should exercise all Executive power, or the Constitution did not understand the power of conferring titles as an Executive power. Hence, what I contend for is evinced, that Executive powers must take their complexion from the nature of the Government. Can the President establish corporations? Can he prevent citizens from going out of the country? He cannot. Yet these powers are exercised, as Executive powers, by the King of Great Britain. There are a variety of other powers exercised, as Executive powers, to which the President is not entitled. From this I am led to believe that the gentleman may be wrong, when he considers the power of removal as an Executive power, and incidental to the prerogative of the President. For my part, I conceive the President is to exercise all Executive powers granted in the Constitution, as the Legislature is to exercise all Legislative authority, according to these words in the first article: "All Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States."

However solemnly the contrary doctrine may be insisted upon, however ridiculously our arguments may be treated, I hope we shall preserve a due attention to the reason and nature of things, and to the Constitution; and not suffer ourselves to be forced or laughed out of our principles. Ridicule is said to be the test of truth; and, to be sure, that touchstone has been applied, with what success I leave gentlemen to determine. For my part, though I admit the gentleman's talent at caricature, yet I should never think of employing him at portrait work.

The extreme desire which gentlemen have manifested to retain this clause, makes me suspicious that they do not themselves think there is good reason to believe the President would think of exercising the authority which they are so desirous of giving him to understand that he ought. To my mind, it is a strong proof that gentlemen do not think the power is vested in him by the Constitution. If gentlemen were satisfied by the Constitution gave this power to the President, they would not hesitate, at the request of so numerous and respectable a part of the House, to strike out the words. I say they would not hesitate to do this, because they did not hesitate to strike out similar words. When the business was first brought before the Committee of the Whole, gentlemen will recollect, that the motion for establishing the Departments of Finance, War, and Foreign Affairs, was first introduced; it contained a clause declaring that the officers should be respectively appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Gentlemen, who are now in the minority, declared such a clause to be unnecessary, because the Constitution had already given the power. The solidity of this reasoning was admitted by a majority of the House at that time; even the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) acquiesced in striking out the words. If gentlemen wished to be considered consistent, they will consent to strike out the words, "to be removable by the President;" provided they are of opinion that the Constitution vests this authority in the President alone. If it is not vested by the Constitution in the President alone, will gentlemen undertake to vest it in him by law, when it is so well contended that the Constitution vests it in the President and Senate?

Mr. Madison.—The question now seems to be brought to this, whether it is proper or improper to retain these words in the clause, provided they are explanatory of the Constitution. I think this branch of the Legislature is as much interested in the establishment of the true meaning of the Constitution, as either the President or Senate; and when the Constitution submits it to us to establish offices by law, we ought to know by what tenure the office should be held; and whether it should depend upon the concurrence of the Senate with the President, or upon the will of the President alone; because gentlemen may hesitate in either case, whether they will make it for an indefinite or precise time. If the officer can be removed at discretion by the President, there may be safety in letting it be for an indefinite period. If he cannot exert his prerogative, there is no security even by the mode of impeachment; because the officer may intrude himself behind the authority of the Senate, and bid defiance to every other department of Government. In this case, the question of duration would take a different turn. Hence it is highly proper that we and our constituents should know the tenure of the office. And have we not as good a right as any branch of the Government to declare our sense of the meaning of the Constitution?

Nothing has yet been offered to invalidate the doctrine, that the meaning of the Constitution may as well be ascertained by the legislature as by the judicial authority. When the question emerges as it does in this bill, and much seems to depend upon it, I should conceive it highly proper to make a legislative construction. In another point of view it is proper that this interpretation should now take place, rather than at a time when the exigency of the case may require the exercise of the power of removal. At present, the disposition of every gentleman is to seek the truth, and abide by its guidance when it is discovered. I have reason to believe the same disposition prevails in the Senate. But will this be the case when some individual officer of high rank draws into question the capacity of the President, with the Senate, to effect his removal? If we leave the Constitution to take this course, it can never be expounded until the President shall think it expedient to exercise the right of removal, if he supposes he has it; then the Senate may be induced to set up their pretensions. And will they decide so calmly as at this time, when no important officer in any of the great departments is appointed to influence their judgments? The imagination of no member here, or of the Senate, or of the President himself, is heated or disturbed by faction. If ever a proper moment for decision should offer, it must be one like the present.

I do not conceive that this question has been truly stated by some gentlemen. In my opinion it is not whether we shall take the power from one branch of the Government and give it to another; but the question is, to which branch has the Constitution given it? Some gentlemen have said, that it resides in the people at large; and that if it is necessary to the Government, we must apply to the people for it, and obtain it by way of amendment to the Constitution. Some gentlemen contend, that although it is given in the Constitution, as a necessary power to carry into execution the other powers vested by the Constitution, yet it is vested in the Legislature. I cannot admit this doctrine either; because it is setting the Legislature at the head of the Executive branch of the Government. If we take the other construction of the gentleman from South Carolina, that all officers hold their places by the firm tenure of good behaviour, we shall find it still more improper. I think gentlemen will see, upon reflection, that this doctrine is incompatible with the principles of free Government. If there is no removability but by way of impeachment, then all the Executive officers of Government hold their offices by the firm tenure of good behaviour, from the Chief Justice down to the tide waiter.

Mr. Smith interrupted Mr. M., and said that he had admitted that inferior officers might be removed, because the Constitution had left it in the power of the Legislature to establish them on what terms they pleased; consequently, to direct their appointment and removal.]

Mr. Madison had understood the gentleman as he now explained himself. But still he contended, that the consequences he had drawn would necessarily follow; because there was no express authority given to the Legislature in the Constitution to enable the President, the courts of law, or heads of the departments, to remove an inferior officer; all that was said on that head was confined solely to the power of appointing them. If the gentleman admits that the Legislature may vest the power of removal, with respect to inferior officers, he must also admit that the Constitution vests the President with the power of removal in the case of superior officers; because both powers are implied in the same words. The President may appoint the one class, and the Legislature may authorize the courts of law or heads of departments to appoint in the other case. If then it is admitted that the power of removal vests in the President, or President and Senate, the arguments which I urged yesterday, and those which have been urged by honorable gentlemen on this side of the question for these three days past, will fully evince the truth of the construction which we give, that the power is in the President alone. I will not repeat them, because they must have full possession of every gentleman's mind. I am willing, therefore, to rest the decision here; and hope that it will be made in such a manner as to perpetuate the blessings which this Constitution was intended to embrace.

Mr. PACE.—The more I hear on this all-important question, the more I am alarmed. Gentlemen fear much from a blending of the Legislative and Executive authorities; and I do not blame their fears, for they are but too well grounded; but then they ought not to press for the interference of the Legislature in a matter which they acknowledge wholly to be within the Executive department. I think, upon their own principles, they ought to join us in striking out the clause, and leave this question where it ought to be. There is no fear but a proper interpretation will be made, if the Chief Magistrate is a friend to his country. He will exercise his authority when it is required; and if he judges himself to be possessed of the power of removal, he will use it, and submit it to his country to judge whether he was vested with it or not.

But I am astonished at the arguments of gentlemen, who contend, that granting this authority to the President is the best security to public liberty. Has any State in the Union ever thought it necessary to put such a power into the hands of their Chief Magistrate, in order to secure the liberties of the citizen? If it is that great security which some gentlemen seem to think, it is strange that it should never, as yet, have been thought of under the State Governments. If no State has yet given such a power, I think we are setting a bad example to begin it; if any have done it, we do ill not to set them a better.

When I seconded my colleague's motion for striking out these objectionable words, I contented myself with saying nothing more than that I seconded his motion. This I did, sir, to save time, and avoid a repetition of what I had said when the subject was before discussed. I lay it down as a rule, sir, not to use more words here than are absolutely necessary to explain the motives which induced me to vote in a certain manner; or which I humbly conceive may serve to elucidate the subject, and induce some members to vote with me. But, sir, on the present occasion, as much has been said and repeated against the motion which I seconded, and as it is a question of great importance, I must again break through the rule which I had imposed on myself, and give a loose to my imagination, as others have done; if my laconic method of arguing does not strike the House, the members who dislike long speeches must excuse me for being troublesome to them.

Department of Foreign Affairs.

I cannot agree to let these words stand as part of the bill, because I think them incompatible with the spirit, if not with the letter of the Constitution; as better calculated to excite the jealousy of Republics, than to secure the due administration of the affairs of our new Republics; and as directly tending to confirm the suspicion of those who have asserted that the new Government would run instantly headlong into a monarchy. Having this idea of the matter, and being persuaded at the same time that the heaped-up powers on the Chief Magistrate especially as the bill proposes, does not render him more responsible; but, on the contrary, by increasing his importance, and multiplying his dependants, directly tends to diminish his responsibility, and secure him, if not against suspicion, at least against charges of delinquency. To the argument which has been urged against the amendment, which is drawn from the necessity of having energy in Government, despatch, secrecy, and decision, I think all these advantages may be had, without putting the respectable heads of departments in a situation so humiliating, that I can scarcely suppose a man of true independent spirit, and fit to be in such an office, could submit to it. This doctrine, if pushed as far as it will go, will lead to great lengths—to imprisonment—nay, to execution. Why may it not be said that the President may remove a judge from his bench, or a colonel from his regiment? Does it not appear that much mischief may be done by a corrupt judge, or by a treacherous or cowardly colonel? Yet the former must be impeached, and the latter tried by a court-martial. In the latter case, indeed, as Commander-in-Chief, he may arrest, secure, and decide. And here, I confess, I should see no impropriety in those who wished to guard against the evils they talk of, if they were to move to amend the clause, by proposing that the President should have the power to arrest and imprison, as well as remove; nor do I see any thing amiss in declaring in what manner an officer who is to be appointed under a law shall be removed. The law may with propriety say, what shall be the qualification and what the disqualification of the officer? But, sir, I wish, in the first place, to get rid of an expression which I think will furnish arms to our enemies to attack our Government with fresh vigor, and will discourage our friends, and which must serve to break down the spirit of our officers of State, and make them crouch before the President, as the heads of such departments at Constantinople now do before the Grand Seigneur. I see here no prerogatives. Strike out the clause, sir, and you leave your officers responsible to the President, but not subject tools to him. You leave him responsible to Congress, and to our fellow-citizens, his constituents. If he see cause, it will be his duty to lodge information to ground an impeachment; and, in the mean time, he will take such measures as the public good may require. If treason be committed, a commitment on impeachment, and trial, may follow.

The mischief which is past the President may retract. He may cause it to be punished by Constitutional means, and by the controlling power given in the bill itself. In my opinion, he may prevent a reputation of the mischiefs. Sir, it is to our infant republic—on which, too, the eyes of the whole world are fixed; on which the future prospect of the happiness of mankind depends—of great consequence to avoid every step which may even appear to be leading it into the fatal paths of tyrannical Government. Every sentence of our laws, sir, should be carefully guarded against expressions which may tend to increase the insolent hopes of the enemies of our Government, and the anxious fears of its friends. Every word ought to be expunged from our laws which can have that tendency, if not absolutely and evidently necessary for the public good.

Sir, the arguments in favor of the clause which I wish to expunge, are such as have laid the foundation of energy in Government, as I said before, the true doctrine of tyrants. I know, sir, nevertheless, that here it is the true doctrine of freemen, patriots, of men who wish to see it only applied to support that Government which they think is wisely calculated to preserve the liberties of their country. But, sir, I warn those patriots against the use of arguments, which, above all others, may, to their grief and mortification, be cruelly turned against them. For my part, I shall ever prefer the security of my fellow-citizens, whether in or out of office, to a rigid observance of the rules of office; and an independent spirit in our officers, to a prompt servility. Energy of Government may be the destruction of liberty; it should not, therefore, be too much cherished in a free country. A spirit of independence should be cultivated; a sense of honor and virtue nourished with care; and though some irregularities might take place, they would be such as could not endanger public liberty.

I wish to strike out the clause too, sir, because we shall leave the Constitution to the proper expositors of it, and because it ill becomes the representatives of a free people, in their first act, to show an eagerness to extend the powers of the Executive.

The friends of the clause support it, because it tends to make the President responsible, and prevents the Senate from exercising a power not vested in them by the Constitution, which they think has already invested them with too much power; they require singleness in the Executive power; to extend the energy of Government. Need I repeat that this energy is often employed against the liberty of a people, than in favor of it? The liberty and security of our fellow-citizens is our great object, and not the prompt execution of the laws. Indecision, delay, blunders, nay, villainous actions, in the administration of Government, are trifles compared to legalizing the full exertion of a tyrannical despotism. Good God! what, authorize in a free republic, by law, too, by your first act, the exertion of a dangerous royal prerogative in your Chief Magistrate! What! where honor and virtue ought to be the support of your Government, will you infuse and cherish meanness and servility in your citizens, and insolence and arbitrary power in your Chief Magistrate, when you know that thousands of virtuous citizens are dissatisfied with your Government, because they think they see the seeds of monarchy in it? And two whole States have refused to unite with you, because they think your Government dangerous to their liberties; will you openly insert words which fully justify their opinions and fears?

Let me ask again, does increasing the power and multiplying the dependants of the President diminish his responsibility? How is the President responsible for the conduct of officers whom he appoints, with the advice of the Senate? Why not, if the Constitution be silent, as some say, make the Senate responsible for their advice in this case, and say, that the President, with their advice and consent, may suspend and deprive persons of office? Why should they, of whose persons gentlemen are so much afraid, be screened from censure, for the malpractices of the heads of departments, more than the President? If the clause remain in the bill, the case may stand thus: the Senate may concur in appointing an able, faithful officer; the President may remove him for not being subservient to his views. So that here is a good method to procure a good officer, and a summary process to get rid of him at the same time—the sure means of producing resentment and animosity between the President and Senate, and taking away all responsibility from the latter, and diminishing that of the former. Thus, then, we see the doctrine of responsibility fails to support the clause.

It has been repeatedly said, strike out the clause, and you give the Senate the power they ought not to have. How does this give a power? It may leave the Constitution at large, and that may give the power; and, indeed, those gentlemen seem to be aware that it does, or they would not say that the Senate will have the power, if we do not take it away. The truth is, the Constitution does give that power, and wisely gives it to the Senate, to secure the inhabitants of the respective States. It is to no purpose to say that nations do not blend or separate the power in the manner we have done by our Constitution, and to draw inferences from them that it is improper, because England, and the other nations of Europe, are totally different in their Constitutions from confederated America. It is said the officers ought to be commissioned durante bene placito, et ne daretur se bene gererent—a monstrous doctrine. As to inferior officers, who, we are told, must also be impeached, Congress have a Constitutional right to empower the President to appoint, and I suppose to remove also; not that the power necessarily follows appointments.

The call for the question was now pretty general through the House, and several gentlemen were up to speak, when Mr. SUMNER rose, and begged the patience of the committee until tomorrow. He appealed to their candor on the occasion; and hoped other gentlemen, who were disposed to speak, would be indulged with the privilege. He therefore moved that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. LEE hoped the committee would not rise, and that the subject would be decided. He did not think it possible it could receive any further elucidation. Gentlemen should remember it had been, on a former occasion, one whole day under consideration, and now, again, it had been debated for three days; this was surely allowing time enough for its discussion; besides, if it was not, gentlemen would have a further opportunity of delivering their sentiments, for the decision now will not be final.

Mr. STONE said, he had some further observations to make on this subject, but he would not press the committee to hear him; if they were inclined to indulge him on this point to-morrow he should be sensible of the favor.

Mr. MADISON said, that he did not wish to prescribe the privileges of the members of a hearing; if the gentlemen were disposed to deliver any further sentiments to the committee, he should not insist upon a decision at this time.

The committee now rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, June 19.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from several of their amendments to the bill "for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States," disagreed to by this House; and insist on their other amendments to the same bill, also disagreed to by the House. The Senate have also agreed to the report of the joint committee, appointed to view and report on the appropriation of the rooms in the City Hall, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs, Mr. TOWNSEND in the Chair. The question on striking out the words "to be removable by the President" being still under consideration,

Mr. JACKSON, from Georgia.—I am well aware how disagreeable and irksome it must be to have another member rise on this question; but when I consider that the liberties of my country may be suspended on the decision of this question, I feel myself compelled to trespass once more on the patience of the committee. And I cannot but think the time well spent that has been employed in the consideration of this business; it is of great magnitude in every point of view, whether it be considered as a Constitutional question, or a question of expediency. And gentlemen will excuse me, if my language should not be adapted to that delicacy to which so respectable a body is entitled. I have accustomed myself to a blunt integrity of speech, which I hope the goodness of my intentions will excuse. For I do most verily believe, that this power will become inimical to liberty, and blast all those delightful buds of happiness which the establishment of the new Constitution flattered us would expand and ripen into fruition.

It has been strenuously contended, as necessary to the security of freedom, that the Executive branch of the Government should not be blended with the Legislative, but ought to be divided and kept separate and distinct. Now, that this doctrine exists in practice as well as theory, I beg to be convinced. I do not pretend that such an excellency in Government is undesirable. I only wish permission to ask gentlemen (and will they candidly answer me?) to bring forward a single instance in any Government, when and wherever, in which the Executive and Legislative authorities are not blended. Search the annals of history—for I disclaim Utopian politics; search the archives of Rome, the records of Carthage; inspect the historic page of Grecian Republics; examine the Jewish theocracy—and will gentlemen say they can bring evidence of the fact? No, the whole assemblage of ancient Governments, so far as has come within the knowledge of the present age, bears ample testimony against them. Turn we then to the middle age; and not one solitary ray of this benign principle is to be discovered; in that period of Cimmerian darkness, the powers of Government were blended in the most confused chaos. Let us turn our eyes then to the enlightened hemisphere that brightens on our Atlantic shores. The Governments of Europe are in an improving state; but none, I apprehend, have yet arrived to that perfection which gentlemen have contemplated. That which we have been taught to consider most pure and favorable to liberty, is the Government of Great Britain. There we shall find that the Executive authority is connected with, and forms a part of, the Legislative, and this upon Constitutional ground; it expands itself further, and within its capacious grasp actually holds the Legislative as well as the Executive powers. If we do not find it there, we will not look for it in the despotisms of the East. Come we then to this country, where the broad effulgence of the sun of liberty shoots down upon its votaries its most vivifying rays; where the head, nurtured by science, is capable to plan the most pure and unsullied system, for the regulation and government of free-born men, who so highly prize the inestimable palm they so lately won; who would rather sink into annihilation than sacrifice it at the altar of despotism or anarchy. Look into the production of her chosen sons—look at your own Constitution. Do gentlemen find that it is modelled upon their principles? Are the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers kept separate and distinct? No, Mr. Chairman, they are blended; not, to be sure, in so high or dangerous a degree, but in all the possible forms they are capable of receiving; the Executive has a qualified check upon the Legislature; the Legislature exercises the powers of the Judiciary and Executive. Thus, then, I take it, neither our Government, nor that of any nation which now exists, or hath heretofore existed, was strictly founded upon the principles contended for. I call upon gentlemen, therefore, to convince me, (for I am open to conviction,) how it can be necessary to vest in the President of the United States the power of removal, upon the principle of keeping the Executive department separate and distinct? Gentlemen will not, they cannot, dispute my facts. How then can they contend for inferences, contradicted by such demonstrable and clear hypotheses?

An honorable gentleman, yesterday, was pleased to treat my honest apprehensions as the mere chimeras of a frightened fancy; but let me assure him, they are not the visionary conceits of an individual; I believe they will be found to be the sentiments of the major part of our constituents. We know well how much they dread the accumulation of power in the hands of the President; not that they fear the exercise of it by a Washington, but the time may come when venality will subliminate and diffuse itself through the system, and corrupt the whole Constitution, destroying its beauty, consuming its spirit, and subverting its frame. Then will be the time that the patriotic heart will sincerely lament the legislative effusions of an ungoverned moment.

Why should gentlemen complain of my raising spectres, as they term them, when they have indulged themselves in them on less momentous occasions? Those very gentlemen who are boldest now, were the most timid then. Witness the sad forebodings with which we were entertained when it was proposed to tax molasses. Witness the prophetic alarms to rouse our apprehensions on the subject of amendments to the Constitution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania engraved to himself a grim and terrible image, to which we were called upon to bow the knee, by making proper regulations respecting the Western territory. I wish gentlemen to be more consistent, and not complain of practices in which they themselves indulge. I have as much right to raise my spectre as another; but on this occasion, it is not a mere shadow which I have brought forward, but a reality. For, if you take away the powers from one branch of the Government, and give them to another, there is an end of liberty. Judge Blackstone says, that when the Constitutional bulwarks are removed from one part of the Government to another, the whole is subverted, and an end put to the Constitution. How was it that Carthage lost her liberty? How have all the ancient republics been swallowed up in the gulf of tyranny and despotism, but by an accumulation of power in one particular branch of their Governments? How careful, then, ought we to be in the preservation of those limits which the Constitution has prescribed. If, then, the Constitution has vested the power of removal in the President and Senate, we ought, on no pretence whatever, to change the body authorized to exercise it. The words of the Constitution forcibly imply our construction; and it has never yet been proved, nay, it has hardly been controverted, that the power which appoints is not the power to remove.

It is admitted, that in cases of ambassadors and public ministers, it would be improper to recall them without the concurrence of the Senate; because the Senate are combined with the President, and strongly too, in the objects of their negotiations. How then can gentlemen discriminate? The Constitution vests the power of appointing in the one case, the same as in the other; and these officers are also public ministers; the Constitution views them in that light; they are styled the heads of departments, and are appointed to advise the President.

But setting aside the Constitutionality of the question, where it must be admitted we have the advantage, let us examine the question of expediency, and meet gentlemen on their own ground. In this circle we must expect to meet spectres indeed. Has not your President got the sword in his own hands? for I look forward to the time when America will have both an army and a navy. I do not confine myself to the present period. You may then have a President different from the magistrate that at present fills the Chair. If then he has the power of removing and controlling the Treasury Department, he has the purse-strings in his hand; and you only fill the strong box, and collect the money of the empire, for his use. The purse and the sword will enable him to lay prostrate the liberties of America. Is this a mere spectre? No. Experience confirms the observation, a wise people will never let their freedom lie at the will and pleasure of any man.

Another observation has been made to prove the expediency of this measure. It was said by the gentleman from Virginia, that the President was chosen by and from the mass of the people, and therefore might be safely trusted. But the President may be chosen by electors appointed by the State Legislatures; and therefore he is an improper person to be entrusted with this authority. He is not accountable to the people; for they have no immediate hand in appointing or rejecting him. While some gentlemen assert, and others deny, the responsibility of the President, there is danger in deciding. These opposing opinions cannot be reconciled; and therefore will give no proper data to decide in favor of the President.

I call once more on gentlemen to answer me this question, and I shall rest satisfied in giving up my opinion; let them prove to me that it was not the intention of this Constitution to blend the Executive and Legislative powers. If these are the principles of the Constitution, why will gentlemen contend for the independency of each branch of the Government? The celebrated Mr. Wilson agrees with me in this sentiment; for he declares that the Senate was constituted a check upon the President. Let gentlemen turn over his speeches delivered in the convention of Pennsylvania, and they will find he asserts it as an incontrovertible fact. This sentiment is confirmed by other writers of reputation. It is our business to preserve the Constitution inviolate; and if these are its principles, we are to see that they are not injured or deviated from.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I have felt an unusual anxiety during the debate upon this question. I have attentively listened to the arguments which have been brought forward, and have weighed them in my mind with great deliberation; and as I consider a proper decision upon it of almost infinite importance to the Government, I must beg the indulgence of the House while I submit a few observations.

The main ground on which the question is made to rest is, that, if we adopt this clause, we violate the Constitution. Many of the gentlemen who advocate the present motion for striking out, would, if they could do it with consistency to the Constitution, be in favor of the clause. We have been reminded of our oaths, and warned not to violate the solemn obligation. This injunction has come from so many parts of the House, that it arrested my whole attention for a few minutes; and then they produced us the clause in the Constitution, which directed that officers should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They then tell us, that they should be removable in the same manner. We see the clause by which it is directed that they should be appointed in that manner, but we do not see the clause respecting their removal in the same way. Gentlemen have only drawn it as an inference from the former; they construe that to be the meaning of the Constitution, which we construe the reverse. I hope, therefore, gentlemen will change their expression, and say, we shall violate their construction of the Constitution, and not the Constitution itself. This will be a very different charge; unless the gentlemen pretend to support the doctrine of infallibility, as it respects their decisions; and that would perhaps be more than the House would be willing to admit, and more than the people in this country are accustomed to believe.

I have said, the gentlemen rest their principal opposition on this point, that the Constitution plainly means that the officers must be removed in the way they are appointed. Now, when gentlemen tell me that I am going to construe the Constitution, and may interpret it in a manner which was never intended, I am very cautious how I proceed. I do not like to construe overmuch. It is a very delicate and critical branch of our duty; and there is not, perhaps, any part of the Constitution on which we should be more cautious and circumspect than on the present.

I am well authorized to say, that the mingling the powers of the President and Senate was strongly opposed in the convention which had the honor to submit to the consideration of the United States, and the different States, the present system for the Government of the Union. Some gentlemen opposed it to the last; and, finally, it was the principal ground on which they refused to give it their signature and assent. One gentleman called it a monstrous and unnatural connexion, and did not hesitate to affirm it would bring on convulsions in the Government. This objection was not confined to the walls of the convention; it has been the subject of newspaper declaration, and perhaps justly so. Ought not we, therefore, to be careful not to extend this unchaste connexion any further?

Gentlemen who undertake to construe, say that they see clearly that the power which appoints must also remove. Now, I have reviewed this subject with all the application and discernment my mind is capable of, and have not been able to see any such thing. There is an agency given to the President in making appointments, to which the Senate are connected. But how it follows that the connexion extends to the removal, positively I cannot see. They say that it follows as a natural, inseparable consequence. This sounds like logic. But if we consult the premises, perhaps the conclusion may not follow. The Constitution opposes this maxim more than it supports it. The President is appointed by electors chosen by the people themselves, or by the State Legislatures. Can the State Legislatures, either combined or separate, effect his removal? No. But the Senate may, on impeachment by this House. The Judges are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but they are only removable by impeachment. Hence, the President has no agency in the removal. Hence, I say, it is not a natural consequence, that the power which appoints should have the power of removal also. We may find it necessary that subordinate officers should be appointed in the first instance by the President and Senate. I hope it will not be contended that the President and Senate shall be applied to in all cases when their removal may be necessary. This principle, sir, is not pursued by the Senate themselves. In the very bill that is now before this House, sent down by the Senate, to establish the Judicial courts of the United States, it is directed, that a marshal shall be appointed for each district, who shall have power to appoint one or more deputies; and these deputies are to be removable from office by the judge of the district court or the circuit court sitting within the district, at the pleasure of either. It is not said that they shall be appointed by the marshal, who may remove them at pleasure; which ought to be the case if the maxim is true, that the power which appoints necessarily has the power of removal. But I dispute the maxim altogether; for though it is sometimes true, it is often fallacious; but by no means is it that kind of conclusive argument which they contend for.

Gentlemen proceed in their constructions, and they ask, why did not the convention insert a clause in the Constitution, declaring the removal to be in a manner different from the appointment? They tell us that it must naturally have occurred to them, and that here and there was the proper place to insert such a clause. Now, let me ask them also, if theirs is the natural construction, why the convention, after declaring that officers should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, did not add, to be removed in like manner? It must have as naturally occurred to insert that such a clause might have been moved and contended for; but it is hardly probable it would meet with success from those who opposed giving the Senate any check or control whatsoever over the powers of the President, much less was it probable that those gentlemen who opposed it there, should wish to enlarge it by construction; for my part, I hope never to see it increased in this way. What of this nature is brought in by the letter of the Constitution, let it be there; but let us never increase evils of which we have some right to complain.

A gentleman asks, where is the danger of mixing these powers, if the Constitution has already done it? That gentleman knows, that it has always been viewed as an evil; and an association of the Legislative and Executive powers in one body has been found to produce tyranny. It is a maxim among the wisest legislators not to blend the branches of Government further than is necessary to carry their separate powers into more complete operation. It was found necessary to blend the powers to a certain degree; so far we must acquiesce. The Senate must concur with the President in making appointments, but with respect to the removal they are not associated; no such clause is in the Constitution, and therefore I should conclude that the convention did not choose they should have the power. But what need was there that such a clause should be there? What is the evil it was intended to guard against? Why, we are afraid the President will unnecessarily remove a worthy man from office, and we say it is a pity the poor man should be turned out of service without a hearing; it is injurious to his reputation; it is his life, says the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Livermore); it is cruelty in the extreme. But why are we to suppose this? I do not see any well-grounded apprehension for such an abuse of power. Let us attend to the operation of this business. The Constitution provides for—what? That no bad man should come into office. This is the first evil. Hence we have nothing to dread from a system of favoritism: the public are well secured against that great evil; therefore the President cannot be influenced by a desire to get his own creatures into office; for it is fairly presumable that they will be rejected by the Senate. But suppose that one such could be got in, he can be got out again in despite of the President. We can impeach him, and drag him from his place, and then there will be some other person appointed.

Some gentlemen seem to think there should be another clause in the Constitution, providing that the President should not turn out a good officer, and then they would not apprehend so much danger from that quarter. There are other evils which might have been provided against, and other things which might have been regulated; but if the convention had undertaken to have done them, the Constitution, instead of being contained in a sheet of paper, would have swelled to the size of a folio volume. But what is the evil of the President's being at liberty to exercise this power of removal? Why, we fear that he will displace not one good officer only, but, in a fit of passion, all the good officers of the Government, by which, to be sure, the public would suffer. But I venture to say, he would suffer himself more than any other man. But I trust there is no dearth of good men. I believe he could not turn out so many, but that the Senate would still have some choice, even he was to do this, what would be the consequence? He would be obliged to do the duties himself; or, if he did not, we would impeach him, and turn him out of office, as he had done others. I must admit, though, that there is a possibility of such an evil, but it is a remote possibility indeed. I think gentlemen must concede, that, if there should be such a passion, such a resentment, as I have supposed between the President and the heads of departments, the one or the other ought to be removed. They must not go on pulling different ways, for the public will receive most manifest injury. Therefore it mitigates the appearance of the evil by suffering the public business to go on, which, from their irreconcilable difference, would otherwise be at a stand.

But some gentlemen seem to think this is not the only evil that ought to be apprehended. They say it would increase the power of the President to a most alarming degree indeed; that the preservation of the liberties of our country would be rendered impracticable; that an accumulation of powers in the hands of the President would establish a tyranny; that America would no longer furnish an asylum to persecuted freedom which she was wont to do. But is all this strictly true? We have seen in our day the sword, and almost every power, exist in the hands of one man, without destroying the happiness of this country. He was the head of the Church and State; the fountain of honor; could appoint and remove all the officers of this Government; yet this man, with the aid of many millions of pounds sterling, with a numerous host of men, and perhaps the finest navy in the world, had it not in his power entirely to ruin this country. The difference between the two characters is great indeed. A man elected for but four years, and an hereditary Monarch—subject to impeachment, and ever dependant upon the will of the people for his re-election. Checked and surrounded as his powers are, I see little cause for apprehension. In the honest integrity of my heart, I confess I see nothing to alarm my fears on this subject.

There was a turn given to this clause, which seemed to make it appear that we ought to agree to strike it out. It is said, that the power is already given by the Constitution, and therefore it is unnecessary to retain the clause in the bill. Others again contend that we are giving the power by construction to the President, which we ought not to do. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHERMAN) tells us, we should leave it to the President to discover what is his duty on this subject. At first there appeared great plausibility in this observation, and I was inclined to favor that opinion; but on further reflection, it appears to me as had a sentiment as any that has been suggested. The great division of this committee proves that it is a question not so easily resolved as others which have heretofore engaged our attention. Now, if we, who are a disinterested branch, find so much difficulty in determining the point, how much more will the President and Senate, who are parties concerned, be perplexed in the decision? Gentlemen may say that the Senate would choose to have it left to the parties themselves. Then why should we interfere? But I am persuaded, when the Senate perceive we are disinterested parties, they will respect our decision. I feel a most profound respect for that honorable body, and I never wish to see them disturbed in the exercise of any part of their power; but I do conceive they will receive with pleasure our opinion on this question; and therefore I am inclined to give it. We are fellow-laborers together, endeavoring to raise on the same foundation a noble structure, which will shelter us from the chilling blasts of anarchy, and the all-subduing storms of despotism. Hence, I flatter myself they will receive this assistance kindly at our hands; but, if they are otherwise inclined, they have the power to counteract what we may do. But I would by no means retreat at this time from a decision; I would let the bill go forward with our full determination; the Senate will receive it with candor. Gentlemen say it properly belongs to the Judiciary to decide this question. Be it so. It is their province to decide upon our laws; and if they find them to be unconstitutional, they will not hesitate to declare it so; and it seems to be a very difficult point to bring before them in any other way. Let gentlemen consider themselves in the tribunal of justice, called upon to decide this question on a mandamus. What a situation! almost too great for human nature to bear, they would feel great relief in having had the question decided by the representatives of the people. Hence, I conclude, they also will receive our opinion kindly.

Mr. SYLVESTER.—In the debate of yesterday, sir, we were entertained with the marvellous, the sublime, and the picturesque. We had monsters with heads and without heads; we had the powers of the Government distorted into every shape. But this, sir, is not the proper treatment which the important question demands. We ought, sir, in my opinion, to consider this subject seriously, as it relates to its constitutionality and expediency, and not to suffer our deliberations to be warped on either hand by too great apprehension or self-sufficiency. It has been insisted upon by the gentlemen against the clause, that we should not go into a construction of the Constitution, because we have no right to infer anything from it in this way; yet all their arguments are founded upon construction and implication, and lead to the very object, which they caution us to avoid. But I will agree with the gentlemen in the opposition, that if it can be demonstrated that our interpretation is contrary to the true meaning of the Constitution, we ought not to proceed to the decision; but if it is a doubtful point, (and it appears so by the controversy we have had, and by the contrariety of sentiments advanced,) I hold it to be prudent and wise to come to a decision.

The question, to be sure, has had a thorough, if not tedious investigation. But I do not repine, because I conceive the time has been well spent, as it now appears clearly that there is nothing in the clause contradictory to either the letter or spirit of the Constitution. This being demonstrated to satisfaction, the only question which remains is, whether we shall give our opinion by declaration or implication? With respect to a declaration, I would observe, that if the power of removal is lodged in the President by the Constitution, it is useless for us to interfere; and if it is not lodged there by the Constitution, can we give it? It does not appear to be expressly given by that instrument; but there is nothing in contradiction to it.

I lay it down, then, as a positive case, that the President is invested with all Executive power necessary to carry the Constitution, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, into full effect, so far as these powers are unchecked and uncontrolled by express stipulations in the Constitution. If the exceptions, with respect to appointments, had not been made, the President would have had that power, as well as the power of removal. In the first, his power is eclipsed by the interference of the Senate; but, in the last, the manifestation is clear. Both these powers being inherent in the Executive branch of the Government, must remain there; yet the Congress have the power to give them ground to act upon. The Constitution declares, that Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution all the powers contained therein. Now, the first power of nomination and appointment could not be exercised, unless Congress were to call offices into existence by law; for particular offices are not mentioned in the Constitution; they are to be created by law. If, then, we are authorized to create them, we are warranted to modify them in the same way as has already been fully explained by gentlemen who have gone before me.

Gentlemen have urged, that those who have the power to appoint may remove. This doctrine may be extended further. Those who have the power to create may also destroy. Now, I would infer from this, that the House having the power lodged with them of creating offices, and passing all laws necessary to carry the Constitution into effect, they have a right to declare the tenure by which the office shall be held. Having then the power to create offices, and discharging from office, they have a right to delegate the exercise of it to whom they please. And to whom can this be more properly entrusted than to the President of the United States?

Another clause in the Constitution gives the Congress power to vest, by law, the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone. If the officers to whom this bill relates are of such a nature, (and this seems to some gentlemen a doubtful point,) we have power to invest the President at least with the removal.

It is insisted upon, that there can be no appointment but by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nor discharge but in the same way. What does this lead to? The President is the whole Executive branch of Government; and yet you so fetter him, by attaching to him a Legislative branch, that he has little or no agency in discharging a public officer who holds his commission of him alone. Another gentleman contended, that impeachment was the only way to remove an officer. Many gentlemen, who oppose this clause, oppose his principle; but they should remember, that the mode of connecting the Senate to the President in discharging from office, is little or nothing different from an impeachment; and if this is the only way of removing officers, they have all of them an inheritance in office. For this reason, both their doctrines prove too much; consequently, they prove nothing.

Let us consider the expediency of establishing the doctrine, that officers have a tenure in office for life, or during good behaviour, which it is said will be the case if no time is limited in the bill. All officers will have to be impeached; this will require a vote of this House, and a trial before the Senate. If the necessity for dismission is pressing, clearly the mode by impeachment is not likely to answer the purpose. It can never be thought expedient to establish a doctrine so big with mischief, and likely to drive the whole Government into confusion. It is not the doctrine of the Constitution, and therefore ought not to be sanctioned. If it was to be found there, however inconvenient it might be, we should put up with it; because I do believe there is not a member in this House who is disposed to violate a Constitution he has sworn to support. I trust, and am fully persuaded, we shall not do it by our decision.

Surely it will not be any longer contended that we have no right to give our sentiments? We certainly have that right, for without such a power we could pass no law whatever. It is certain that the Judiciary will be better able to decide the question of Constitutionality in this way than any other. If we are wrong, they can correct our error; if we are right, the question will be decided at a time when no ill can result from factious or contentious parties; all is now still, and a favorable disposition to listen to reason prevails.

Conceiving, therefore, that we do not infringe the Constitution, and that the public good requires it, I am in favor of making the decision, and enabling the Executive Magistrate to exercise the duties vested in him, whenever he supposes the good of his country requires such an exertion: observing that, if this power was anywise obnoxious to the Constitution, I should be opposed to it.

Mr. STONE.—It is hardly to be expected, Mr. Chairman, that any thing new can be offered at this stage of the debate; the committee will therefore believe that the motives for delivering our opinions do not arise so much from an expectation of being able to convince, as from a desire to assign the reasons upon which our vote is founded.

I consider this as a very important question; the decision of which will form a leading feature in all our future conduct, and give the tone to the administration of the Government. But, if the evils we apprehend should absolutely arise from our determination, I do not conceive, with some other gentlemen, that we are inevitably ruined. I believe the people can apply a remedy; and I have no doubt but they have sense and resolution enough for that purpose.

The people of America, so far as they are included in a majority, and so far as they have expressed their sense of amendments, have adopted this Constitution. It was not adopted because they considered it perfect, or because they supposed it would become so; even if all their amendments took place; but because they supposed it would more effectually answer the purposes of union than any other. All the objections that were made to the Constitution went to secure the liberties of the people. I believe, and so far as my information goes it is true, that there is no State but thinks the General Government sufficiently efficient. We, who are to administer the Government, ought to carry it into execution agreeably to that principle. We must, independent of any consideration that the powers are too large here, or too small there, judge impartially of all the component parts of the Government; and however our affections may be drawn to the one part or to the other, we must preserve the Constitutional connexion and balance. It is not, according to my idea, that because the people have given a gross amount of power, they are indifferent as to the disposal of it, or that the Legislature may distribute it as they please. What makes a free Government? The equal power of the three branches of the Legislature, or two Legislative and one Executive; these acting independently and controlling each other in a precise, Constitutional manner. If these powers are blended or assimilated in one body, it becomes a tyranny. Then you ought to keep the balance as the Constitution directs, not as fancy dictates.

I should be extremely unhappy if I could believe that the association of the powers of the President and Senate is so monstrous as some gentlemen conceive. If it is true that all Governments are odious and dangerous which associate the Legislative and Executive powers in one body, I should be the last man to support this; because in all the great business of the Executive department ment, in every thing serious and affecting the Government, there is not only a temporary association, but a continued one. The first and most interesting communication of these powers is of a continued duration. The appointing officers is but a temporary connexion; but in making treaties, in which all our concerns are at stake, the connexion is durable. Is not the same information necessary for two-thirds of the Senate, as for the President, as they are to advise him in the negotiation, and concur with him in the ratification? And how can this necessary information be obtained, but by a connexion with the Executive Magistrate? Hence, if the association of the Executive and Legislative powers in one body be odious and dangerous, we are in a dangerous and odious situation under this Government.

What portion of power have Congress? I suppose it is necessary to keep the balance between the Executive Magistrate and the Senate. What is this balance? It is laid down in the Constitution that the President shall nominate, and the Senate approve; we are bound, then, to carry this balance throughout all the subjects to which it relates. If the President has the sole power of removal, you destroy the power of the Senate; and though you do not expressly put the power of appointment in the President alone, yet you put it there effectively, because he may defeat, by removal, the joint appointment. Will this be giving the proper balance which the Constitution directs? No; it will be directly the reverse.

Suppose the Constitution had been so far silent with respect to displacing officers, as to have left it within the power of the Legislature to lay down a rule on that subject. How would you lay down that rule? In favor of the President. Why? Because the Senate has too much power already, and you would give it to the President to equalize the power. This would not be right, I conceive; because I believe we are bound to support the intention of the Constitution as well as the letter. Suppose we have powers to distribute, what is to guide us in the distribution? Our own caprice? No. Look into the Constitution, and see where like powers are distributed. If I found powers distributed, I would follow the example with a similar distribution, and not impose sentiments of my own for a guide, when I had more certain and proper ones to lead me.

A separation of the powers of Government, between the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches, is considered as the proper ground for our opinion, and a principle which we must admit. Are we to get it brought into the Constitution? For I apprehend there is no such principle as a separation of those powers brought into the Constitution at present, but to the degree which an examination will appear to exist. Is there any express declaration, that it is a principle of the Constitution to keep the Legislative and Executive powers distinct? No. Has the Constitution in practice kept them separate? No. Whence is this idea drawn? That it is a principle in this Constitution, that the powers of Government should be kept separate? No sure ground is afforded for it in the Constitution itself. It is found in the celebrated writers on government; and, in general, I conceive the principle to be a good one. But if no such principle is declared in the Constitution, and that instrument has adopted exceptions, I think we ought to follow those exceptions, step by step, in every case to which they bear relation.

It has been granted by every gentleman, that dismissal may take place without trial. Some gentlemen have agreed that it ought to take place by those who appoint. Though this seems to be admitted as a pretty good general rule, no reason has been assigned for it. I believe that one may be adduced. Comparing small things with great, and reason of the thing, if the case was brought home to him. A man is employed as an agent to manage our concerns; and if no limitation is given to the agency, and we are displeased, we can dismiss the agent if we think proper. I believe an attorney is always removable at the will of his employer. Although there is not a statute that has laid down the rule in express terms, yet it is as much the law of the land as if it had been declared by an absolute statute. It follows, then, upon the same principle, that the Government has a right to remove its officers in every case, but where express limitations are made.

It has been said, that if we have a right to dismiss, the right vests in the President, because he nominates and appoints. It has been said, that if the Government has the power, it belongs to the President, and the Senate. Which ever of these assertions is true, it is founded on implication. Now, the clearest implication, and the one most exactly conformable to the Constitution, is to give it to the President and Senate. Who, by the Constitution, is to judge of the qualifications of the man, and his fitness for office? The Senate. The President only nominates a person for their consideration; they judge upon the propriety of the nomination. Go through the Constitution, from the beginning to the end, and you will not find a single instance where the President has solely the power of appointing any man to an office under the United States. This regulation may have been wrong; the convention may have been misled on this point; but still it is the Constitution. Perhaps the convention conceived, that establishing a power in the Executive to choose and control the great officers of Government, was a power too dangerous to be vested in a single person; therefore, throughout the whole Constitution, they never once invested the President with this power. Such must have been their idea on the subject, or why did they direct the Legislature to vest, as they should think proper, the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, heads of departments, or courts of law? If it is proper to construe the Constitution by implication, we should carry the implication throughout; and hence we show the President is, in no instance, entrusted with the power of appointing to office.

But it is said, that the power of removal is naturally and necessarily vested in the President as Executive Magistrate, and cannot be taken from him. This is a very important question; but the affirmative is founded on implication. I never was fond of implicating; it is but a doubtful way of determining the sense of any instrument. If the Executive Magistrate has not the power of displacing officers, then the clause is wrong; for you grant a power which you have no right to grant. If the President has the power by the Constitution, does not the House assume a power of granting what is altogether unnecessary? Is this not declaring that it is a doubtful point, and, therefore, we will grant the power; we will place it in the hands of the Executive, because we conceive it partakes of the nature of that department, not knowing whether the Constitution ever vested us or him with such authority? It has been contended, on some former occasions, respecting a bill of rights, that if you did not designate all the rights of human nature, you gave up those which were omitted. If you undertake in this bill to grant a power, you imply that you have the power to grant, or withhold, at discretion.

Now, if the position, that all Executive power vests in the President, is true and solid, the extension of it can never run into absurdity. If gentlemen determine Executive powers by implication, however dangerous the ground may be, we must go through; the Congress must have all Legislative power; all the departments of Government must have the powers which implication construes to belong to them. Again, if the power of removal is not incidental to the power of choosing, we must go through. There is a variety of clerks, commissioners of commerce, of the mint, of the army and navy; who is to appoint these officers? The Constitution tells you, in some cases the President and Senate; and in others, the President alone. This House appoints its own officers; but, in every case, the President has the power of removal; because the power is incidental to the Executive. How are we to get rid of this absurdity? Besides, if all Executive power is vested in the President, what right has this House to prescribe him rules to interfere in forming Executive officers? The Executive can better form them for itself. If implication prove the President purely Executive, it is inconsistent to modify. The gentleman from Virginia says, we may limit the duration of this officer. But why do this? The Executive powers are constitutional. Why are we to suspend their operation? But what would signify this interference of the Legislature, if it could produce no good? If the present office is wholly Executive, the House has no right to meddle in the business.

I believe we shall be deprived of the safe mode of getting rid of this officer, and have one introduced that will be subversive of every authority which the Constitution vests with respect to appointments in the President and Senate.

If gentlemen will tell us that powers, impliedly Executive, belong to the President, they ought to go further with the idea, and give us a correct idea of Executive power, as applicable to their rule. In an absolute monarchy there never has been any doubt with respect to implication; the monarch can do what he pleases. In a limited monarchy, the prince has powers incident to his prerogative. How far will a Federal Executive, limited by a Constitution, extend in implications of this kind? Does it go so far as absolute monarchy? Or is it confined to a restrained monarchy? If gentlemen will lay down their rule, it will serve us as a criterion to determine all questions respecting the Executive authority of this Government.

My conception may be dull; but telling me that this is an Executive power, raises no complete idea in my mind. If you tell me the nature of Executive power, and how far the principle extends, I may be able to judge whether this has relation thereto, and how much is due to implication.

If I look to the Constitution, or nature of things, I should be led to conclude that the body choosing agents has the power of dismissing them; because the power naturally lodges in those who have the interest and management of the concern. The Executive business of this officer is under the superintendence and management of the Senate, as well as the President. Treaties with foreign nations must be conducted by the advice of the Senate, and concluded with their consent. Hence results a necessity in that body's having a concern in the choice and dismissal of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs. I do not see any other sure or safe bottom on which the question can be determined.

I will just advert to a few arguments which go to prove that officers, once appointed, ought not to be removed in the manner contended for, without insisting upon them at this late period of debate.

In the nature of things, in all appointments, there is an implied contract: on the part of the officer, that he will perform the service; and on the part of those who appoint him, that he shall have an adequate reward. In the engagement of the officer, qualities, commensurate with the duties, are required: in the reward, the dignity of the station and the qualities of the officer ought to be estimated. And although, in this engagement, an officer may dispense with certain forms of trial, yet he can never surrender a natural right; he cannot engage to be punished without being guilty, or dismissed without being useless. It has been well observed, that the appointment ought to cease when the causes of it no longer exist; but it is equally clear that it ought to continue as long as the reasons remain. And although, in public and private life, it may be proper to discharge an agent without divulging the reason; yet clearly a good reason ought to precede the dismissal, because, otherwise, you do an act of injustice by a breach of contract.

And if we have now the power to make the rule, we ought to make it conform to these principles. Let justice and reason operate as profitably, as secretly, and as quickly as may be; but let not their agency be superseded by the passions we disapprove.

In the scale of responsibility this power has been weighed, and determined to be lodged with the President on that account. But wherefore? I consider the Senate more responsible than the President. The Senate must keep a journal of their proceedings; their acts are manifested to the power appointing them, who are always in existence. The electors of the President meet for a moment, to make their choice; but will the conduct of a President be investigated? Will they have materials to form their judgment upon?

Or will their existence bear an extension sufficient for any other purpose than barely to meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two persons, and to make out a certificate of their proceedings? Is there the same degree of responsibility? When a Senate is appointed, the Legislature of the respective States will keep a watchful eye over their conduct; and if they are displeased with a Senator, they will not hesitate to turn him out; they can effect this on information and deliberation. The State Legislatures are in the habit of discussing questions respecting the general good; they will discuss the propriety of the Senate's conduct; while the electors of the President are too widely spread, and too short a time assembled, to effect a purpose of this nature.

It has been judged by some gentlemen a dreadful affair that the President should become a party before the Senate; it would degrade his dignity. It was said, the Judiciary would be pleased if this weighty question could be taken off their hands.

To what a height do gentlemen exalt that character in their own minds! How far above the level of the people, when they consider it derogatory to his dignity to institute an examination into the conduct of an officer next to himself in rank! when they consider it almost above human nature to determine a question of right between the President and a great officer of the United States. If gentlemen have an idea that this character is to have such a degree of elevation above the community, it is time to think of restraining his power. Upon what does power depend? Not upon the strength of arm, but opinion. If gentlemen will exalt a character above themselves, call him what you will, he will be possessed of monarchy. In this enthusiasm of confidence, we seem to forget the confidence we have in the President, Senate, and great officers of Government in appointments, as compared with the confidence in the President in removals. Why, if the powers of inquiry, judgment, impartiality, and discernment, stipulated by the Constitution in the President and Senate to select good men and the first characters into office, will you place more confidence in the President alone than in the Senate and heads of departments together? This is inconsistent with the confidence which the Constitution reposes in the Executive.

We have expended our treasure, our blood, and our time, to very little purpose, if we do not think that liberty and safety exalt the human species. From the meanest to the highest rank in life, the propriety of conduct arises from the security and independence of situation. I will not pursue the argument further, than to observe, that from these principles it is, that there is more liberty and nobleness of soul in a common man in America, than in a Minister of State in Turkey; but if the principles for which the advocates of this clause contend are adopted, it will give this influence. If a man is a candidate for an office, held by the tenure of will and pleasure, he must examine his soul, and see if there are qualities in him to enable him to cringe, and submit to the arbitrary mandate of the President; if he finds these qualities in his disposition, he is suited for the business; but if the Constitution is to be justly administered, and he finds himself disposed to sacrifice to the pleasure of the Chief Magistrate, although he possesses qualities which, as I said before, suited him for his employment, yet he is unfit for the office.

— Mr. Vining.—I am impressed with the importance and magnitude of the present subject, equally with other gentlemen.

In the body politic, Mr. Chairman, the Executive authority is a marked feature; and the question in my mind is, shall we deform it by displacing it, or give it that fixture which the Constitution intended, and which a due regard to symmetry and proportion requires. It has been well demonstrated that the various powers of Government ought to be exercised by distinct bodies, in order to provide a happy administration, and secure to the nation the blessings of freedom; or if they are any way blended, it ought not to exceed that degree necessary to execute good government.

But gentlemen tell us that this is not the language of the Constitution. My honorable friend from Georgia (Mr. Jackson) has gone so far as to ask us for an instance in any Government, where this principle obtains. To investigate this question fully, would lead us into an extensive field of historical research. I will, therefore, in order to save time, admit that, in most countries, this division of power is faintly defined. Yet, in Great Britain, where this doctrine is strongly advocated, the lines of distinction are deeply marked. It is true, the Executive authority is blended with the Legislative; but how far does this extend? No further than to assure a salutary administration of that form of Government. But, say gentlemen, the power which Great Britain leaves in her Executive Magistrate would, in this country, be an alarming subject. I am pleased with the great concern manifested by honorable gentlemen for the preservation of liberty; and admit with them, that it is involved in our decision. But suffer me to explain why I think so.

There have been few Governments overthrown by the independence of the Executive. What are the consequences of clipping its wings? Anarchy and confusion, and a struggle between the Legislative and Executive, in which the latter is generally sacrificed on the altar of despotism. Thus, the liberty of the people to be involved in our decision. If by Legislative encroachment we weaken the Executive arm, we render it incapable of performing the functions assigned it by the Constitution, and subject it to become an easy prey to the other branches of the Government.

Gentlemen may tell us, that the Executive, with the command of the military, may acquire uncontrollable power. Perhaps some experience may authorize the inference. But, let me ask, what has been the cause? I take it that adequate powers have been denied the Executive, or taken from it. In either case, the Executive must have exercised authority not legally vested, in order to continue the operations of Government. And being once accustomed to assume power, the habit is easily confirmed; so that shortly the aggregate of power assembles on the ground where you refused a just participation. Now, if you allow a just distribution of the powers of the Government, you leave the Executive no pretext to justify an unconstitutional seizure on its part. The King of Great Britain has the command of the army and navy; but have those engines of despotism been called into action to wrest from the people, powers not legally vested in the Crown? The answer must be in the negative. And why has this not been done? Because the Constitutional powers of the British monarch are sufficient to answer the purposes of the Government.

Let us turn to Sweden and Poland for an illustration of this doctrine; for examples to convince us of the dangerous tendency of denying the Executive a due proportion of power. In Sweden, the limited power of the King was nearly annihilated by an aristocracy. And what has resulted from that circumstance? Why, at this moment, you find the monarch compelled, for the security of his nation, to assume all the powers of despotism; and you behold the nation submitting cheerfully to the event, nay, joining the throne in establishing an arbitrary Government; by which all their rights as men and privileges as citizens are immolated at the shrine of prerogative.

The legislative authority in Poland belongs essentially to the Diet; though the Senate is the soul of this body, she retains royalty without fearing her Kings. The object of the Poles has been to guard against what was called the encroachments of the throne. It is not (said they) but a century ago) a master that we want, it is only a chief; some went further, and asserted, that a free people wanted no chief at all.

This republican language became the prevailing style in all assemblies of State. And to what has it led? Placed under the absolute Government of a single person, they continually complained of the weight of the yoke. Left to the enjoyment of liberty, they knew not how to use it for their own good; and by abridging the efficacy of the Executive, they fell into intestine commotion, which delivered them up an easy prey to their ambitious neighbors. Are we to learn nothing from these dreadful examples? Will gentlemen persist in contracting the Constitutional powers of the Executive? Will they, against their own principles, acquiesce in blending Executive and Legislative powers? Far off may that period be, when the Congress of the United States shall shorten the arm of her Executive. Success in such a measure will fore-run the obsequies of freedom.

Mr. Chairman, I am confounded with the diversity of arguments used on this occasion. I know not how to reply. Some gentlemen say it is wrong, it is cruel, to take away the wealth, the reputation, (and this word is synonymous, in the apprehension of others, with life,) from your public officers without an impeachment; and yet, gentlemen on the same side of the question admit, that an officer may be properly removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or, in other words, without impeachment.

Will gentlemen view for a moment the effect of their arguments? Suppose the President desires to remove a bad officer, and the Senate refuse; what is to become of your impeachments, I say, sir, that the House of Representatives, combined with your Executive, will be unable to procure the dismissal of an officer who is hourly betraying his trust, and that in the most open and flagrant manner. If your proofs are clear as a mathematical demonstration, it is all in vain; your tribunal, which is to decide upon the impeachment, has prejudged the question. I will, nevertheless, on account of the expected patriotism of that body, admit, that there is a possibility of obtaining justice. But are the interests, the rights, and happiness of this great community, to depend upon a bare possibility alone, when our Constitution has provided safety and stability to the public welfare? We say that the mode of removing bad or obnoxious officers by impeachment is tedious and uncertain at best; but it is not to be relied on, if the Senate are connected with the President in the general power of removing; for it would ever be in the power of a faction, or a party in the Senate, so to clog the wheels of our political machine, as to render its motions slow and unavailing. And this they could do without being in the least degree responsible. Let not gentlemen talk of their responsibility, and compare it with the President's. We do not predict shadowy and chimerical evils. What we fear has actually happened; the mischief of precedent is already established; the Senate declare their concurrence in appointments, by ballot. In this secret mode, through cabals, through intrigue, they will be able to defeat every salutary agency of the Executive, in seeing his instruments perform their duty.

Mr. STONE.—Do I understand the gentleman? Does he tell us that the Senate decide by ballot? I should be glad to ascertain the fact.

Mr. Vining.—They did so yesterday. I presume I need not mention the consequences of such procedure. But where is the responsibility when a man can hide his vote? If they do an obnoxious thing, they will say, I did not vote so; and shift the blame from themselves. Where will you go to ascertain the fact? Into the dark recesses of a ballot-box, and there you will seek for tickets, whose hand-writing is to serve as a clue to this business of mystery. But, behold! the tickets are torn, and scattered to the wind.

This Government, Mr. Chairman, let us remember, rose like Hercules' brawny frame from its cradle. Let us avail ourselves of the wisdom and experience of former ages. Let us aggregate the knowledge of every nation, to give its nerves their vigor, and each muscle its due strength; that, like that demi-god, it may strangle, even in its infancy, the malignant and venomous efforts of its subtle invaders.

Who, let me ask, is the Chief Magistrate under this Government? The President. What are his duties? To see the laws faithfully executed; if he does not do this effectually, he is responsible. To whom? To the people. Have they the means of calling him to account, and punishing him for neglect? They have secured it in the Constitution, by impeachment; to be presented by their immediate representatives; if they fail here, they have another check when the time of election comes round. But what are the duties, and what is the responsibility of the Senators? In their legislative capacity it is not intended that they shall assist the President; it is an additional Executive authority. Is it compatible with the principles of the Constitution, that the Legislature should assume Executive power, or is it done in order to make itself responsible? Surely not. But if it was admissible, what degree of responsibility is acquired through the Senate? They are not the representatives of the people; they are the representatives of the State sovereignties, as was well observed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Scott;) who are nothing less than accountable to the people. They may have a policy to pursue not altogether consistent with the salus populi, and are only responsible to the State sovereignties.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. STONE) compares the point in question with that of an attorney; for my part, I do not conceive the application well made. The Senate are combined with the President to aid him in the choice of his officers. The officers are not the agents of the Senate; they do not act for the Senate; they act for the Executive Magistrate. If you give the Senate a power in the removal, you give them an agency in the Executive business which the Constitution never contemplated. If, therefore, the honorable gentleman's arguments mean any thing, they mean that the Senate ought to have complete power over the attorney of the President.

Mr. STONE said, that the gentleman did not seem to understand his general principle, that the power which appoints is naturally vested with power over the agent. He by no means admitted that the business of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs was to be done exclusively for the President; he conceived the Senate was constitutionally vested with power over that department.

Mr. Vining.—If I have misapprehended the gentleman's argument on this point, I will waive my reply, and proceed to what seems to assume a more serious appearance. It is contended, that if the Constitution does not vest the power of removal in the President, we have no right to give it. The Constitution authorizes a complete Government, and leaves it to the Legislature to organize it by creating the necessary offices. The power of establishing offices implies complete power over them, and gives to Congress a right to form them on such principles as shall appear to be most conducive to the public good. To establish officers immovable, is not contemplated by the Constitution but in the case of the Judges. If they are removable, Congress have authority to declare by whom, unless some express provision on this head was made in the Constitution. No express provision being made, it remains for this House to declare their sentiments. I will not recapitulate the arguments which were well urged by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Madison,) to show that if the Constitution had made express provision, there can be no impropriety in declaring it by law.

Upon the whole, it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that the object of every gentleman on this floor is the same, however various and diversified the roads we pursue to attain it; from which opinion, I am led to conclude, that however a misguided zeal may terrify us with alarms, we shall coolly and deliberately unite in carrying into complete operation the Legislative and Executive powers vested in this Government, as the only means under heaven of securing to ourselves and posterity the blessings of freedom and tranquillity.

Mr. GEARY.—If we take this step, Mr. Chairman, we shall have to take another, which may shake the Government itself. How judicious this may be at this time, I leave the advocates of the clause in question to determine.

The gentleman opposite to me, from Georgia, (Mr. BALDWIN) has asserted, that we mean to put a construction upon the Constitution, and that the clause is only a violation of our construction, and not of the Constitution itself. I think he is wholly mistaken with respect to the opponents of this clause. I can speak for myself. I am decidedly against putting any construction whatever on the Constitution, for several reasons. Sir, we are not the expositors of the Constitution; but if we were the expositors, we ought to give our exposition by a declaratory act, and not foist it in where no one would ever look for it. But if it were done by a declaratory act, I conceive it would be impossible to draw the line at which declaratory acts should stop. Hence we should alter the Constitutional mode of amending the system of Government. Another difficulty would also arise: the judges are the expositors of the Constitution and the acts of Congress. Our exposition, therefore, would be subject to their revision. In this way the Constitutional balance would be destroyed; the Legislature, with the Judiciary, might remove the head of the Executive branch. But a further reason why we are not the expositors is, that the Judiciary may disagree with us, and undo what all our efforts have labored to accomplish. A law is a nullity, unless it can be carried into execution; in this case, our law will be suspended. Hence all construction of the meaning of the Constitution, is dangerous or unnatural, and therefore ought to be avoided.

This is our doctrine, that no power of this kind ought to be exercised by the Legislature. But we say, if we must give a construction to the Constitution, it is more natural to give the construction in favor of the power of removal vesting in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; because it is in the nature of things, that the power which appoints, removes also. If there are deviations from this general rule, the instances are few, and not sufficient to warrant our departure on this occasion. We say our construction is superior also, because it does not militate against any clause of the Constitution; whilst a contrary construction militates against several, and, in some respects, renders them mere nullities.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Madison) dwells strongly on the necessity of keeping the departments of Government separate and distinct. What does he mean? Does he infer that there is not a natural affinity between the power of appointing and removing, and therefore they ought to be kept separate? I presume not. He would admit there is such an affinity. Then I would ask, in what character does the Senate act in case of appointments? They act as an advisory and Executive body. If they are Executive in the act of appointing, there is no clashing of powers, consequently no blending in the case of removal. But if gentlemen say, that, in appointments, the Executive and Legislative powers are blended, their position is contrary to what they say are the true principles of the Constitution.

We have the power to establish offices by law; we can declare the duties of the officer; these duties are what the Legislature directs, and not what the President; the officer is bound by law to perform these duties. But this clause militates against the institution itself; for the President is to have the power of preventing the execution; the office, and its duties, are suspended on the pleasure of the President. Suppose an officer discharges his duty as the law directs, yet the President will remove him; he will be guided by some other criterion; perhaps the officer is not good-natured enough; he makes an ungraceful bow, or does it left leg foremost; this is unbecoming in a great officer at the President's levee. Now, because he is so unfortunate as not to be so good a dancer as he is a worthy officer, he must be removed. The Senate, and this House, may think it necessary to inquire, why a good officer is dismissed. The President will say, it is my pleasure; I am authorized by law to exercise this prerogative; I have my reasons for it, but you have no right to require them of me. This language may be proper in a monarchy; but in a republic every action ought to be accounted for. How can you impeach the President, as was said by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Madison,) for exercising a power vested in him by law? Sir, it is an absurdity to talk of impeachments on such occasions, when the officer is shielded by the law.

There is a consistency under a monarchy of the King's exercising the power of appointment and removal at pleasure. In Great Britain, this is the prerogative of the throne; where it is likewise held a maxim, that the King can do no wrong. The Chief Magistrate under this Constitution is a different character: there is a Constitutional tribunal, where he may be arraigned, condemned, and punished, if he does wrong. The reason of this distinction I take to be this: The majesty of the people receives an injury when the President commits an improper act, for which they are to receive satisfaction. Kings have a property in Government, and when a Monarch acts unwisely he injures his own interest, but is accountable to none; because satisfaction is due to himself alone. He is established in his office for life; it is an estate to him, which he is interested to transmit to his posterity unimpaired. The good of the people, upon principles of interest, will be his peculiar study. He ought, therefore, to have power to act in such a manner as is most likely to secure to him this object; then, necessarily, he must have the right of choosing or displacing his agents. There can be no difficulty on this point; but in a confederated republic, the Chief Magistrate has no such trust; he is elected but for four years, after which the Government goes into other hands. He is not stimulated to improve a patrimony, and therefore has no occasion for complete power over the officers of the Government. If he has such power, it can only be made useful to himself by being the means of procuring him a re-election, but can never be useful to the people by inducing him to appoint good officers or remove bad ones. It appears to me that such unbounded power vitiates the principles of the Constitution; and the officers, instead of being the machinery of the Government, moving in the regular order prescribed by the Legislature, will be the mere puppets of the President, to be employed or thrown aside as useless lumber, according to his prevailing fancy.

If gentlemen will take this step, they must take another, and secure the public good by making it the interest of the President to consult it; they must elect him for life, or, what will be more consistent still, they must make his office hereditary. Then gentlemen may say, with some degree of truth, that he ought to have the power of removal, to secure in his hands a balance in the Government. But if gentlemen are willing to remain where they are, and abide by the Constitution, regarding its true principles, they will not contend that there is a necessity, or even a propriety, in vesting this power in the President alone.

Gentlemen tell us they are willing to consider this as a Constitutional question, and yet the bill shows that they consider the Constitution silent; for the clause grants the power in express terms. This also implies that the Legislature have a right to interfere with the Executive power, contrary to their avowed principles. If the Legislature have not the power of removal, they cannot confer it upon others; if they have it, it is a legislative power, and they have no right to transfer the exercise of it to any other body. So, view this question in whatever point of light you please, it is clear the words ought to be struck out. Mr. SHERMAN.—I wish, Mr. Chairman, that the words may be left out of the bill, without giving up the question either way as to the propriety of the measure. Many of the honorable gentlemen who advocate this clause have labored to show that the President has, Constitutionally, the power of removal. If this be a well-founded opinion, they ought not to let the words remain in the bill, because they are of such a nature as to imply that he had not the power before it was granted him by the law.

If gentlemen would consent to make a general law, declaring the proper mode of removal, I think we should acquire a greater degree of unanimity, which, on this occasion, must be better than carrying the question against a large minority.

The call for the question being now very general, it was put, shall the words "to be removable by the President," be struck out?

It was determined in the negative; being yeas 20, nays 34.

Mr. CARROLL proposed a clause, limiting the operation of the act, under a hope that a time would come when the United States would be disengaged from the necessity of supporting a Secretary of Foreign Affairs. He thought the policy of limiting establishments, in their nature not always necessary, evident to every thinking mind; and he hoped Congress would pursue the principle on this and every similar occasion. He viewed the natural situation of this country as some security against our being drawn into the vortex of European politics; but the present bill afforded a means of attraction which it was prudent to guard against.

Mr. BENSON saw no necessity for the clause, for his mind did not contemplate a time when a Secretary of Foreign Affairs would be an unnecessary or useless officer.

Mr. MADISON thought limitations ought never to be made, unless for special reasons; because it would be destructive of the salutary permanency of the laws, which was an object of no inconsiderable magnitude.

Mr. AMES had no doubt of the good intention of the worthy and honorable mover; but he thought a limitation would be injurious. The United States is a member of the society composed of the assemblage of all the nations of the earth; and it is impossible, as a member of this great society, but that there ever will be a natural obligation to maintain an intercourse with them. If the gentleman discovered that he had mistaken his principle, he flattered himself the motion would be withdrawn.

Mr. STONE expressed himself in favor of the motion, in order that the House might preserve their due share of the Government. If the officer became expensive, and was so much under the control of the President, he would never consent to the repeal of a law which thus extended his influence.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought, with the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. CARROLL,) that the United States might look forward to a time when the officer would be unnecessary; and, therefore, was in favor of the proposed limitation.

Mr. GERRY.—I am in favor of something of this kind; but I do not see that it is absolutely necessary we should be obliged to re-make our laws every three or four years. This would be giving ourselves much trouble, and causing great expense to our constituents. I do not know but we may manage better in another way. If a gentleman has a carriage and horses, he may sell the horses and keep the carriage. This will not occasion so much expense: he may buy horses again when he wants them. So I would let the bill remain, but limit the appointment of the officer to a term of years.

Mr. BODINOT remarked, that the House always had the officer in their power, because they could limit his salary, or determine it altogether, if they judged proper.

Mr. CARROLL thought the object of his motion favored by the public opinion. His own sentiments were clearly in favor of it. He did not presume to lead in this business, but should submit to the fate of his amendment.

Mr. SENECA was of opinion that the commerce of America would flourish under the new Government, and, as that extended, he apprehended the necessity of maintaining this officer would increase; he should, therefore, be against the motion.

Mr. STONE.—If you make this law permanent, and give permanent salaries, which is very likely to be the case, the House will have no control over this department, unless two-thirds of both Houses acquiesce in the repeal.

Mr. WHITE would move to strike out the clause respecting the salary, and then the House might have the check mentioned by the gentleman from Jersey, (Mr. BODINOT.)

Mr. MANISON said, that limiting the bill would abridge a power which the committee had declared to belong to the President; but limiting the officer, as mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts, would do so in a still greater degree. He thought the power, with respect to granting salaries, always secured to the House its due portion of the powers of Government.

Mr. CARROLL withdrew his motion, in order to give an opportunity to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WHITE) to make a proposition for striking out the salary clause.

Hereupon, Mr. WHITE's motion for striking out was put and agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported the bill, with the proposed amendments, to the House.—Adjourned.

MONDAY, June 22.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The bill for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, being taken up by the House, for consideration.

Mr. CARROLL renewed in the House the motion for limiting the duration of the bill, which he yesterday made and withdrew.

On the question, shall the clause be added? it was determined in the negative.

The question which had been so many days agitated in the Committee of the Whole, was now renewed by Mr. GERRY, when,

Mr. BENSON moved to amend the bill, by altering the second clause, so as to imply the power of removal to be in the President. The clause enacted, that there should be a chief clerk, to be appointed by the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and employed as he thought proper, and who, in case of vacancy, shall have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the department; and the amendment proposed that the chief clerk, "whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the department.

Mr. BENSON declared, if he succeeded in this amendment, he would move to strike out the words in the first clause, "to be removable by the President," which appeared somewhat like a grant. Now, the mode he took would evade that point, and establish a legislative construction of the Constitution. He also hoped his amendment would succeed in reconciling both sides of the House to the decision, and quieting the minds of gentlemen.

Mr. PAGE expressed a desire of calling the yeas and nays on the question which had so long agitated them. He was apprehensive that, by shifting the ground in the manner now proposed, the journal would not declare truly the question which had been so long contested.

Mr. LAVAUGHN viewed the clause as a legislative declaration; for which reason he should be well satisfied with it as it stood. He should be glad to meet the gentlemen on ground of accommodation; but he did not think it likely to be effected by the proposed alteration.

Mr. MANISON admitted the objection made by the gentleman near him (Mr. BENSON) to the words in the bill; they certainly may be construed to imply a legislative grant of the power. He wished every thing like ambiguity expunged, and the sense of the clause explicitly declared, and therefore seconded the motion. Gentlemen have all along proceeded on the idea that the Constitution vests the power in the President; and what arguments were brought forward respecting the convenience or inconvenience of such a disposition of the power, were intended only to throw light upon what was meant by the compilers of the Constitution. Now, as the words proposed by the gentleman from New York expressed to his mind the meaning of the Constitution, he should be in favor of them, and would agree to strike out those agreed to in committee.

Mr. SWAIN, of South Carolina.—I believe gentlemen are convinced of the impropriety of the clause carried in the committee; and though they are not willing to relinquish openly their principles, yet they will do it by agreeing to their amendment. Will they pretend to carry their point by a side blow, when they are defeated by fair argument, on due reflection? For my part, Mr. Speaker, I hold any declaration whatsoever an infringement on the Constitution; but at the same time, if it be done, I hold it more candid and manly to do it in direct terms, than by an implication like the one proposed.

Mr. SENECA.—I wish the honorable mover of the amendment had been content with the decision of yesterday; because I apprehend the discussion of the question which he has agitated will take up some time, without any possible advantage. For my part, I do not see the difficulty which seems to strike his mind. If I understand the subject rightly, there seem to be two opinions dividing the majority of this House. Some of these gentlemen seem to suppose that, by the Constitution, and by implication and certain deduction from the principles of the Constitution, the power vests in the President. Others think that it is a matter of legislative determination, and that they must give it to the President on the principles of the Constitution. Now, suppose either of these sentiments to be just, there is no impropriety in the other's assenting to the mode of expression already adopted: yet, if the latter opinion which I stated is the true one, there is an evident impropriety in agreeing to the amendment, and it may tend more to divide than unite the House. I hope the gentlemen will therefore withdraw his motion, at least until the old question on striking out be decided.

Mr. BENSON had no objection to let his motion lie on the table. But his objection to the clause arose from an idea that the power of removal by the President hereafter might appear to be exercised by virtue of a legislative grant only, and consequently be subjected to legislative instability, when he was well satisfied in his own mind, that it was fixed by a fair legislative construction of the Constitution.

Mr. MANISON withdrew his second to the gentleman's motion for the present, and proposed to the gentlemen who thought the Constitution vested the power in the President and Senate, to try their opinion, by moving to add after the words "to be removable by the President," "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." This motion, he thought, would give gentlemen a fair opportunity of trying the question, and recording their opinions. He begged gentlemen in opposition would not consider the motion of the gentleman from New York (Mr. BENSON) as a dereliction of the principle hitherto contended for; because it had no other effect than varying the declaration which the majority were inclined to make; consequently, there was no room for exclusion on the part of the minority.

[Here followed a desultory conversation respecting the manner in which the question should be put; during which Mr. SENECA said he would admit Mr. BENSON's amendment, because it could do no harm, being only a repetition of the words in the first clause; but he would vote against striking out in the first clause, when that question came before the House.]

The question on the amendment proposed by Mr. BENSON, was taken by the yeas and nays, which are as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Brown, Burke, Carroll, Clymer, Contee, Fitzsimons, Gilman, Goodhue, Griffin, Hartley, Heister, Lawrence, Lee, Leonard, Madison, Moore, Muhlenberg, Scott, Sedgwick, Seney, Simeon, Smith, of Maryland, Sylvester, Thatcher, Trumbull, Vining, and Wadsworth—80.

NAYS.—Messrs. Cadwalader, Coles, Gerry, Grout, Hathorn, Huntington, Livermore, Matthews, Page, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Sherman, Smith, of South Carolina, Sturgis, Sumter, Tucker, and White—18.

So the amendment was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. BENSON now moved to strike out of the first clause the words "to be removable by the President."

Mr. PAGE insisted that gentlemen had changed their ground by the amendment which had just taken place. It was now left to be inferred from the Constitution that the President had the power of removal, without even a legislative declaration on that point, which they had heretofore so strongly insisted upon. He would submit to the majority how far this comported with their arguments, and leave them to say if they had not evacuated untenable ground.

He did not wish to say much more on the subject, after it had been so well discussed; but could not help observing that, to a man of common sense, nothing appeared in the Constitution from which it might be inferred that the power of removal vested in the President. All that was expressed in the instrument itself related to removing by impeachment. How far they were tied down by the letter of the Constitution he would not positively say; but if any thing was to be drawn even from analogy, it was in favor of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Besides, the exercise of such a prerogative by a Chief Magistrate is incompatible with the principles of a free Government. The gentlemen tell us that these are the principles of the Constitution. I know not what were the intentions of its framers, but I see and judge of the work by my faculty of understanding; and nothing appears to convince me that the Constitution distributes the power in the manner gentlemen have said. If we were framing a Constitution, it might be proper to discuss the propriety of vesting the power of removal in the President; but as we are acting under one which we are sworn to support, I presume we are not at liberty to vary it by implication. I observed on a former occasion, that in doing this we do what is not only unnecessary, but dangerous. It will excite the jealousy of the people, raise fresh alarms, and create new rumors. We shall lose the confidence of our constituents, without which no Government can be well administered. I said before that gentlemen did not consider the extent of their doctrine, when they contended so strongly for energy in government. Energy in government may become a despotism. The people of America, I will be bold to say, do not wish a government energetic to this degree. They wish the Government to be as the Constitution has fixed it, and its powers to be exercised in the manner it has pointed out; and not to be accumulated upon the Chief Magistrate, in order to make him like a sovereign whose yoke they disdained to bear.

Let me remind gentlemen once more of the situation of this country. There are thousands of our fellow-citizens dissatisfied with this feature of the Constitution. There are two whole States which have not adopted our Constitution. Can this be the time to make your Government more odious—to show a disposition towards monarchy? It cannot be. The patriots of America will never do ought to drive their country into that anarchy from which it is but just arising; they will not force the people to be loudly clamorous for amendments; yet such is the evident tendency of the present policy.

I earnestly hope that the words which we have all along contended against may be struck out; for, desirable as this bill is, I would rather lose it altogether than pass it in its present form.

Mr. MADISON.—I am in favor of the motion for striking out, but not upon the principles of my worthy colleague. I will briefly state my reasons for voting in the manner I intend. First, altering the mode of expression tends to give satisfaction to those gentlemen who think it not an object of legislative discretion; and second, because the amendment already agreed to fully contains the sense of this House upon the doctrine of the Constitution; and therefore the words are unnecessary as they stand here. I will not trouble the House with repeating the reasons why the change of expression is best, as they are well understood. But gentlemen cannot fairly urge against us a change of ground, because the point we contended for is fully obtained by the amendment. It was truly said by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BEXSON,) that these words carry with them an implication that the Legislature has the power of granting the power of removal.

It is needless to assign my reasons why I think the Legislature not in possession of this power; they were fully explained before. I therefore shall only say, if there is a principle in our Constitution, indeed in any free Constitution, more sacred than another, it is that which separates the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers. If there is any point in which the separation of the Legislative and Executive powers ought to be maintained with greater caution, it is that which relates to officers and offices. The powers relative to officers are partly Legislative and partly Executive. The Legislature creates the office, defines the powers, limits its duration, and annexes a compensation. This done, the Legislative power ceases. They ought to have nothing to do with designating the man to fill the office. That I conceive to be of an Executive nature. Although it be qualified in the Constitution, I would not extend or strain that qualification beyond the limits precisely fixed for it. We ought always to consider the Constitution with an eye to the principles upon which it was founded. In this point of view, we shall readily conclude that if the Legislature determines the powers, the honors, and emoluments of an office, we should be insecure if they were to designate the officer also. The nature of things restrains and confines the Legislative and Executive authorities in this respect; and hence it is that the Constitution stipulates for the independence of each branch of the Government.

Let it be understood that the Legislature is to have some influence both in appointing and removing officers, and I venture to say the people of America will justly fear a system of sinecures. What security have they that offices will not be created to accommodate favorites or pensioners subservient to their designs? I never did conceive, that so far as the Constitution gave one branch of the Legislature an agency in this business, it was, by any means, one of its most meritorious parts; but so far as it has gone, I confess I would be as unwilling to abridge the power of that body as to enlarge it. But considering, as I do, that the Constitution fairly vests the President with the power, and that the amendment declares this to be the sense of the House, I shall concur with the gentlemen in opposition so far as to strike out these words, which I now look upon to be useless.

I have a great respect for the abilities and judgment of my worthy colleague, (Mr. PAGE,) and am convinced he is inspired by the purest motives in his opposition to what he conceives to be an improper measure; but I hope he will not think so strange of our difference, if he considers the small proportion of the House which concurs with him with respect to impeachment being the only way of removing officers. I believe the opinion is held but by one gentleman besides himself. If this sentiment were to obtain, it would give rise to more objections to the Constitution than gentlemen are aware of; more than any other construction whatever. Yet while he professes to be greatly alarmed on one account, he possesses a stoic apathy with respect to the other.

Mr. SENECA did not mean to trouble the House with the reasons upon which his opinion was founded. He supposed every gentleman had made up his mind upon full deliberation. He had made up an opinion for himself, and intended to be guided by this opinion in giving his vote.

He believed there were a thousand circumstances which would demand a removal from office, of which the President alone could be the proper judge; therefore, the President alone ought to possess the power. He excluded cases of impeachment; but he thought it was the discretion of the Legislature to authorize the exercise of it, because they had complete power over the duration of the offices they created. Hence he deemed it necessary to make an express grant of the power of removal; but strike out these words, and there is no express grant in the bill. Now, if he was right in his construction, it became necessary to retain the words; they could do no harm for the reasons before mentioned, and they stand very well with the amendment already agreed to. If he erred in judgment, no injury could arise from the error. But if other gentlemen err in their construction, we have a weak, decrepit explanation, which the President may not easily understand. For if he supposes the Constitution totally silent, he can hardly draw authority from your law; and he will be reduced to the dilemma of acting in the manner related of the late Governor of Virginia by an honorable gentleman from that State, (Mr. WHITE,) which is by no means to be wished.

Mr. GERRY was glad to find the majority had relinquished the right of the Legislature to grant this power. If they would go further, and leave the operation of the Constitution uninfluenced, they would do right; but certainly it is improper for the House to throw its weight into the scale with the President, to counteract what gentlemen think a constitutional imbecility.

Mr. MOORE expressed his approbation of the motion, after what had been carried, because he would not have it thought that the Legislature possess a right to confer powers not vested in them by the Constitution.

Mr. LAWRENCE was against striking out the words, because he thought the Legislature had power to establish offices on what terms they pleased. The Constitution secured the independence of the judges, by making their appointment during good behavior; but would any gentleman contend that Congress could not make this tenure likely to be most productive of public good? If this was admitted, the Legislature might abridge the constitutional power of the President respecting the removal of such officers. To avoid this clashing of opinions, he wished the words to remain in the bill.

Mr. BOURNOR was against the motion, because the Constitution vested all executive power in the President. The power of designating and appointing officers to execute the laws was in its nature executive. Consequently, the President would appoint ex officio if he had not been limited by the express words of the Constitution. Hence he inferred, ex officio, he would remove, without limitation; but as debate had arisen, and the question been seriously agitated, he was clear for making a legislative declaration, in order to prevent future inconvenience.

He had another reason. The arguments on a similar motion had taken up four days; they were such as convinced a large majority of the House that the words ought to remain in the bill. Now, to strike out after such mature deliberation, argued, a fickleness which he hoped never to see affect this honorable body. No new arguments have now been urged. The former ones were conclusive, or they were not conclusive; if they were conclusive, we did right in keeping in the words; if they were not conclusive, we ought to have given them up. They appeared then to be conclusive, and appear still to be so; therefore he would vote against the motion.

Mr. TUCKER.—I am embarrassed on this question, as the yeas and nays are called; because the vote is taken in such a manner as not to express the principles upon which I vote.

In the Committee of the Whole, I voted for striking out the words that are now proposed to be struck out; and my reason was, I was doubtful whether it was proper to vest on this occasion the power in the President alone. It appears to me, that the power is not necessarily vested in the President by the Constitution, neither in the President and Senate. I find no words that fix this power precisely in any branch of the Government. It must, however, by implication, be in the Legislature, or it is no where, until the Constitution is amended. I presume the implication is at least equally favorable to the Legislature as to any other branch, if it necessarily belongs to the Government. I apprehend a law is necessary in every instance to determine the exercise of the power. In some cases, it may be proper that the President alone should have it. I am not clear in my own mind, what general rule, if any, can be established on this subject. Perhaps in other cases it may be lodged with the President and Senate; or it may be given to the heads of departments. But whoever is invested with it, it must be in consequence of a law; and the Legislature have a right to vest it where they please. For my part, I am not under those serious apprehensions which gentlemen have expressed. I do not apprehend that vesting it in the President, or President and Senate, will effect a change of Government; but at the same time, I am anxious to preserve a consistency, and that the business should be settled upon proper ground.

I said I was against the words in the committee, because I doubted if the President was the proper person to exercise this authority. The amendment adopted this morning I likewise voted against, because I do not wish that the law should imply that the power of removing officers at pleasure is a Constitutional right vested in him. Now, I would rather a law should pass vesting the power in improper hands, than that the Constitution should be wrongly construed. If we say the President may remove from office, it is a grant of power; and we can repeal the law, and prevent the abuse of it. But if we, by law, imply that it is a Constitutional right vested in the President, there will be a privilege gained, which the Legislature cannot affect; at least, the reversion of such a solemn opinion will occasion much inconvenience, not to say confusion.

For these reasons, I shall now be against striking out the words, though I wish to have some modification of them; but the last question being carried, has left me in doubt what to propose, to be consistent with my opinions. I am precluded from adding, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and perhaps it would be out of order to change the word remove into suspend.

H. OF R.]

Duties on Imports.

Mr. HARTLEY was against striking out, and so would every gentleman be, he trusted, who was not fully convinced that the power of removal vested by the Constitution is in the President. He owned he had some doubts on that head himself; perhaps some others might be in the same predicament; but he had none with respect to the propriety of the President's exercising that prerogative, and therefore should readily consent to grant it. This might be done by retaining the words, and without going beyond the avowed limits of the legislative authority.

Mr. VINING acquiesced in striking out, because he was satisfied that the Constitution vested the power in the President; and he thought it more likely to obtain the acquiescence of the Senate on a point of legislative construction on the Constitution, than to a positive relinquishment of a power which they might otherwise think themselves in some degree entitled to.

A desultory conversation followed; and the question was put and decided by the yeas and nays, as follows:

YEA—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Benson, Brown, Burke, Clymer, Coles, Gerry, Goodhue, Griffin, Grob, Halborn, Huntington, Leonard, Livermore, Madison, Matthews, Moore, P. Muhlenberg, Page, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Scott, Sherman, Simmickson, Smith, (of South Carolina,) Sturgis, Sumner, Vining, and White—31.

NAY—Messrs. Bondinot, Cadwalader, Carroll, Contee, Fitzsimons, Gilman, Hartley, Heister, Lawrence, Lee, Schureman, Sedgwick, Seney, Smith, (of Maryland,) Sylvester, Thatcher, Trumbull, Tucker, and Wedgworth—19.

The words being struck out, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 23.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, which passed its first reading.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House took up for consideration the Senate's amendments to the impost bill which the House on the 16th instant had refused to concur in, and which a message from the Senate now informed them they would not recede from.

Mr. THATCHER moved to agree to the amendment of the Senate in the enacting style, with an amendment. The House originally sent the bill up in this form, "Be it enacted by the Congress of the United States," the Senate proposed as an amendment, "Be it enacted by the Senate and Representatives," and Mr. Thatcher wished to add the words "House of" before "Representatives"—observing that the word Senate spoke of the collective body of the Senators, and the word Representatives alluded to the individual members of this House only, and did not comprehend their Legislative function. There ought to be an equality in the enacting style; therefore the words "House of" were necessary. This motion was agreed to.

The clause discriminating between the distilled spirits of nations in treaty, or otherwise, was now taken into consideration.

Mr. LEE was disposed to agree with the Senate on this article, because it would have but little effect, and therefore was not worth the delay; but he should be immovable with respect to the discrimination in the article of tonnage. He was far from abandoning his principle by this concession; it was merely the effect of deference and respect for the Senate, and a desire to set the Government in motion.

Mr. PAGE.—Gentlemen on a former occasion called this discrimination an empty compliment to our allies; yet it is that very compliment for which nations have stickled. It is the practice of nations to reciprocate advantages to each other's commerce; and hereby we manifest that spirit of attention and generosity which will do honor to the councils of America.

Mr. GERRY said, there were various opinions respecting the treaties which the United States had entered into. But admitting them to be beneficial, what are the principles upon which they are formed? Upon principles of reciprocity. What obligation are we laid under by them? Merely to fulfil the part we have stipulated to perform. Are there other obligations? If there are obligations of honor and generosity, will a difference of two cents on a gallon of distilled spirits discharge them? Will this be considered by our allies as paying a debt of gratitude? I apprehend not. Will it draw on a war, as it has been called, of commercial regulations, with a kingdom which has much in her power? If it does, will the benefit equal this disadvantage? If it does not compensate it, we shall be bad politicians to adopt measures injurious to our common good. Coercive measures ought not to be pursued in preference to lenient ones, unless there is a moral certainty of success by the former, and but a doubtful chance by the latter. If we should fail in our object, our impotence will become the scoff of the world, and our commerce be destroyed. Gentlemen ought to be well assured that they will not be compelled to recede with disgrace from a system of this kind, before they venture to adopt it. I have no conviction of this nature; and therefore I am willing to strike out the clause.

Mr. PAGE declared treaties to be beneficial, and gratitude a principle by which nations ought to be actuated. He feared nothing from retaliation; he was too confident of success to dread a commercial war with the nation alluded to. It had been demonstrated by his worthy colleague, (Mr.

Duties on Imports.

Madison,) and by a respectable commercial character and worthy member of this House from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FITZSIMONS,) that Great Britain, consistently with her interest, could not be disposed to retaliate; and while her interest opposed retaliation, there was no apprehension of defeat. Is Virginia compelled to recede from her commercial warfare? She has discriminated in a superior manner to what is now proposed; but Britain, careful of her interest, does not choose to enter the lists against her; she is tenacious of the American trade, and will be cautious how she throws it from her. I need not go, said he, over the old arguments. I trust they are sufficiently impressed on the mind of every member, and will determine him to adhere to that vote which, I am bold to say, does honor to the Government, and will terminate in promoting the common interest and general welfare of our constituents. Either, Mr. Speaker, let us insist upon our disagreement, or appoint a committee of conference; but by no means relinquish our object without a single new reason being offered to induce us thereto.

Mr. BONDINOT was clearly for holding up the discrimination in this place as well as the other, though he admitted we were under no obligation by treaty to do either. And are nations deprived of discretion? Can we, ought we, to do nothing unless bound thereto by treaty? Certainly it may be demonstrated that the contested discrimination is salutary to the national interest; hence it is a proper measure for this House to pursue. It has been hinted, that treaties are not beneficial to the United States. Was this the language that venerable patriots of America held when they formed our treaty of alliance with the French nation, when they solicited the attention and friendship of the princes of Europe in the day of calamity and danger? Far other were our sentiments then. But now it is thought another opinion may be entertained—away with the idea.

Treaties, Mr. Speaker, no doubt are beneficial, when properly and reciprocally made. The United States, desirous of settling their intercourse with the European nations and their dependencies, wish to meet them on this ground. Hence it is we propose a discrimination as an inducement for them to treat. Without something of this kind, what temptation have they to listen to our desires? If we do not employ the means an efficient Government has put into our hands for bringing about this wished-for event, it is to be feared our supineness will never permit us to take that station among nations, for which God and nature have designed us. This moment is the happy one by which the world may be taught our character: much depends on first impressions. We have little to fear from a nation which knows the value of our friendship, but which our imbecility has encouraged to take an advantage of us. She can never be disgusted at our policy; she has shown us an example. But if she even were displeased, she is not in a situation to enter into a commercial warfare. Yet it by no means follows, because we take measures to regulate our commerce, that Britain must attempt to fetter our intercourse with her. She has it in her power to become a favored nation at the moment she designs to enter into treaty with us. What can she require more? What more can be granted to her? So far, Mr. Speaker, will this measure be from promoting a commercial war, that I apprehend it will be productive of happy commercial alliances; therefore I hope this House will have firmness enough to persist in their vote of discrimination.

Mr. BENSON.—The more he reflected, the more he was convinced that the former decision of the House was unwise. He had heard no advocate for this measure, except within these walls; from which he inferred that it was not a favorite measure with the people of America. He thought we were in possession of as many advantages in our intercourse with nations between which and the United States no commercial treaty subsisted, as we were with those nations with which Congress had formed treaties. From this consideration, and because he apprehended consequences inimical to the interests of the Union, he hoped the House would agree with the Senate in their amendment.

Mr. MANIXON had spoken so much on former occasions on this subject, that he had little more to say. He presumed that it had been fully proved that the voice of America was in favor of the motion. He had been informed that the Senate did not differ with the House in the principle that discrimination was proper, but they contemplated a detached and pointed law on this subject. Perhaps their method might be eligible, but he was not inclined to risk a certainty for an uncertainty. Their measures might not be proposed this session, or, if proposed, might not be acted upon; but, if they could, then this part of the impost law might be repealed. He was clearly for adhering to the disagreement.

Mr. BENSON thought the voice of the Union was against the measure; he formed this opinion from such materials as came to his hands. But waiving that point, he conceived the measure impolitic, and that was sufficient to induce him to vote against it; and since he found the Senate of the same opinion with himself, he had no hesitation to declare against it.

Mr. SANDWICK said the public opinion was too uncertain a ground to decide the present question upon; it might be one thing in Massachusetts, another in New York, and a different one in Virginia. The principle of gratitude might also be left out of the question. It then would stand upon its true bottom—is the measure just in itself, and conducive to the interest of this country? Is it justice to give up part of our revenue, when we have unceasing demands upon it? Certainly not. Is it our interest to lessen the duty on distilled spirits? Certainly we lose revenue by it, which we are not in a capacity to do. From these two considerations he would vote in favor of the Senate's amendment.

Mr. AMES called upon gentlemen to recollect the situation of the United States, and the urgent necessity there was for passing the revenue law.

He submitted to the House how much better it would be to let this subject be taken up distinctly, than make it a reason for delaying the great business they were sent here to complete. He was, however, strongly opposed to being led by the principle of gratitude in matters relative to the public weal. The obligation of a treaty never required more than what its terms stipulated for; therefore, in matters of commerce and matters of revenue, interest ought to be the predominating principle.

Mr. MANSON thought this bill would gain nothing by an immediate passage, because it could not operate until the collection bill was passed, and that would certainly, by the specimen the House had had of it, take some time. He would not agree to relinquish the present discrimination in hopes of obtaining a future one; and he contended that a discrimination was warranted upon the predominating principle alluded to by the gentleman last up; but he would agree to appoint a Committee of Conference on this clause, in hopes a compromise might take place.

Mr. WADSWORTH opposed the discrimination as ineffectual, and not because it was on unjust principles. He knew one or two things in the power of Congress, which would compel Great Britain to treat with us on terms of reciprocity. If gentlemen were disposed to pursue these, he would join them with all his heart; but any thing short of it will only irritate, and not produce any real national advantage whatever. His first object would be to interdict the trade which supplied the British dependencies with the necessities of life. He was bold to say that Nova Scotia, the settlement founded by Britain to rival the United States, could not exist without such aid; her West India settlements would also feel the want of our commerce; the whole body of her colonies would be clamorous to regain the advantages thus suspended, and compel the mother country to adopt measures for their and our mutual convenience and interest; this he apprehended would be good policy, and perfectly warrantable. But a trifling discrimination may lose us the advantages we now have in British ports, without obtaining a compensation in exchange; for of whom are we to expect a compensation? Not of Britain, unless she is compelled; not of France, for the inducement is too trifling. I am sorry, said he, that I am drawn to make some observations on national generosity, because they may not tend to show that our allies display that virtue towards us in a very conspicuous manner. When this and the tonnage bill were first before the House, the commercial advantages granted the United States by Great Britain were pointed out; they appeared to exceed the privileges of our commerce with France in substance, though perhaps the latter were, in some instances, more showy. With respect to the British West Indies, we are on a footing with other nations, so that gentlemen ought not to complain, as they have done, of our suffering an indignity by submitting to such restrictions. But what shall I say with respect to our intercourse with the French islands?

Our trade there is exposed to the most exorbitant charges; our vessels and seamen to indignities which I wish not to mention. But gentlemen need not be surprised at this view, when they look around and behold the custom-houses we have suffered them to erect in America. We cannot visit an island without a passport from them. I will not dwell upon what they exact for this necessary paper; but we admit, by paying it, their authority in this country over our commerce. If this picture of our situation be not sufficiently humiliating, I could color it with an enumeration of the contumelies and insults which our people have actually received. I could inform this honorable body, that our captains, with their officers and seamen, have been dragged from on board their ships at midnight, for the breach of laws never promulgated, by the caprice or wanton cruelty of a petty officer. Our venerable heads of families, our most virtuous citizens, have been thus, and more, ignominiously treated by the subjects of our great ally. Perhaps we have obtained a promise of better treatment in future, by making our well-grounded complaint; but let me pause a moment, and ask gentlemen whether they know a nation on earth whose friendship is worth purchasing at such a price? For my part, I know of none. Is the advantage of exporting to the place of consumption as many hogsheds of tobacco as the Government will admit, a compensation? In my mind it is a question whether this article does not yield a better return from Great Britain than elsewhere; therefore the trade in it to other countries is not valuable enough to induce the freemen of America tamely to submit to impositions and indignities which debase the rank of an independent nation. Gentlemen may have formed high notions of our commerce with France; but I submit it to the enterprising and most assiduous of our merchants, to those who have had long connexions with that country, and who have formed their judgments upon the sure ground of experience, to say if the French trade is profitable to America; if this were the fact, many more of our traders would have found it out; for I believe the citizens of the Union are as sagacious in making such discoveries as any people whomsoever.

With these impressions on my mind, I cannot but join with the Senate in their amendment, which I hope may be carried; but I shall never oppose; on the contrary, I will support every effectual measure for compelling the nations of the world to treat with us on the principles of reciprocity.

The question for concurring with the Senate in striking out the discrimination on distilled spirits was put; upon which the House divided, and there appeared twenty-five in the affirmative, and twenty-seven in the negative; so the question of concurrence was lost. Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 24.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The engrossed bill "for establishing an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs," was read the third time.

Mr. SUMNER.—This bill appears to my mind so subversive of the Constitution, and in its consequences so destructive to the liberties of the people, that I cannot consent to let it pass, without expressing my detestation of the principle it contains, I do it in this public manner, in order to fulfil what I think to be by duty to my country, and to discharge myself of any concern in a matter that I do not approve.

Mr. PAGE discovered the fate of the bill; he knew it must pass; but, nevertheless, he would decidedly give it his negative, and he hoped the respectable minority which he had the honor of voting with hitherto on the question of removability, would unite with him firmly in their opposition; and in order to record to their constituents the sentiments they maintained, he moved to take the question by the yeas and nays.

One-fifth of the members present joined in requiring the yeas and nays; whereupon they were taken, and are,

YEAS.—Messrs. Ames, Benson, Boudinot, Brown, Burke, Cadwalader, Carroll, Clymer, Contee, Fitzsimon, Gilman, Goodhue, Griffin, Hartley, Heister, Hugor, Lawrence, Lee, Madison, Moore, Muhlenburg, Schureman, Scott, Sedgwick, Seney, Simmickson, Sylvester, Trumbull, and Vining—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Coles, Gerry, Grout, Hathorn, Huntington, Jackson, Leonard, Livermore, Matthews, Page, Parker, Partridge, Van Rensselaer, Sherman, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Stone, Sturges, Sumter, Thatcher, Tucker, and White—22.

So the question was determined in the affirmative, and the Clerk directed to carry the bill to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House now resumed the consideration of the message from the Senate, touching their amendments to the Import bill.

After going through the same, and agreeing to three amendments, and rejecting six, it was Ordered, That a committee of conference be desired with the Senate upon the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to; and Messrs.

Boudinot, Fitzsimons, and MADISON, were appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of the House.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR.

The House then went into a committee on the bill for establishing the Department of War, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair.

Mr. BENSON proposed, with respect to the Secretary's being removable by the President, a similar amendment to that which had been obtained in the bill establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN thought it unnecessary to load this bill with any words on that subject; he conceived the gentleman ought to be satisfied with having had the principle established in the other bill.

Mr. PAGE was of the same opinion, but further thought it argued a doubt, even in the mind of the majority, of the truth of their principles, and they wanted, by repetition, to force that upon the mind which was not impressed by right reason. The question on the amendment was taken without further debate, and carried in the affirmative, twenty-four to twenty-two.

Some other small alterations being made, the committee rose, and reported the bill as amended; which being partly considered, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 25.

Mr. WYCKOFF presented the petition of Samuel Briggs, of Philadelphia, praying for the exclusive privilege of constructing and vending a machine for making nails by mill-work. Ordered to lie on the table.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill for establishing the War Department; which being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they agree to the amendment proposed by this House to their amendment to the bill for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; insist on their fourth and fifth amendments to the said bill; agree to the proposed conference on the subject-matter of the other amendments thereto, and have charged their managers to confer also on the said fourth and fifth amendments. The Senate likewise agree to the amendments proposed by this House to their first and ninth amendments to the bill imposing duties on tonnage; and also to the proposed conference on the subject-matter of the other amendments to the said bill.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing the Treasury Department, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair. The second clause being under consideration—

Mr. PAGE objected to the words making it the duty of the Secretary to "digest and report plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and the support of the public credit," observing that it might be well enough to enjoin upon him the duty of making out and preparing estimates; but to go any further would be a dangerous innovation upon the Constitutional privilege of this House; it would create an undue influence within these walls, because members might be led, by the deference commonly paid to men of abilities, who give an opinion in a case they have thoroughly studied, to support the minister's plan, even against their own judgment. Nor would the mischief stop here; it would establish a precedent which might be extended, until we admitted all the ministers of the Government on the floor, to explain and support the plans they have digested and reported; thus laying a foundation for an aristocracy or a detestable monarchy.

Mr. TUCKER.—The objection made by the gentleman near me is, undoubtedly, well founded. I think it proper to strike out all the words alluded to, because the following are sufficient to answer every valuable purpose, namely, "to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures." If we authorize him to prepare and report plans, it will create an interference of the Executive with the Legislative powers; it will abridge the particular privilege of this House; for the Constitution expressly declares, that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. How can the business originate in this House, if we have it reported to us by the Minister of Finance? All the information that can be acquired, may be called for, without adopting a clause that may undermine the authority of this House, and the security of the people. The Constitution has pointed out the proper method of communication between the Executive and Legislative departments; it is made the duty of the President to give, from time to time, information to Congress of the state of the Union; and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. If revenue plans are to be prepared and reported to Congress, here is the proper person to do it; he is responsible to the people for what he recommends, and will be more cautious than any other person to whom a less degree of responsibility is attached. Under this clause, you give the Secretary of the Treasury a right to obtrude upon you plans, not only undigested, but even improper to be taken up.

I hope the House is not already weary of executing and sustaining the powers vested in them by the Constitution; and yet it would argue that we thought ourselves less adequate to determine than any individual what burdens our constituents are equal to bear. This is not answering the high expectations that were formed of our exertions for the general good, or of our vigilance in guarding our own and the people's rights. In short, Mr. Chairman, I can never agree to have money bills originated and forced upon this House by a man destitute of Legislative authority, while the Constitution gives such power solely to the House of Representatives; for this reason, I cheerfully second the motion for striking out the words.

Mr. BRANSON.—If the proposed amendment prevail, the bill will be nearly nugatory. The most important service that can be rendered by a gentleman who is at the head of the Department of Finance, is that of digesting and reporting plans for the improvement of the revenue, and supporting public credit; and, for my part, I shall despair of ever seeing your revenue improved, or the national credit supported, unless the business is submitted into the hands of an able individual. I thought this subject was well understood, from the debate on the original motion. It was then insisted upon by an honorable gentleman, Mr. GRANT, who opposed the appointment of a Secretary of the Treasury, that his important duties ought to be "to consider of the means of improving the revenue and introducing economy into the expenditures, and to recommend general systems of revenue." Now, what more than this is required by the clause?

For my part, I am at a loss to see how the privilege of the House is infringed. Can any of the Secretary's plans be called bills? Will they be reported in such a form even? But admitting they were, they do not become bills, unless they are sanctioned by the House; much less is the danger that they will pass into laws without full examination by both Houses and the President. From this view of the subject, so far is the clause from appearing dangerous, that I believe it discovers itself to be not only perfectly safe, but essentially necessary; and without it is retained, the great object of the bill will be defeated.

Mr. GOODHUE.—We certainly carry our dignity to the extreme, when we refuse to receive information from any but ourselves. It must be admitted, that the Secretary of the Treasury will from the nature of his office, be better acquainted with the subject of improving the revenue or curtailing expense, than any other person; if he is thus capable of affording useful information, shall we reckon it hazardous to receive it? For my part, when I want to attain a particular object, I never shut my ears against information likely to enable me to secure it.

Mr. PAGE.—I can never consent to establish, by law, this interference of an Executive officer in business of legislation; it may be well enough in an absolute monarchy, for a Minister to come to a Parliament with his plans in his hands, and order them to be enrolled or enacted; but this practice does not obtain even in a limited monarchy like Britain. The Minister there, who introduces his plans, must be a member of the House of Commons. The man would be treated with indignation who should attempt in that country to bring his schemes before Parliament in any other way. Now, why we, in the free Republic of the United States, should introduce such a novelty in legislation, I am at a loss to conceive. The Constitution expressly delegates to us the business of the revenue; our constituents have confidence in us, because they suppose us acquainted with their circumstances; they expect, in consequence of this knowledge, we will not attempt to load them with injudicious or oppressive taxes; but they have no such security, if we are blindly to follow perhaps an unskilful minister. It does not answer me, Mr. Chairman, to say the House has a right of deliberating and deciding upon these plans, because we may be told, if you prune away this part or that part of the system, you destroy its efficiency. Therefore we must act with caution; we must either take or reject the whole; but if we reject the whole, sir, we are to depend upon ourselves for a substitute. How are we to form one? For my part, I should not despair, that the united wisdom of this House could procure one; but if we are to do this, in the second instance, why cannot we attempt it in the first? I have no objection to our calling upon this or any other officer for information; but it is certainly improper to have him authorized by law to intrude upon us whatever he may think proper. I presume, sir, it is not supposed by the worthy gentleman from New York (Mr. BRANSON) that we shall be at a loss to conceive what information would be useful or proper for us to require, that we must have this officer to present us with what he chooses. When the President requires an opinion of him, the Constitution demands him to give it; so, under the law, let him send his opinion in here, when it is asked for. If any further power is given him, it will come to this at last: we, like the Parliament of Paris, shall meet to register what he dictates. Either these reports of the Secretary are to have weight, or they are not; if they are to have weight, the House acts under a foreign influence, which is altogether improper and impolitic; if they are to have no weight, we impose a useless duty upon the officer, and such as is no mark of our wisdom.

Mr. AMES hoped the subject might be treated with candor and liberality; he supposed the objections were made on those principles, and therefore required a serious answer. The worthy gentleman who first expressed his aversion to the clause seemed to be apprehensive that the power of reporting plans by the Secretary would be improper, because it appeared to him to interfere with the legislative duty of the House, which the House ought not to relinquish.

Whenever it is a question, Mr. Speaker, said he, whether this House ought, or ought not, to establish offices to exercise a part of the power of either branch of the Government, there are two points which I take into consideration, in order to lead my mind to a just decision; first, whether the proposed disposition is useful; and, second, whether it can be safely guarded from abuse. Now I take it, sir, that the House, by their order for bringing in a bill to establish the Treasury Department in this way, have determined the point of utility; and, if they have erred in adopting that opinion, I will slightly make an inquiry. How does it tend to general utility? The Secretary is presumed to have the best knowledge of the subject of finance of any member of the community. Now, if this House is to act on the best knowledge of circumstances, it seems to follow logically, that the House must obtain evidence from that officer; the best way of doing this will be publicly from the officer himself, by making it his duty to furnish us with it. It will not be denied, sir, that this officer will be better acquainted with his business than other people can be. It lies within his department to have a comprehensive view of the state of the public revenues and expenditures. He will, by his superintending power over the collection, be able to discover abuses, if any, in that department, and to form the most eligible plan to remedy or prevent the evil. From his information respecting money transactions, he may be able to point out the best mode for supporting the public credit; indeed, these seem to me to be the great objects of his appointment.

It is, perhaps, a misfortune incident to public assemblies, that from their nature they are more incompetent to a complete investigation of accounts than a few individuals; perhaps in a Government so extended, and replete with variety in its mode of expenditure as this, the subject may be more perplexing than in countries of smaller extent and less variety of objects to guard. The science of accounts is at best but an abstruse and dry study; it is scarcely to be understood but by an unwearied assiduity for a long time; how then can a public body, elected annually, and in session for a few months, undertake the arduous task with a full prospect of success? If our plans are formed upon these incomplete investigations, we can expect little improvement; for I venture to say, that our knowledge will be far inferior to that of an individual, like the present officer. Hence I contend, sir, that the Secretary is a useful and invaluable part of the Government.

I would not have it understood that I am against an inquiry being made into this subject at every session of the Legislature. I think such a practice highly salutary, but I would not trust to a hasty, or perhaps injudicious examination of a business of this magnitude; on the contrary, I would take every precaution in ascertaining the foundation upon which our revenues are to stand. If we consider the present situation of our finances, owing to a variety of causes, we shall not doubt perceive a great, although unavoidable confusion throughout the whole scene; it precepts to the imagination a deep, dark, and dreary chaos; impossible to be reduced to order without the mind of the architect is clear and capacious, and his power commensurate to the occasion; he must not be the flitting creature of a day; he must have time given him competent for the successful exercise of his authority. It is with an intention to let a little sunshine into the business that the present arrangement is proposed; I hope it may be successful, nor do I doubt the event. I am confident our funds are equal to the demand, if they are properly brought into operation; but a bad administration of the finances will prove our greatest evil.

But, is our proposed arrangement safe? Are the guards sufficient to prevent abuse? I am perfectly satisfied it can be made so, and hope the united exertions of both Houses will effect it. How is the power complained of by the honorable gentlemen over the way (Mr. PAGE and Mr. TUCKER) unsafe? We are told, the plans reported may have an undue influence. Upon what ground is this opinion rested? Do the gentlemen apprehend the facts will be fallaciously stated? If so, I would ask, cannot they be detected? If facts are faithfully stated, and the deductions are fair, no doubt the plan will be patronized; and will gentlemen say that it ought not? I believe there is little danger of imposition, for a person in this situation would hardly run the risk of detection, in a case where detection might be easy by an examination of the books and vouchers, and his reputation be destroyed.

What improper influence could a plan reported openly and officially have on the mind of any member, more than if the scheme and information were given privately at the Secretary's office? Nor, Mr. Chairman, do I approve what the gentlemen say with respect to calling on the Secretary for information; it will be no mark of inattention or neglect; it will be time to consider the questions you propound; but if you make it his duty to furnish you with plans of information on the improvement of the revenue and support of public credit, and he neglect to perform it, his conduct or capacity is virtually impeached. This will be furnishing an additional check.

It has been complained of as a novelty; but, let me ask, gentlemen, if it is not to an institution of a similar kind that the management of the finances of Britain is the envy of the world? It is true, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a member of the House that has the sole right of originating money bills; but is that a reason why we should not have the information which can be obtained from our officer, who possesses the means of acquiring equally important and useful knowledge? The nation, as well as the Parliament of Britain, holds a check over the Chancellor: if his budget contains false calculations, they are corrected; if he attempts impositions, or even unpopular measures, his administration becomes odious, and he is removed. Have we more reason to fear than they? Have we less responsibility or security in our arrangement of the Treasury department? If we have, let us improve it, but not abridge it of its safest and most useful power. I hope the committee will refuse their approbation of the present motion.

Mr. LIVERMORE.—I shall vote for striking out the clause, because I conceive it essentially necessary so to do. The power of originating money bills within these walls, I look upon as a sacred deposit, which we may neither violate nor divest ourselves of, although at first view it may appear of little importance who shall form a plan for the improvement of the revenue. Although every information tending to effect this great object may be gratefully received by this House, yet it behooves us to consider to what this clause may lead, and where it may terminate. Might it not, by construction, be said, that the Secretary of the Treasury has the sole right of digesting and reporting plans for the improvement of the revenue? This construction may appear a little extraordinary, but it is not more so than some constructions heretofore put upon other words; but however extraordinary it may be, it may take place, and I think the best way to avoid it, will be to leave out the words altogether. It is certainly improper that any person, not expressly entrusted by our constituents with the privilege of taking their money, should direct the quantum and the manner in which to take it.

But if there is not the danger I have mentioned, of giving power exclusively to this officer, I would ask gentlemen, and I submit it to their candor to say, whether it must not have a tendency to render the minds of the members indifferent on the subject, if the business is to be arranged and conducted by another, who, we are told, is better capable of understanding it than ourselves? Certainly, we shall hardly think it worth while to trouble our heads about the business. How far this will disappoint the object of our election, may be plainly seen. For my part, I think the power too great to be entrusted in any hands but those of the Representatives of the people, where the Constitution has deposited it, unless it be to a committee especially appointed by the House for that purpose.

Some allusions, Mr. Chairman, have been made with respect to the origin of this power. Gentlemen have intimated that it was copied from the powers vested in the First Lord of the Treasury. I am not of this opinion. I rather believe the committee, in searching for precedents, have turned to the former appointment of a Superintendent of Finance under the late Confederation, and, having discovered this enumerated among his powers, have copied it into the bill, not advertent to the different circumstances of the present and former Congress; for to them alone was not confined the power of originating revenue plans. Besides, it might be safe in them, because they possessed the Legislative and Executive power; they could abolish his plans and his office together, if they thought proper; but we are restrained by a Senate, and the negative of the President. We have no power over him, therefore, we ought to be cautious of putting dangerous powers into his hands.

Mr. SPOWICK.—If the principle prevails for curtailing this part of the Secretary's duty, we shall lose the advantages which the proposed system was intended to acquire. The improvement and management of the revenue is a subject that must be investigated by a man of abilities and indefatigable industry; if we mean to have our business advantageously done. If honorable gentlemen will for a moment consider the peculiar circumstances of this country, the means of information attainable by the individual members of this House, and compare them with the object they have to pursue, they will plainly perceive the necessity of calling to their aid the advantages resulting from an establishment like the one contemplated in the bill; if they weigh these circumstances carefully, their objections, I trust, will vanish. Coming, Mr. Chairman, as we do, from different parts of the Union, from States where the objects of revenue are different, where the circumstances and views of the people are different, and in a great degree local, it appears to me that no one member can be so fortunate as to possess the extensive knowledge attainable by this officer. Another circumstance induces me to draw the same conclusion. We shall find systems adopted to defeat the collection of the revenue, but it will be impossible for any of us to become so well acquainted with these machinations as to defeat their object; but from the advantageous position we give the Secretary of the Treasury, and the multifarious objects of his attention, he may watch over and detect their plans; he will have a better capacity to propose a remedy than any member of the Legislature.

Treasury Department.

[H. or R.]

I do not apprehend any undue influence operating on the members of this House, because I am persuaded there will ever prevail an independent and indignant spirit within the walls of Congress, hostile to every venal attempt. Nor do I believe it possible to color, with a semblance of justice, either false or base measures against the public welfare; the wisdom of this House can never be thought so meanly of. I trust a majority will always be found wise and virtuous enough to resist being made the tools of a corrupt administration. I, therefore, with confidence, approve the object of the clause.

I will mention one other circumstance, of no inconsiderable force, in favor of the bill. Coming, as I said we do, from districts with different ideas, perhaps different objects to pursue, much time will necessarily be consumed before a current is found in which the mind of the majority will run; and even then, gentlemen will not be certain they have procured all the information that could be obtained. It appears, therefore, to me, from the reason and nature of things, to be our duty, as wise legislators, to form such a reservoir for information as will supply us with what is necessary and useful at all times.

Mr. BOUNDWATER.—A proper jealousy for the liberty of the people is commendable in those who are appointed and sworn to be its faithful guardians; but when this spirit is carried so far as to lose sight of its object, and instead of leading to avoid, urges on to the precipice of ruin, we ought to be careful how we receive its impressions. So far is the present measure from being injurious to liberty, that it is consistent with the true interest and prosperity of the community. Are gentlemen apprehensive we shall be led by this officer to adopt plans we should otherwise reject? For my part, I have a better opinion of the penetration of the representation of the people than to dread any such visionary phantoms.

Let us consider whether this power is essentially necessary to the Government. I take it to be conceded by the gentlemen, that it is absolutely necessary because it may be serviceable, but do not choose to have it communicated in this way. If the Secretary of the Treasury is the proper person to give the information, I can see no other mode of obtaining it that would be so useful. Do gentlemen mean that he shall give it piecemeal, by way of question and answer? This will tend more to mislead than to inform us. If we would judge upon any subject, it would be better to have it in one clear and complete view, than to inspect it by detachments; we should lose the great whole in the minutiae, and, instead of a system, should present our constituents with a structure composed of discordant parts, counteracting and defeating the operation of each other's properties.

Make your officer responsible, and the presumption is, that plans and information are properly digested; but if he can secrete himself behind the curtain, he might create a noxious influence, and not be answerable for the information he gives. I conceive this great principle of responsibility to be essentially necessary to secure the public welfare; make it his duty to study the subject well, and put the means in his power; we can then draw from him all the information he has acquired, and apply it to its proper use. Without such an officer, our plans will be ineffectual and inconsistent. I have seen too much the want of a like officer in the State Legislatures, not to make me very desirous of adopting the present plan. It has been said, that the members coming from the different parts of the Union are the most proper persons to give information. I deny the principle. There are no persons in the Government to whom we could look with less propriety for information on this subject than to the members of this House. We are called from the pursuit of our different occupations, and come without the least preparation to bring forward a subject that requires a great degree of assiduous application to understand; add to this the locality of our ideas, which is too commonly the case, and we shall appear not very fit to answer the end of our appointment. Witness the difficulty and embarrassments with which we have hitherto been surrounded. If we had the subject digested and prepared, we should determine with ease on its fitness, its combination, and its principles, and might supply omissions or defects without hazard; and this in half the time we could frame a system, if left to reduce the chaos into order.

Mr. HARTLEY rose to express his sentiments, as he did on every occasion, with diffidence in his own abilities; but he looked upon the clause as both unsafe and inconsistent with the Constitution. He thought the gentleman last up proved too much by his arguments; he proved that the House of Representatives was, in fact, unnecessary and useless; that one person could be a better judge of the means to improve and manage the revenue, and support the national credit, than the whole body of Congress. This kind of doctrine, Mr. Chairman, is indelicate in a republic, and strikes at the root of all legislation founded upon the great Democratic principle of representation. It is true mistakes, and very injurious ones, have been made on the subject of finance by some State Legislatures; but I would rather submit to this evil, than, by my voice, establish tenets subversive of the liberties of my country.

Notwithstanding what I have said, I am clearly of opinion it is necessary and useful to take measures for obtaining other information than what members can acquire in their characters as citizens; therefore, I am in favor of the present bill; but I think these words too strong. If it was modified so as to oblige him to have his plans ready for this House when they are asked for, I should be satisfied; but to establish a legal right in an officer to obtrude his sentiments perpetually on this body, is disagreeable, and it is dangerous, inasmuch as the right is conveyed in words of doubtful import, and conveying powers exclusively vested by the Constitution in this House. One gentleman (Mr. Ames) has said, that the Secretary would be responsible for the plans he introduces. Very true; but how are we to detect the impositions they contain; for he says, we require more time and leisure to make the scrutiny than falls to our lot, so that it does not afford the degree of responsibility which his observations supposed.

Mr. GERRY expressed himself in favor of the object of the clause; that was, to get all the information possible for the purpose of improving the revenue, because he thought this information would be much required, if he judged from the load of public debt, and the present inability of the people to contribute largely towards its reduction.

He could not help observing, however, the great degree of importance they were giving this, and the other Executive officers. If the doctrine of having prime and great ministers of State was once well established, he did not doubt but we should soon see them distinguished by a green or red ribbon, or other insignia of Court favor and patronage. He wished gentlemen were aware of what consequences these things lead to; that they might exert a greater degree of caution.

The practice of Parliament in Britain is first to determine the sum they will grant, and then refer the subject to a Committee of Ways and Means: this might be a proper mode to be pursued in this House.

Do gentlemen, said he, consider the importance of the power they give the officer by the clause? Is it not part of our Legislative authority? And does not the Constitution expressly declare that the House solely shall exercise the power of originating revenue bills? Now, what is meant by reporting plans? It surely includes the idea of originating money bills, that is, a bill for improving the revenue, or, in other words, for bringing revenue into the treasury. For, if he is to report plans, they ought to be reported in a proper form, and complete. This is giving an indirect voice in Legislative business to an Executive officer.

If this be not the meaning of the clause, let gentlemen say what it is, and to what extent it shall go; but if my construction is true, we are giving up the most essential privilege vested in us by the Constitution. But what does this signify? The officer is responsible, and we are secure. This responsibility is made an argument in favor of every extension of power. I should be glad to understand the term. Gentlemen say the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible for the information he gives the House. In what manner does this responsibility act? Suppose he reports a plan for improving the revenue, by a tax which he thinks judicious, and one that will be agreeable to the people of the United States; but he happens to be deceived in his opinion; that his tax is obnoxious, and excites a popular clamor against the minister—what is the advantage of his responsibility? Nothing. Few men deserve punishment for the error of opinion; all that could be done would be to repeal the law, and be more cautious in future in depending implicitly on the judgment of a man who had led us into an impolitic measure. Suppose the revenue should fall short of his estimate, is he responsible for the balance? This will be carrying the idea further than any Government hitherto has done. What then is the officer, to be responsible for, which should induce the House to vest in him such extraordinary powers?

It was well observed by the honorable gentleman over the way, (Mr. PALMER,) that when his bill or plan is before the House, we must take or reject the whole; for if the individual members are so uninformed on the subject as they have been represented, it will be next to presumption to prepare an alteration; we should be told it was his duty officially to present plans, and our duty officially to pass them; that he is better informed than any other man, nay, better than the collective wisdom of the country. But this argument goes further still, and it may be justly asked, what occasion is there for a session of Congress? It incumbers the nation with a heavy expense, without rendering it any service. For, if we can neither alter nor improve the Secretary's plans, we can only consume our time to no avail. Under these circumstances, it will be patriotic to lay down our authority, and vest it in the great minister we have established.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—I do not see consequences so dangerous as some gentlemen seem to apprehend; nor did they appear to them. I believe, when the subject was last under consideration. I recollect Mr. Chairman, that some difficulty was made about establishing this office, because it was feared we could not find men of sufficient abilities to fill it. The duties were then properly deemed of a high and important nature, and enumerated as those proposed in the bill. It was supposed by an honorable gentleman, that the powers here expressed might be lodged in a board, because an individual was incompetent to undertake the whole. But now we have the wonderful sagacity of discovering, that if an individual is appointed, he will have capacity to form plans for improving the revenue in such an advantageous manner, as to supersede the necessity of having the representatives of the people consulted on the business; he will not only perform the usual duties of a Treasury Board, but be adequate to all purposes of legislation. I appeal to the gentleman for his usual candor on this occasion, which will assure us that he has wire-drawn his arguments.

I hope, sir, if we give this power to an individual, we shall have judgment enough to discover whether his plans are consistent with the public happiness and prosperity; and while we exercise this judgment, there can be no cause to apprehend the chimerical effects portrayed by the gentleman last up.

It is said to be giving him the power of legislation. Do we give him power of deciding what shall be the law? While we retain this power, he may give us all the information possible, but can never be said to participate in legislative business; he has no control whatever over this House. I see no danger, but a great deal of benefit, arising from the clause; by making it his duty to study the subject, we may reasonably expect information.

How is it said, that the power of reporting plans for the improvement of the revenue, is the power of originating money bills? The Constitution declares that power to be vested solely in this House. Now, will gentlemen say a money bill is originated by an individual member if he brings it forward? It cannot be originated, in my opinion, until the sense of the House is declared; much less can a plan for the improvement of the revenue be said to be a money bill.

Mr. GERRY admitted that he gave it as his opinion, that it was not an easy thing to find a proper person for conducting the finances in this country; there were but few in Europe who possessed abilities equal to the undertaking. He said before, that he knew but one in America, and believed there were not many to be found. These were his sentiments then, and he had made no discoveries since that warranted a change of opinion. But perhaps the advocates of the bill are acquainted with a gentleman fit for the business; if they are, it is more than he pretended to be, unless, as he said before, it was an honorable member of the Senate, who had made more progress in acquiring a knowledge of this difficult science, than any other person he had heard of.

He would not proceed on this subject, because the House had determined to appoint such an officer, and thereby put an end to the debate. By that vote, they supposed they could find a man equal to the task; he hoped they might, but he was really apprehensive of a disappointment, when he considered the confused and embarrassed state of our public debts and accounts; however, he submitted to the voice of his country.

The gentleman last up, said he, did me the honor of noticing what I said on a former occasion; but I appeal to himself whether my words were conveyed in the language of the bill. Did I advise any thing like this? Has not the gentleman sagacity enough to discover that my arguments went no further than this, that he was the proper person to give information respecting the public revenues and expenses, the mode of collecting, and the probable remedy for abuses?

But certainly this House contains more information relative to the proper means of supporting the national credit, and how far our constituents are capable of sustaining an increase of taxes, or which mode of assessment would yield more satisfaction. Yet gentlemen propose to give the power of advising the House, in all these cases, to the Secretary of the Treasury. It was always my opinion, that the representative body, from their sense of feeling, was a better judge of taxation than any individual, however great his sagacity, or extensive his means of information.

The gentleman says, we only give him power to give information; that is what I wish, but the clause goes further. Is digesting and reporting plans merely giving information? These plans will have to undergo the consideration of the House, I grant; but they must have some influence coming from such high authority, and if they have this in any degree whatever, it is subversive of the principles laid down in the Constitution.

The gentleman says, a bill is not originated until it has obtained the sense of the House; what is it then? The bill now under consideration has not obtained the sense of the House, yet I believe that gentleman himself conceives it to be a bill; he uses the term when he is speaking of it, and will hardly deny that it has originated. I think, sir, whenever the House order a committee to bring in a bill, or give leave to a member to read one in his place, that by that order they originate the bill; and here it is that I am apprehensive of a diminution of our privilege. By this law you give the Secretary the right of digesting and reporting all plans, which is but another word for bills, for the management and improvement of the revenue, and supporting public credit. To what an extent these last words may reach, I shall not pretend to say; but certainly they may include the operations of more departments than one. If the clause will bear the construction I have mentioned, it is altogether unwarrantable. I said, I differed from the gentleman with respect to the origin of bills, but perhaps this phrase may be applicable to a bill on its passage; all bills, from the time they are admitted before the House, may be said to be on their passage; but they are originated, as I take it, at their introduction.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was not certain that he understood the objections which were made against the clause; but if he did, it was a jealousy arising from the power given the Secretary to report plans of revenue to the House. No gentleman, he believed, had objected to his preparing a plan, and giving it in when it was called for. If this were the case, perhaps harmony might be restored to the committee by changing the word report into prepare; he would therefore move that amendment, in order to try the sense of the House.

Mr. MADISON.—After hearing and weighing the various observations of gentlemen, I am at a loss to see where the danger lies. These are precisely the words used by the former Congress, on two occasions, one in 1783, the other in a subsequent ordinance, which established the Revenue Board. The same power was also annexed to the office of Superintendent of Finance, but I never yet heard that any inconvenience or danger was experienced from the regulations; perhaps, if the power had been more fully and frequently exercised, it might have contributed more to the public good.

There is a small probability, though it is but small, that an officer may derive a weight from this circumstance, and have some degree of influence upon the deliberations of the Legislature; but compare the danger likely to result from this clause, with the danger and inconvenience of not having well-formed and digested plans, and we shall find infinitely more to apprehend. Inconsistent, unproductive, and expensive schemes, will be more injurious to our constituents than the undue influence which the well-digested plans of a well-informed officer can have. From a bad administration of the Government, more detriment will arise than from any other source. The want of information has occasioned much inconvenience and unnecessary burdens under some of the State Governments. Let it be our care to avoid those rocks and shoals in our political voyage, which have injured, and nearly proved fatal to, many of our cotemporary navigators.

A gentleman has asked, what is meant by responsibility? I will answer him. There will be responsibility in point of reputation, at least a responsibility; and supposing there is no personal responsibility, yet we know that men of talents and ability take as much care for the preservation of their reputation as any other species of property of which they are possessed. If a superior degree of wisdom is expected to be displayed by them, they take pains to give proofs that they possess it in the most unequivocal manner; this of itself will insure us no small degree of exertion.

With respect to originating money bills, the House has the sole right to do it; but if the power of reporting plans can be construed to imply the power of originating revenue bills, the Constitution is inconsistent with itself, in giving the President authority to recommend such measures as he may think expedient or necessary; but the construction is too unnatural to require further investigation.

I have admitted there is a small probability of a small inconvenience, but I do not think it any more an argument against the clause, than it would be an argument against having windows in a house, that it is possible the wind and the rain may get in through the crevices.

Mr. LIVERMORE expressed an apprehension that the clause originated from a clause in an ordinance of the former Congress; he found now he was not mistaken; but he wished gentlemen to distinguish, in the manner he had attempted to do, between the proprieties of this Congress and that, from which they might discover the impropriety of adopting it.

He thought gentlemen had sufficiently extolled the excellence of this office, and its advantages. He remembered that the grant of this power to the officer who formerly presided at the head of the finances, had produced some morsels of this kind; the five per cent. impost, a poll tax, and a land tax, if his memory served him right, were submitted; how far these were likely to meet the approbation of the Union, he did not say; but certainly one of them would meet few patrons. From this specimen, he did not form so favorable an opinion as some gentlemen expressed of the revenue plans, prepared, digested, and reported by a Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PAES added, that the late Congress were obliged to submit their plans to the State Legislatures; consequently, there was less danger of undue influence. As this was his principal fear, he would vote against every thing like giving him authority to bring his plans before the House.

Mr. LIVERMORE declared the amendment proposed by Mr. FRIZZIMON'S unsatisfactory, and by no means removing the ground of complaint.

Mr. TUCKER likewise objected to the amendment, because its effect would be precisely the same with the words standing in the bill. Why, said he, should the Secretary be directed to prepare plans, unless it is intended that the House should regularly call for them? The views of the gentleman are to have a uniformity in the system of finance; but how can this be effected, without the plans are always brought before us? Whatever the House shall presume to do on independent principles, may break in upon the Secretary's system, or make him vary his propositions, in order to accommodate them to what we have done. If we must adopt plans for the sake of uniformity, we must adopt them at all times, or lose our object.

However useful it may be to obtain information from this officer, I am by no means for making it a matter of right in him to intrude his advice. I admit, information may at all times be acceptable, but I think advice should never come but when required. Are we to be advised on all occasions, because we don't know when to require it? Are the members of this House incapable of asking for assistance when they want it? Why have we not affronted the other branches of the Government, as well as this House? Why have we not said that the Secretary of Foreign Affairs should prepare and digest plans for the formation of treaties, and report them to the President and Senate, who are exclusively to manage that concern? The cases are exactly similar; but we did not choose to offer them such an indignity. If it is right in one instance, it is equally so in every other. We ought to have given the Secretary at War an opportunity of exercising his ingenuity, in devising plans of fortifications to strengthen our shores and harbors; we ought, in every case, where we have to decide, appoint officers with the same view to aid our deliberations, and, in fine, to perform the whole duties for which we were elected.

Mr. HARTLEY expressed himself satisfied with the amendment proposed by Mr. FRIZZIMON'S.

Mr. STONE was not afraid of giving the officer the power of reporting plans, because he was sure Congress would, in every case, decide upon their own judgment. A future Congress would not pay such a deference, even to their predecessors, as to follow in their footsteps, unless they were convinced of the good policy of their measures. He thought, if the House wanted to make use of the information acquired by the Secretary, they ought to give him notice of their intention; consequently, something of this kind was proper in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the principle held up by the clause, was absolutely necessary to be received. It was of such a nature as to force itself upon them; therefore it was in vain to attempt to elude it by subterfuge. It was owing to the great abilities of a financier, that France had been able to make the exertions we were witnesses of a few years ago, without embarrassing the nation.

JUNE, 1789.]

Tonnage Bill.

[H. OF R.]

This able man, after considerably improving the national revenue, was displaced; but such was the importance of the officer, that he has been restored again.

The honorable gentleman, said he, from South Carolina, (Mr. TUCKER,) has asked why we did not make a similar provision in the case of the Departments of Foreign Affairs, and of War, to assist the President. If he had consulted the Constitution, he would have found it unnecessary, because it is there made the duty of the heads of department to answer the inquiries of the President in writing. It is the proper business of this House to originate revenue laws; but as we want information to act upon, we must procure it where it is to be had, consequently we must get it out of this officer, and the best way of doing so, must be by making it his duty to bring it forward.

I do not contend for a word; if the spirit of the clause is retained, I am satisfied.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I do not see what we are guarding against by striking out the words, unless gentlemen mean to go so far as to introduce a prohibitory clause, and declare that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be restrained from digesting or preparing plans for the improvement of the revenue. If there is any evil in having him attend to this branch of the business, I cannot see how to avoid it. Suppose the officer is a bad man, and there are others like him in this House, (for this must be what the gentlemen are afraid of;) and suppose he has prepared a scheme for speculation, which he hopes to get adopted by making dupes of the honest part; how are you to hinder it from being brought forward? Cannot his friends introduce it as their own, by making and seconding a motion for that purpose? Will you restrain him from having access to the members out of doors? And cannot he infuse his dangerous and specious arguments and information into them as well in the closet as by a public and official communication? But, Mr. Chairman, can this House, or if it can, will it, prevent any of their constituents from bringing before them plans for the relief of grievances or oppressions? Every individual of the community can bring business before us by petition, memorial, or remonstrance, provided it be done in a decent manner. How then do you propose to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury? I think the clause is very well as it stands, and shall therefore be against the amendment.

Mr. PAGE'S motion for striking out the clause being put and negatived.

The question on Mr. FRIZZIMON'S motion to amend the bill, by striking out the word "report," and inserting prepare, was taken and carried by a great majority.

After which the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, June 26.

A number of members attending the interesting conference which to-day took place with the Senate on the impost and tonnage bills, no business was done in this House.

SATURDAY, June 27.

The engrossed bill for establishing the Department of War was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for its concurrence.

REVENUE BILL.

Mr. BOUNDINOT, from the managers on the part of this House in the conference with the Senate, on the subject of the amendments to the Impost bill, reported that the conference had agreed to pass the bill as amended by the Senate, with some additional amendments, viz: the duty on distilled spirits of Jamaica proof, to be reduced from fifteen cents to ten cents per gallon. The duty on all other spirits to be reduced from twelve to eight cents per gallon. The duty on beer, ale, porter, or cider, imported in casks, from eight to five cents per gallon. The duty on beer imported in bottles, from twenty-five to twenty cents per gallon. The duty on coal from three to two cents per bushel.

TONNAGE BILL.

Mr. BOUNDINOT reported further with respect to the Tonnage bill, and the House agreed to the Senate's amendment in the third section, whereby foreign vessels are allowed to carry goods coastwise, upon paying fifty cents per ton at each entry.

And in the first section, whereby all ships built within the United States, and afterwards sold to foreigners, pay twenty cents per ton at each entry less than if such vessel had been built in a foreign country.

The House then took up the amendment proposing to strike out the clause discriminating between the tonnage of vessels belonging to nations in treaty, and those not in treaty.

On this clause it was observed by Mr. MADISON, that nothing had been urged at the conference, by the managers on the part of the Senate, in favor of this amendment, but what had been repeated over and over again, by the opponents to the clause in its original form, in this House. But it was not contended by the Senate, that the principle was improper; so far from it, they thought some measure of a similar tendency to be necessary, and were inclined to take the subject up, but on a different scale, and to extend it further than the House had hitherto contemplated. He had, however, some doubts whether it would not be more prudent to adopt the moderate style of the bill, than apply to rasher expedients; if the end could be attained, without departing from the principles of moderation, it would redound to the honor of the Government; but, at all events, it was prudent to begin with measures of this temper; if they were found ineffectual, it might then be time enough to attempt more coercive regulations. For these reasons he was in favor of the bill as it stood, without the Senate's amendment.

There was another circumstance that had considerable weight on his mind; it was universally admitted, that something ought to be done this session, both for the dignity of the United States, and to answer the high expectation of the people;

[H. or R.]

Tonnage Bill.

[JUNE, 1789.]

but if the proposed discrimination be relinquished, there is little probability of any other plan being adopted, inasmuch as the time of both Houses will be fully occupied in organizing the Government, and cannot, without some inconvenience, be diverted to any other object. Yet, if it should so happen, that the plan proposed, by the Senate can be gone through, the law may contain a clause for repealing this part of the Tonnage bill, and no inconvenience will arise.

Mr. LAWRENCE presumed, if the question was not carried for striking out the discriminating clause, the bill would be lost; and as it was a matter of great consequence in the scale of revenue, he wished to show the part he took, and would call for the yeas and nays, if he was supported.

Mr. VINING declared, with much decision, that he would rather the bill should be lost than passed without a discriminating clause. He had listened to the arguments used at the conference yesterday with the greatest attention, and a mind open to conviction, and had discovered that the good of the country required the absolute adoption of the principle. He was by no means actuated by resentment to Britain for her former usage; she had pursued what she took to be her interest; and we, as an independent nation, have a right to do the same. He hoped a majority of this House would join with the voice of their constituents, and contend for discrimination to the last.

Mr. JACKSON had also attended the conference, and with a disposition similar to that declared by the honorable gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. VINING,) but his convictions were directly the reverse. The proposed discrimination would irritate the nation against whom it is aimed, without being of any service to us. He thought the idea a mistaken one, though several States had adopted it. The State he represented, among the rest, pursued this plan of increasing the shipping; but he was bold to say that not a single French vessel had been induced to come to Georgia, in consequence of the favor shown them by the discrimination; but the planter had paid the additional impost on all the British shipping they employed. He apprehended the same consequences would result from this clause, and therefore joined with the Senate in striking it out.

Mr. FRIZZMONS did not mean to go into any argument on this subject, but he thought it necessary for the United States to meet the regulations of Britain with other regulations; for that reason he wished the bill to pass as it went from the House; but if the Senate, or any other member of this House, thought proper to come forward with a more effectual plan, he would give it his support, and then repeal this part of the present bill. Yet he should be extremely sorry to lose the bill, as it was essential to the mercantile interest in the United States; for without the bill English ships would pay no more duty than our own.

Mr. SHEERMAN was well convinced there was a large and decided majority in both Houses, and that it was the universal voice of the Union that America should meet commercial restrictions with commercial restrictions; but there might be some disagreement about the best way to effect this point. He did not think it the voice of the people that Congress should lay the commerce of a nation under disadvantages, merely because we had no treaty with them. It could not appear a solid reason in the minds of gentlemen, if they considered the subject carefully; therefore it was not the proper principle for the Government to act upon. He would mention one that appeared to him more equitable, namely, lay a heavy duty upon all goods coming from any port or territory to which the vessels of the United States are denied access; this would strike directly at objects which the honorable gentleman had in view, without glancing upon other ports to which we are allowed access.

Mr. LIVERMORE approved the bill as it went up originally; but since there was great danger of losing it by persisting in the discrimination, he would accede to the Senate's amendment, hoping that something more effectual might be fallen upon; in the mean time he consoled himself with the advantage the amendment procured to the revenue, for it was intended by the House to charge our allies but thirty cents per ton, whereas the Senate have set them all equal at fifty cents per ton.

Mr. MOORE favored the principle of discrimination, but feared if it were laid on tonnage it would operate unequally, those States paying most who employed the greatest quantity of foreign shipping.

Mr. GOODHUE proposed to let the tonnage bill lie on the table, in order to give the Senate an opportunity of originating a bill on the subject of discrimination, which the Committee of Conference had informed them was in contemplation. If the House consented to this, they might have their choice of the two schemes, and prefer the most eligible.

Mr. MADISON agreed to this expedient, though he doubted if any thing better could be procured. He should regret the loss of the bill, but he would be extremely sorry to give up the point. The House had shown a spirit of accommodation by giving up the discrimination in the impost bill on brandy and spirits; and he believed it was on the principle of adhering more firmly to it in the bill now before them; he hoped, therefore, if the question was taken, that they would decide the point as they had hitherto done.

The question was put, by consent, on Mr. GOODHUE's proposition for letting the bill lie on the table; which being rejected—

The motion for agreeing with the Senate being about to be taken, Mr. LAWRENCE withdrew his call for the yeas and nays; whereupon it was decided in the usual manner; and there were twenty-five in favor of the motion, and twenty-six against it. So the question was lost.

A petition from William Finnie, deputy quar-

Treasury Department.

[H. or R.]

termaster general in the Southern Department during the late war, was read, praying a reimbursement of moneys expended by him in the public service.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom the collection bill was committed, reported, that the committee had prepared an entire new bill as an amendment and substitute to the former one, which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they agree to the amendments proposed by the House to the Senate's amendments to the Impost bill.

Mr. SCOTT moved to take up the report of the committee appointed to consider and report the state of the unappropriated lands in the Western Territory, observing to the House that the Treasury bill embraced this matter, and he wished them to have the whole subject fairly before them, so as to connect it in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. BRADSON wished the business of the Western Territory to lie over till the Treasury bill was gone through.

Mr. SENEWICK reminded gentlemen, that their attention had been called to the Treasury business last, and it would be best to finish it before they went upon fresh matter.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCOTT's motion being negatived, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. TRAUBULL in the Chair, on the Treasury bill.

On motion of Mr. VINING, the following words were struck out, being part of the powers assigned to the Secretary of the Treasury, "to conduct the sale of the lands belonging to the United States, in such a manner as he shall be by law directed," and afterwards these were inserted, "to execute such services respecting the sale of the lands of the United States, as may by law be required of him."

Mr. BURKE gave notice that he meant to bring in a clause to be added to the bill to prevent any of the persons appointed to execute the offices created by this bill from being directly or indirectly concerned in commerce, or in speculating in the public funds, under a high penalty, and being deemed guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor.

Mr. MADISON observed, that the committee had gone through the bill without making any provision respecting the tenure by which the Comptroller is to hold his office. He thought it was a point worthy of consideration, and would, therefore, submit a few observations upon it.

It will be necessary, said he, to consider the nature of this office, to enable us to come to a right decision on the subject; in analyzing its properties, we shall easily discover they are not purely of an Executive nature. It seems to me that they partake of a Judiciary quality as well as Executive; perhaps the latter obtains in the greatest degree. The principal duty seems to be deciding upon the lawfulness and justice of the claims and accounts subsisting between the United States and particular citizens: this partakes strongly of the judicial character, and there may be strong reasons why an officer of this kind should not hold his office at the pleasure of the Executive branch of the Government. I am inclined to think that we ought to consider him something in the light of an arbitrator between the public and individuals, and that he ought to hold his office by such a tenure as will make him responsible to the public generally; then again it may be thought, on the other side, that some persons ought to be authorized on behalf of the individual, with the usual liberty of referring to a third person, in case of disagreement, which may throw some embarrassment in the way of the first idea.

Whatever, Mr. Chairman, may be my opinion with respect to the tenure by which an Executive officer may hold his office according to the meaning of the Constitution, I am very well satisfied, that a modification by the Legislature may take place in such a partake of the judicial qualities, and that the legislative power is sufficient to establish this office on such a footing as to answer the purposes for which it is prescribed.

With this view he would move a proposition, to be inserted in the bill; it was that the Comptroller should hold his office during years, unless sooner removed by the President: he will always be dependent upon the Legislature, by reason of the power of impeachment; but he might be made still more so, when the House took up the Salary bill. He would have the person re-appointable at the expiration of the term, unless he was disqualified by a conviction on an impeachment before the Senate; by this means the Comptroller would be dependent upon the President, because he can be removed by him; he will be dependent upon the Senate, because they must consent to his election for every term of years; and he will be dependent upon this House, through the means of impeachment, and the power we shall reserve over his salary; by which means we shall effectually secure the dependence of this officer upon the Government. But making him thus thoroughly dependent, would make it necessary to secure his impartiality, with respect to the individual. This might be effected by giving any person, who conceived himself aggrieved, a right to petition the Supreme Court for redress, and they should be empowered to do right therein; this will enable the individual to carry his claim before an independent tribunal.

A provision of this kind exists in two of the United States at this time, and is found to answer a very good purpose. He mentioned this, that gentlemen might not think it altogether novel. The committee, he hoped, would take a little time to examine the idea.

Mr. STONE thought it necessary to have time allowed the committee for considering the proposition; it was perfectly novel to him, and he dared to say the same of many other members; but, at the first view, he thought he saw several objections to it. As the Comptroller was an inferior officer, his appointment might be vested in the President by the Legislature; but, according to the determination which had already taken place, it did not necessarily follow that he should have the power of dismissal; and before it was given, its propriety ought to be apparent. He did not know whether the office should be held during good behaviour, as the gentleman proposed; for if it was intended to be held during a term of years, and then the officer to be reappointed, if he had not been convicted on impeachment, it would be tantamount to holding it during all the time he behaved well. But he thought all officers, except the judges, should hold their offices during pleasure. He also thought it unnecessary to consider the Comptroller as a judge, and give, by an express clause in the bill, a right to the complainant to appeal from his decision. He considered this as the right of every man, upon the principles of common law, therefore securing it by the statute would be a work of supererogation.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, approved the idea of having the Comptroller appointed for a limited time, but thought during that time he ought to be independent of the Executive, in order that he might not be influenced by that branch of the Government in his decisions.

Mr. SPOWICK did not rise to oppose the measure, but to suggest some doubts of its effects. The first was, as mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. STONE,) that the officer would hold his office by the firm tenure of good behaviour, inasmuch as he was to be reappointed at the expiration of the first term, and so on.

Mr. MADISON begged the gentlemen would excuse him for this interruption, but he suspected he was misapprehended; he said the officer should be reappointable at the expiration of the term—not reappointed.

Mr. SPOWICK acknowledged he had misunderstood the gentleman; but, as he had now explained himself, he did not see that the proposition came up to the intention he had expressed: so far from making him independent, as a judge ought to be, it subjected him to more subordination than any other officer.

He also conceived that a majority of the House had decided that all officers concerned in Executive business should depend upon the will of the President for their continuance in office; and with good reason, for they were the eyes and arms of the principal Magistrate, the instruments of execution. Now the office of Comptroller seemed to bear a strong affinity to this branch of the Government. He is to provide for the regular and punctual payment of all moneys which may be collected, and to direct prosecutions for delinquencies; he is to preserve the public accounts, to countersign warrants, and to report to the Secretary. These are important Executive duties, and the man who has to perform them ought, he thought, to be dependent upon the President.

He did not mean, by what he said, to give a decided opinion, but merely to suggest for consideration some doubts which had arisen in his mind since the subject was introduced.

Mr. BENSON did not like the object of the motion, because it was, in some measure, setting at naught the question which had already been carried.

He wished there might be some certainty in knowing what was the tenure of offices; he thought they were well fixed now, if nothing more was done with the question. The judges hold theirs during good behaviour, as established by the Constitution; all others, during pleasure. He was afraid that the present motion would lead to a different construction from the one lately adopted; by devices of this kind, he apprehended the Legislature might overthrow the Executive power; he would therefore vote against it, if it were not withdrawn.

Mr. MADISON did not wish a decision on the subject, further than gentlemen were prepared.

When I was up before, said he, I endeavored to show that the nature of this office differed from the others upon which the House had decided; and, consequently, that a modification might take place, without interfering with the former distinction; so that it cannot be said we depart from the spirit of the Constitution.

Several arguments were adduced to show the Executive Magistrate had Constitutionally a right to remove subordinate officers at pleasure.

Among others it was urged, with some force, that these officers were merely to assist him in the performance of duties, which, from the nature of man, he could not execute without them, although he had an unquestionable right to do them if he were able; but I question very much whether he can or ought to have any interference in the settling and adjusting the legal claims of individuals against the United States. The necessary examination and decision in such cases partake too much of the Judicial capacity to be blended with the Executive. I do not say the office is either Executive or Judicial; I think it rather distinct from both, though it partakes of each, and therefore some modification, accommodated to those circumstances, ought to take place. I would, therefore, make the officer responsible to every part of the Government.

Surely the Legislature have the right to limit the salary of any officer; if they have this, and the power of establishing offices at discretion, it can never be said that, by limiting the tenure of an office, we devise schemes for the overthrow of the Executive department.

If gentlemen will consult the true spirit and scope of the Constitution, they will perhaps find my propositions not so obnoxious as some seem to think. I did not bring it forward for immediate decision; I am very willing to let it lie over for further consideration.

The committee rose and reported progress, after which the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 30.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill establishing the Treasury Department, Mr. TOWNSEND in the Chair.

Mr. MADISON withdrew the proposition which he yesterday laid upon the table; and Mr. BURKE introduced his additional clause, which, after some alteration and addition proposed by Mr. FITZSIMONS and others, was made part of the bill.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill, with the proposed amendments, which were ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, July 1.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill establishing the Treasury Department; when the several proposed amendments were agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TONNAGE BILL.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that they had concurred with the House in an amendment, (by which the wording of the bill was somewhat altered,) but that they adhered to their amendment of striking out the discrimination in favor of the shipping of our allies, and against others.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the said message.

Mr. SHERMAN observed, that the House had the ultimatum of the Senate; therefore all that remained was for the House to decide.

Mr. PAGE owned this to be a necessary bill, but necessary as it was, he would sooner lose it than renounce the doctrine contained in the contested clause.

Mr. FITZSIMONS saw, if the House persisted any further, that the bill would be lost; from a knowledge of this fact, he was induced to adopt the Senate's amendment; but he left them to answer for the consequences to their constituents and to the world. If gentlemen would take a retrospective view, they would see that the House had done all that was incumbent upon them to carry a measure through, which they conceived to be essential to the national interest; they had insisted upon their determination; they had adhered to their opinion; and now they were reduced to the alternative of losing the bill, or foregoing their sentiments. In this dilemma, he thought it best to accede to the proposition of the Senate, because the provision which this bill contained was all that the mercantile interest got for the sacrifices they had made in the Impost bill. They certainly expected some advantages from another part of the system, when they assented to pay all the duties in advance by way of impost.

Mr. VINING hoped, as the gentlemen had stood firm in three trials upon this point against the Senate, they would persevere to the end. He said it would be committing the dignity of the House to recede from an opinion they had so often solemnly declared, without any new argument being offered against them. But was it true that nothing could be done if the bill was lost? Could not the subject be taken up in another, or might not the bill be over for two or three weeks, in order to compare it with the discrimination intended by the Senate? But if the decision now took place, he hoped it would be as heretofore, otherwise it might be considered that the House was under the government of the Senate, and adopted their opinions without arguments being offered to convince their judgments. He would not add a syllable on the propriety of the measure, because it was well understood.

Mr. SPOWICK said, he was informed there was a very considerable majority in the Senate in favor of the amendment, and reminded the House there was but a majority of one on this floor when the bill was last before them. If, said he, we set out with a determination that a bill shall be lost, unless the whole body of the Senate will submit to a majority of one in this House, the whole Legislative business must cease; because it is hardly possible that an independent body will submit in this manner.

The point in dispute is not, as has been intimated, the most important in the bill, which contains a discrimination in favor of our own navigation against all foreigners whomsoever; the other object is, a discrimination between foreign nations. In the first and primary object, the Senate agree with the House: in the second, they only differ in the mode. If we would defend ourselves, and be really independent of foreign nations, we ought to make the first species of discrimination; but it does not follow that we ought to sacrifice this advantage because we cannot attain the other. Nor can acting on the principles of conciliation be beneath the dignity of this House. There is a particular virtue in moderation; it often gains where it seems to lose. We may relinquish the discrimination in this bill, and bring forward another, in which we can contend for it without prejudice to any other concern.

The question was now reduced to this: whether we should prefer a small advantage to a great one? Whether the whole revenue arising from the foreign navigation should be given up for the sake of exercising a fanciful predilection and preference for one foreign nation over another?

Mr. STONE.—The Constitution supposes that the two branches of the Legislature may disagree, because it gives both Houses the power of proposing or concurring with amendments. If they have not this power, whenever the two Houses disagree, the business would be at an end. The same consequence would result from the doctrine advanced by the honorable gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. VINING.) If it was honorable to adhere, neither House ought to retract its opinion; but while the gentleman made this an argument in favor of our determination, what is to become of the honor and dignity of the Senate? Certainly he intends to compel them to make a sacrifice of it to what he thinks the public good. If this opinion is well founded, it must happen in every case of disappointment, where a law is passed by an accommodation, that one or both branches are dishonored.

Collection of Duties.

Tonnage Bill.

determining the western boundary of the State of New York, and to ascertain the quantity of land lying west of the said boundary, and included between the northern boundary of the State of Pennsylvania and Lake Erie.

If we cannot do all the good we wish, let us do all we can; and while we remember the present state of our commerce, we shall hardly be satisfied in our own minds with the loss of such an important bill. I have still the same opinion with respect to the discrimination, but I am willing to forego it, rather than lose the whole.

Ordered to be referred to Messrs. PAGE, SCOTT, and BALDWIN.

Mr. JACKSON was willing to go as far as any gentleman to obtain what appeared to be for the public good; actuated by this principle, he had given up his private opinion on the subject of tonnage, to what appeared to him to be the sense of the Union.

Resolved, That there be prefixed to the publication of the acts of the present session of Congress a correct copy of the Constitution of Government for the United States.

He rose only to make this observation, and hoped other gentlemen would give up their private sentiments, when the good of their country required it.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. VINING said, the clause had been carried through the House by a larger majority than there was in the Senate; but he owned the majority had diminished.

The House then went into committee on the Collection bill.

Mr. GERRY informed the House, that the Senate had appointed a committee to prepare a plan for accomplishing the end proposed to be attained by the contested clause; he therefore hoped the House would accede.

Mr. CARROLL stated to the committee that the gentlemen from Maryland had met, and endeavored to accommodate the peculiar situation of that State to the principles of the bill, but he was sorry that they could not do it in a satisfactory manner. He reminded them how much the collection depended on the good will of the merchant, and what care ought to be taken to avoid oppressing one part of the Union more than another. There was a leading principle that ought to be established in order to give satisfaction, and that was, to make the regulations general; then no part could complain; but if the ports were variously restricted, it might tend to create some degree of acrimony towards the Government, among that class of citizens who had warmly patronized it, and upon whom much depended for furnishing it with revenue. He mentioned these general ideas to the committee, and hoped they would be carried along, and have their weight in every future regulation.

He did not understand what gentlemen meant by the term accommodation, as applied in this instance. Was there any thing like accommodation on the part of the Senate? No, they insist peremptorily upon their amendment; they have taken no middle ground on which we could meet them; we must either give up the principle of policy, or lose the bill.

Mr. FRIZZMONS was well satisfied that the subject was difficult; the House had found it so, for they had labored the point for some weeks without success. He hoped every gentleman was disposed to concede something, in order to bring the business to an end. He acknowledged the peculiar situation of the navigation of the Chesapeake and its numerous waters; but he begged gentlemen would not insist upon any extraordinary privileges on that account, if they could avoid it, because it would tend to retard the great work they had in hand; besides, as there was a likelihood of getting considerable revenue from that quarter, they ought to submit to more restraints to secure it, than those ports at which little or no business is done.

They might have done with propriety, as the subject has been so long before both Houses. Perhaps it may be a question whether they have authority to originate a bill of this kind; it is a matter of revenue; and, as such, must be exclusively brought forward by the House of Representatives.

Several gentlemen contended that a spirit of mutual forbearance and conciliation was indispensably necessary; that concessions and sacrifices must be made to secure the great object in contemplation; and that every indulgence not incompatible therewith, would certainly be extended. The committee then proceeded to the consideration of other clauses, and after some time spent therein, they rose and reported.

It is said, that the Senate are nearly unanimous in their opinion.

Mr. FRIZZMONS was well satisfied that the subject was difficult; the House had found it so, for they had labored the point for some weeks without success.

Mr. MADISON.—Those who suppose that the loss of the present bill will be irreparable, may do right to agree with the proposition of the Senate; but it does not appear to me in this light. I believe a bill might be substituted, within a convenient time, for securing the advantages to our own vessels, in as full a manner as is done by the present, about which neither House would differ.

Tuesday, July 7.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they had concurred in the resolution for referring to the acts of the present Congress a correct copy of the Constitution, and had appointed a committee to act jointly with a committee of this House to examine enrolled bills.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the new Collection bill. Mr. Trumbull in the Chair. After some time spent therein, the committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Wednesday, July 8.

Mr. Page, from the committee to whom the petition of Andrew Ellicott was referred, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on the new Collection bill. Mr. Trumbull in the Chair, and made further progress therein; but, not having got through the same, had leave to sit again.

Thursday, July 9.

Mr. Gerry, from the committee appointed to prepare and report an estimate of the supplies requisite for the present year, and of the net produce of the impost, as agreed to by the House, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Trumbull in the Chair, again resumed the consideration of the new Collection bill. Not having got through the bill, the committee again rose and reported progress.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. Trumbull in the Chair, and after going through the new Collection bill; and after going through the same, rose, and reported the bill, with the proposed amendments, to the House. The House resolved to take up and consider the report to-morrow.

COLLECTION BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the collection of duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States; and the proposed amendments having been read and amended, were agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the bill, as amended, be engrossed for a third reading.

considerable part of the soil, and that far from being the most excellent, has been disposed of, yet the sales amount to 4,936,863 dollars; land for almost five millions of specie dollars has been already sold in that district, a sum amounting to near one-fifth—to more than one-sixth—of the whole domestic debt of America. This treasure, which we possess, has done thus much towards extinguishing a debt bearing hard upon every part of the Union. Have any of the States done as much? Have any of them made an exertion equal to this inconsiderable effort? No, they have not. Have all the States together done as much? No, they are incapable of doing what this wilderness has done. This consideration alone renders it an interesting subject, of immense future consequence, and worthy of the immediate attention of Congress.

We may consider further, that besides the sales, we have made satisfactory donations to the officers and soldiers of the late army, which may be fairly carried to swell the account; but, after all this, the parts we have disposed of bear no proportion to the parts yet remaining, and from which money may be drawn. Can we hesitate, then, to call into operation a fund so immense and important to the immediate interests of the United States?

If we place it in another point of view, it will also appear a subject in which the United States are deeply engaged, in point of national honor and good faith. The officers and soldiers to whom we made these donations, as a part of the price of their blood, and a reward for their long enduring toils and painful sufferings in the noblest cause, the freedom of their country, are certainly entitled to the fatherly assistance of Congress, in point of protection and government. Can it be thought, without an outrage to humanity, that Congress intended to send them into the wilderness as outcasts from society—that the hand of Government should not be extended to them to protect them in their lives and property—that our gift was an abandonment, was an allurements to draw them without shelter, and leave them devoid of those blessings which their successful efforts have secured to us? My spirit rises indignant at the unjust suspicion.

But these are not the only circumstances in which the honor of Congress is engaged to extend its fostering care into that country. It is expressly stipulated by Congress, with the State of Virginia, that the French and Canadian, and other ancient settlers within her cession, should be protected and governed by Congress. These were, among other terms, agreed to by Congress, when the conveyance of that territory was made; and Congress, by that act, plighted the good faith of the Union for the faithful performance thereof. People have gone upon those lands; they have been regularly purchased, and are paid for; they are consequently entitled to look to us for protection in their property.

A due observance of the treaties heretofore entered into with Indian tribes must be enforced; if the country is settled by a lawless banditti, they will keep the nation in a perpetual broil with the savages; therefore, the guidance of the United States must go with the settlers, in order to procure the observance of such treaties. This is a further obligation in point of national honor and good faith, under which we lie with respect to that country.

I am likewise of opinion that we shall find it a subject of considerable magnitude in point of policy. I presume the first two points will be readily given up, because they are incontrovertibly established by facts; but I feel aware that the point of policy may be contested with me. It may perhaps be objected that the measure now proposed will lead or tend to a depopulation of the Atlantic States, and therefore ought not to be adopted. This is a circumstance I by no means wish. I am as far from desiring a depopulation of the Atlantic shores, as I am from fearing it on this ground. I am confident it will not operate in any considerable degree to bring about that event; but if it should be thought it would, that could be no solid objection against the measure. Whilst the desire of emigration continues, and lands are to be procured, settlers will find their way into that territory; nor is it in the power of Congress to withhold lands altogether, because they are to be got of others on better terms. There is superior encouragement held out to the people settling on the other side of the river Mississippi, where the soil is fertile and the climate equally agreeable. In proof of this assertion, I will read to the committee the translation of a kind of proclamation issued by the Governor of the Spanish posts at the Illinois.

[This paper contains an invitation to all persons inclined to settle in the western country, offering as inducements lands without charge, exemptions from taxes, protection in civil and religious liberties, besides provision and the implements of husbandry.]

After this Mr. S. proceeded: Now, sir, if Congress fear to sell their lands lest it tend to depopulate the Atlantic States, what must they apprehend from propositions like these? They will certainly have all the effect which encouragement from this quarter can have. It may be said that Americans will not venture to live under the Spanish Government, or settle a Spanish colony. To this it may be replied, that when people, from their necessities or inclinations, are determined to emigrate, in order to mitigate their distresses, they think little of the form of government; all they care for is relief from their present or approaching wants and troubles.

Nobody will emigrate from the Atlantic States but a certain description of men, and they will go whether you hold out this encouragement to them or not; they will pay little regard to Congressional restrictions. And here let me make one remark, drawn from my own observation. The forming settlements in a wilderness upon the frontiers, between the savages and the least populated of the civilized parts of the United States, requires men of enterprising, violent, nay, discontented and turbulent spirits. Such always are our first settlers in the ruthless and more laborious and careful farmer. These characters are already in that country, and their number is daily increasing, and will continue to increase; for congenial spirits will assimilate among all our endeavors to the contrary. But how will you prevent them? I should be glad to see a plan for hemming in the emigration to that territory; I think the thing wholly impracticable, therefore it becomes the immediate interest of Congress to direct the emigration to a proper point; direct it to their own territory, rather than be inactive spectators of its silent, though rapid course to the Spanish and British dependencies; rather sell your lands and get something for them, than let your citizens leave your dominions. By improving a part you add to the value of the remainder; their population will produce a hardy race of husbandmen and warriors, always at the command of the United States, to support and defend your liberty and property. These being facts, I leave it to the wisdom of the House to draw the inference.

I will make one further remark, with respect to the encouragement or discouragement of emigration. Suppose it was in the power of Congress to stop the course of the impetuous current, which has already won its way through insuperable obstructions, and spread itself over the fertile lands of the Ohio. I ask, with perfect security, if it is not such an act of contumacy, and inconsistency with the fundamental principles of the Government, that Congress could not adopt it? Consider that many of your citizens are destitute of the comforts, nay, the common necessities of life, without a prospect of providing for the subsistence of themselves and families: I ask, would Congress prevent the emigration of such persons if they could? I think not; they would not act as kind protecting fathers to their people if they did. I presume this would be too serious an objection for any man to face, with a restraining proposition. I question if any man would be hardy enough to point out a class of citizens by name that ought to be the servants of the community; yet, unless that is done, to what class of the people could you direct such a law? But if you passed such an act, it would be tantamount to saying that there is some class which must remain here, and by law must be obliged to serve the others for such wages as they please to give.

This being the case, let us make the best of liberty, our people, and our land. Your citizens, I tell you, are already there by thousands; they are going by thousands more, and are every hour growing up into consequence. They never expect to return into the Atlantic States; plant them in your soil, add this wealth of population to your own, and form an empire illustrious as it is extended. Remember, ye sages of my country, an historic truth recorded for your instruction, that empire has been slowly but invariably moving from east to west; emigration has uniformly receded in that direction, from the time that our common parents quitted the garden of Eden till the present hour; nor doubt but it will continue to pursue that course as long as there are lands to be inhabited.

Those people, Mr. Chairman, who are there, growing up, must be provided with a government in that country. Perhaps to this it may be objected that they will not long continue in union with us. Perhaps arguments may be brought from the other side of the Atlantic, and we may be told with confidence that an extension of territory is infallibly the ruin of kingdoms. For examples in support of this opinion we may be carried as far back as the eleventh epocha of the Romans, and there we may learn from judicious writers that the weight of the distant provinces brought about the fall of that empire. Now, if I could grant this to be a fact, which I cannot, for I rather attribute that event to the pernicious privileges granted, and the immense sums thrown away on the capital of Constantinople, while the preservation of the ancient city was so difficult, and the division of the empire among the children and nephews of Constantine; but if it could be attributed to the extent of her territory, the comparison does not hold. The foundation of the Roman empire was laid upon fraud, rapine, and murder; they conquered, and their footsteps were marked with the blood of men more civilized than themselves; or they, with their wives and daughters, were carried captives and sold at the shambles of Rome; their territory was laid waste, and colonies of children, purchased of their parents, were founded upon their ruin. Was it to be supposed that men would bear this savage barbarity longer than the arm of victory was pressing on them? Is this the manner in which we propose to settle the western country? The comparison is too odious to be insisted upon.

There is a striking difference between the Government of the United States, and that of the Roman provinces. The citizens of the first are bound together in the bonds of equal liberty, and every State possesses within itself independent powers necessary to its support. The wretched inhabitants of the Roman provinces were the abject slaves of their lordly masters, who seldom behaved with moderation; their history is nothing but a series of injustice more or less disguised.

Another instance may, perhaps, be drawn from the separation of this continent from Great Britain. Here I would make two remarks; the first is, that the Atlantic ocean, of three thousand miles extent, formed such a natural boundary as to be a reason for separation when we should be prepared for it; the second is, that even this natural boundary did not furnish the reason for our independence. We were driven into that measure by necessity; our separation was brought about by the impolicy and oppressions of Great Britain. She wished to deprive us of the fruits of our industry, by establishing the doctrine of the omnipotence of Parliament, and wanted to attach us to them as provinces of slaves. I will not say, that if a like conduct were to take place on our part, with respect to the Western country, similar effects might ensue; but this can hardly happen under a Government founded upon the true principles of democracy; besides, I think we have had a sufficient lesson before our eyes to guard us against the attempt.

Much will depend upon the energy and force of the Government established in that country; it ought to be such as will furnish sufficient power for its own internal purposes, and also to secure it to the Union. But that is not the only tie by which its union is held. That country is attached to the Atlantic States by its natural situation. To be convinced of this truth, nothing more is necessary than to look upon the chart: all the commerce of that country must come through the States upon the sea coast. We know, at Pittsburgh, that we are a thousand miles nearer to the market, than settlers at the mouth of the Ohio river. When we export our produce by that and the Mississippi, we know we can get easier home with our returns by the way of Philadelphia, than the others can by turning up and stemming the current of the Mississippi. Therefore, the imports for all that territory must come through the United States. From these considerations, I conclude it would be madness in the extreme for them to think of a separation, unless they were driven to it by a fatal necessity: they will be too sensible of its ill effects ever to attempt it.

But suppose, for a moment, that they break off from the Union, and even become our enemies, it would be good policy in us to get as much as we can from them first, especially as they are disposed to give it us; let us make them extinguish part of our national debt before they leave us. The soil and climate of that country, as I said before, will be great inducements for emigrants to settle there. If they were to break off, they would know how to get money enough from the sale of the territory to support their Government, without any other resource whatever. If I, as a resident in that country, had the remotest view of a separation from the Atlantic States, I should be sorry to see Congress sell an acre of that land; for selling it, in that case, would be neither more nor less than preventing us from putting the money into our pockets when we became independent. If they meditate independence, the most likely way to make them so, will be to let their lands alone, in order to supply them with funds sufficient to support them in the measure. If they are sold, it will not be in their power.

Another consideration which shows the subject to be of great consequence to the Union, is the sales already made there, a partial mention of which I made in one of my former observations. By the terms of those sales, the United States are obliged to complete the surveys; this has not hitherto been done; of consequence, the money due for them cannot be had, nor the accumulating interest be suspended. The amount, as I stated before, is near five millions of dollars: of this sum, $771,310 have been paid into the Treasury; the whole of the remainder will continue unpaid till the surveys are completed, namely $4,165,553, paying a daily interest of $684. This gentleman, is what we actually lose every day, for want of establishing some regulations on the subject. Is not this a matter of serious concern to the people of the United States, which requires our immediate attention? Then, if this is the case, if the subject is of such vast magnitude in all these points of view, it only remains to consider what is to be done with respect to it to procure the greatest good to the United States, and the greatest benefit to the people.

I apprehend it will be found that a Land Office will effect these objects better than any other plan that can be devised. If this should be effectual, and no doubt can be entertained but it will, the inhabitants of the United States cannot, with a good grace, be called upon for heavy taxes in order to pay the interest on a debt which can be so easily and properly extinguished. Every individual who contemplates the subject, will see how much it is his interest to buy a few dollars in certificates, and purchase a piece of land with them, which will annihilate the debt, and prevent the demand for taxes to pay the interest; besides, it will remain as a security to reimburse the principal to the proprietor, as the population of the country extends; but, at all events, it would be but advancing four or five years' interest, and the whole debt would be absorbed. How much better is this than paying interest during our lives, and leaving our children to discharge the principal, or continue on their own shoulders the burden of an annual interest of six per cent. From this view of the subject, it would appear every man's interest to become a purchaser in that country. This mixing of the interest would incorporate the body, and tend to increase the bands of union; it will occasion ties of consanguinity and affinity among us, which, added to the similarity of laws, customs, and manners, will form an inseparable cement, and compress the whole into the closest union. If it should be thought inconvenient for the citizens in the Atlantic States to purchase so largely as I have intimated, let them lay out but the amount of one year's tax in this way, and it will nearly extinguish the domestic debt, for which, otherwise, they will have to pay annually, forever, an equal sum to what I propose for them to advance. By the establishment of a Land Office such purchasers could be supplied.

I think this plan better on another consideration. If we mean to sell our lands for ready money, or mean to trust, we have a superior advantage. It is more probable that the necessities of a person who wants the land for the subsistence of himself and family, will labor harder to procure property of this kind, and secure it for himself, than the speculator who never means to pay a farthing until he has received it from the sale of the land; besides, the necessities of a person is better able to buy of Government than of the speculator, because he can get it cheaper. The purchasers of large tracts retail out their land to this class of men, and certainly charge them something for their trouble. But if we sell on credit, as under the Proprietary Government was the practice in Pennsylvania, those who take out small quantities get their land surveyed, and set precede them, their settlements would be more safe than they are.

Mr. SENECA had no doubt of the necessity and propriety of disposing of the lands in the Western Territory, but he thought the office ought to be kept at the seat of Government, because it would be necessary to check the enterprising spirit which might grow up under the regulation. He knew much might be said on both sides; but he thought the people who were generally the first settlers on a frontier, were of that class who had little money or property, and consequently unable to purchase; if they wanted real purchasers, they must go to those who had the money to pay; not that he meant to argue against the accommodation of the one class or the other; indeed, he should be happy to serve both, if it would enable Congress to get the best market and the highest price for their lands. To bring the question fairly before the committee, he would move to strike out "Governor of the Western Territory," and insert the "principal officer of the Treasury Department."

Mr. VINING said it was a very important subject, but perhaps gentlemen were not prepared for a decision; if so, the question had better be put off till to-morrow. For his own part, he felt some diffidence in saying much on the subject, but he agreed perfectly with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) in the principles of his plan. He concluded with moving that the committee rise.

Mr. MOORE thought very well of the plan, but was not prepared to decide. He suspected that if the last motion obtained, it would tend to favor speculators, and therefore he should be against it. He believed there was some justice in the observations thrown out by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHERMAN,) but this might be complied with by limiting the sales to certain boundaries, so that the purchasers should not run over the whole Territory.

A desultory conversation arose, whether the resolution reported by the select committee, and adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, should be reported to the House; when it was understood to be only one of the number brought forward by Mr. SCOTT, and, as such, not to be reported till the whole were gone through.

The committee now rose, and Mr. BOUNDNOT reported that the committee, according to order, had the state of the Union under consideration, but had come to no resolution thereupon.

COMPENSATION OF THE PRESIDENT, &c.

Mr. VINING wished to call the attention of the House to a business he apprehended not very lengthy; it was the report of a committee on the subject of compensation to be made to the President, Vice President, the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, for their services; and he wished gentlemen to consider the situation of every one concerned in this business, themselves and the continent at large. He hoped they would the seat of Government, consequently he differed from the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) in his first principle. This being the case, he advised the rising of the committee, and wished the appointment of a select one, to investigate the subject, to examine all papers and contracts respecting the Western Territory, both of Congress and the several States, the deeds ofcession and the Articles of Confederation; from the report of such an examination, the House might be able to discover some proper plan for conducting the business. The magnitude of the subject demands the fullest investigation, and the wisdom of the Legislature will no doubt induce them to treat it according to its importance. He had no other view in moving the rising of the committee; but if gentlemen insisted upon a decision, he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. SCOTT.—The first gentleman who remarked upon my proposition, thinks we have no right to appoint the officer who is to direct the business. If I understand what I brought forward, it does not go to appoint the officer, but to give additional duties to an officer already appointed; therefore, that objection falls to the ground.

The gentleman last up, alleges, that the Land Office ought to be at the seat of Government. I would ask him if all those who want the lands live at the seat of Government? or rather will not the applications come from the remotest corners of the continent? It will be more difficult for real settlers to go to the seat of Government, than to purchase the land; but will it accommodate any class of men? There are few, who know what they are about, will come here to buy land, and then go up to the Ohio to look for it; if they act the part of prudent men, they will go and see the land first, and when they are there, they can more conveniently apply for what they want, than return by a circuitous march to the seat of Government for that purpose. I had the convenience of the purchasers in view when I made the proposition, and by far the greater part of them reside in the neighborhood. Men who are well able to pay you the price of the land cannot afford to travel to New York; they will be losers by the bargain if you were to give them the land without charge, for a journey down here would require three times the price of a common farm.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHERMAN) seems to run away with an idea of settling that territory that can never take place; it has been tried without any success; the experiment shows that it tends to cull and destroy the land more than any other mode; besides, a man will give a third more for a spot of ground when he takes his choice, than he will if obliged to take it good or bad as it may be. There is no necessity for compelling people to settle close together in townships; the nature of the country and dread of the Indians will force them to do this; they always settle in strong parties for their own convenience. The late settlers from New England experience the inconvenience of settling by townships; if they had suffered the pioneers I spoke of to and balanced as any other; the expense of it will be nothing, because the officer may be supported out of the fees. This being the case, I shall conclude with moving that the committee adopt the resolution reported by the committee, and recommend it to the House to appoint a select committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. FRIZZMONS asked if it would not be better to settle all the principles of the bill first, that the select committee might not lose their labor, as had been once or twice experienced, for want of this precaution.

He was in favor of some measure of this kind, though he had some doubts of the necessity there was supposed to be of establishing a Land Office.

The question was now taken on the resolution, and agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT then brought forward a string of propositions, to be put into the hands of the select committee, containing the principles upon which he wished the Land Office established, and the manner in which it should be regulated.

One proposition was, to place the office under the direction of the Governor of the Western Territory.

Mr. STONE objected to this, because he conceived the Legislature would in this case appoint the officer, which is contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN thought it best to delay the decision of this subject. It is certainly a matter of high importance to the Union, that this land be disposed of in the best manner. No doubt, if it is properly managed, but it will pay the principal and interest of all the debts of the United States, said he; but I have great objection to the manner of settlement proposed. I think it would tend to greater advantage, to settle the country gradually, in compact bodies, as the inhabitants can be spared from the other parts of the Union. But this business ought to be managed with a degree of caution, lest we open a door to that field of speculation in the certificates of the United States, by which the holders of the securities may be treated with injustice.

It will be a better plan to settle the country by townships; so far I would be willing to go, and also make arrangements for completing the survey of those tracts already disposed of. Perhaps it might be well to give some of the township lots to settlers, without any charge, reserving others to sell at some future day, when they become more valuable, in consequence of the settlements around them. I apprehend we should get more money in this way than in that proposed. If men are to take out warrants, and lay them where they please, the settlers will break up the ground, and we shall be forced to sell after a while, for less money, because the lands will be picked and nothing but the refuse left; besides, people not knowing where others have located, may take up the same lots, and lay a foundation for eternal lawsuits and discontent.

Mr. LEE thought the Land Office ought to be at themselves down; they cultivate the ground, and erect buildings for their own accommodation. Land, in this improved state, furnishes a better security to Government for any arrears of purchase money, than a large tract sold on speculation, and which lies in the same state of nature as it did when it was disposed of, perhaps adding thereto the expense of making the survey. If the land must revert to Congress at last for default of payment, we get nothing in the latter case; whereas, when sold in lots, if a man has settled himself down, and paid for his warrant and survey, which costs the Union nothing, but for the first price and interest thereon, it must strike every gentleman's mind that it would be disagreeable, after a man had made a settlement for three or four years, to have to turn out. Rather than do this, he would make every exertion to discharge the price; if his situation was so wretched as not to furnish the means, some of his neighbors, on such security, might befriend him; but at any rate Government would be secure. By this argument, I do not mean to insist that Congress should sell their lands on trust; they may do so, or sell for ready pay, as their wisdom may think eligible. I shall be satisfied either way.

The plan does not prevent the sale of large tracts, (your million-acre purchasers may be accommodated with the quantity they desire;) it only admits the sale of smaller quantities; and to that kind of people who stand in need of land, this plan would be much better than the one heretofore pursued. It would be an immense saving, we should have no expense attending on the sales, no surveys to pay for, which have already been very expensive. We find that two thousand and eighty-one miles of a common survey line, has been run, at the rate prescribed by Congress, to 20,690 specie dollars, more than nine hard dollars for every mile. This expense is absolutely so enormous, that Congress had better give away their lands to those who will take and settle them, than pay it.

I think the convenience of the people is a subject not unworthy of being taken into view. My plan proposes that they should be able to perfect their titles on the spot. I fear not the objection which has been raised. It may be said, the titles ought not to be completed until it was done immediately under the eye of Congress. Let this be as it may, I will make one remark: can we not have every tie, every check, and security upon these officers that we have upon the collectors of the revenue? I think there is as much room for confidence in the one case as in the other. We can take care that the Secretary of the Land Office shall send in his accounts of patents and warrants. I think we may depend here upon a true return.

The Receiver of the office shall take nothing but public securities, which are not quite so great a temptation to embezzlement or illicit practices as money. The Surveyor will be a check upon both. I think the gentlemen employed in this business cannot be of very trifling character. In short, this department may be as well checked consent to take it up, and he flattered himself the discussion would not last longer than a day.

Mr. WHITE wished to go into a Committee of the Whole on the business.

Mr. FITZSIMONS did not like to enter upon a lengthy discussion of a point that was incapable of much elucidation by reasoning; he therefore was against going into a committee at this stage of the business. He observed that the committee had reported something, and the members had been pretty generally consulted on the same. He hoped the House would despatch the business without delay or loss of time, if they were at all inclined to take it up.

Mr. WHITE thought it necessary to go into a committee, because there were a number of things mentioned, the reasons for which appeared to him very uncertain.

Mr. VINING said it was a subject of considerable delicacy, and he supposed very few gentlemen would be inclined to speak three or four times on a point; yet this was all the advantage gained by going into a committee. He was no more interested than others; every gentleman might judge of his own case, but after it had been before a committee of twelve, in order to get the fullest sense of the House upon the subject, he was inclined to receive it without so much circumlocution. He observed, that the business had originated in a Committee of the Whole, and it was unusual to recommit it without showing some reasons why.

Mr. WHITE gave up his motion for a Committee of the Whole, and said, before he consented to the report, he should be glad to know in what style it was expected that the President would live. He observed, there was provision for the expenses of a house, furniture, secretaries, clerks, carriages, and horses. Perhaps the sum proposed might be too much or too little. He should like to see an estimate of how much was necessary for keeping the table, the equipage, &c., before he decided. He hoped the committee would elucidate this subject.

There was another thing he wished to inquire of them. The Vice President's salary was charged at five thousand dollars; he could not conceive upon what principle that sum was reported. Did it bear a proportion to his services, or was it in proportion to what the members of the Senate and this House were to be allowed? There is nothing which obliges him to be attentive to his business. No doubt but the gentleman who holds that office at present will be careful and diligent in executing the business assigned him; yet there is nothing to prevent the Vice President from residing at home and receiving his salary, without coming within the walls of the Senate-room. The Union is obliged to support him; but I said he would make that support conditional; he should have a liberal provision while in public life, but no longer. As to delicacy, I know of none, sir, that ought to be used while we are in pursuit of the public good. I speak, therefore, with candor what are my sentiments on this subject. Other gentlemen, no doubt, do the same; but I am clearly for examining into the principles before I agree to the conclusion.

Mr. PAGE was sorry to see gentlemen spinning out the time to little purpose; certainly, after having the subject under consideration for nearly three months, they might be able to decide.

If this business was fixed, and gentlemen knew they were to have but moderate salaries, it might perhaps tend to make them more expeditious; but at all events, they ought to know the rate at which they attend, in order to regulate their expenses. To some it might be a matter of no concern, because they could bear every thing of this kind for a twelvemonth without inconvenience; but they ought to consider the situation of others. We are, said he, keeping the President here without any provision for his support; but in this we may think ourselves right, because, in his patriotic ardor, his love for his country, he told us he was willing to pursue that illustrious example which he set during the period of our calamity; he refused compensation for his services. But the Constitution requires that he shall receive a compensation, and it is our duty to provide it. We must also provide something for our own expenses, or it may reduce gentlemen not better prepared than I am to depend upon a friend for what the public ought to furnish.

Mr. VINING had said the subject was delicate, but he did not conceive there was any delicacy in asking or answering questions on this or any other occasion, where the good of his country was concerned.

Mr. LAWRENCE did not know whether the sum proposed was enough for the President or not; but according to the terms of the Constitution, it ought to be granted as one sum, because he is to receive no other emolument whatever from the United States, or either of them. Now, if it is declared he shall receive twenty thousand dollars, and, exclusive of that sum, we make him an allowance for furniture, horses, carriages, &c., such an allowance is an emolument beyond the compensation contemplated in the Constitution; but I have no objection to blend these sums together, declaring the whole to be the compensation required by the Constitution. Besides, if we establish salaries for his secretaries and clerks, we establish them officers of the Government; this will be improper, because it infringes his right to employ a confidential person in the management of those concerns, for which the Constitution has made him responsible. For these reasons, Mr. L. moved to strike out all that related to horses, carriages, furniture, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN thought it much better to give a net sum, because the President would then have no accounts to settle with the United States.

Mr. SENECA considered this a Constitutional question, and therefore thought it deserved serious investigation. The provision made in the report, for paying the expenses of enumerated articles, does not leave the President in the situation intended by the Constitution, which was, that he should be independent in office; that he should during his continuance in office; that he should have a compensation for his services, not to be increased or diminished during that period; but there is nothing that will prevent us from making further allowances, provided that the twenty thousand dollars is all that is given as a compensation. By this construction, one of the most salutary clauses in the Constitution will be rendered nugatory. From these considerations, he was led to believe that the report was founded on unconstitutional principles.

Mr. BALDWIN said, the Committee of the Whole, when the business was before them, had not determined any thing on this point; that, consequently, the select committee were to frame a report upon such principles as they judged proper. In order then to have every thing distinct and accurate, they had brought their opinion forward in the form it now appears. If it be deemed proper to grant an aggregate sum, the House would no doubt add to the twenty thousand dollars what it was supposed these expenses would amount to.

However, he did not think the Constitution was infringed; it was intended that the compensation should not be increased or diminished during the President's continuance in office. Now it might be as well fixed, by making the allowance in part money, and part furniture, &c., as by declaring a precise sum; it will still be a stated compensation.

Mr. TUCKER thought furniture and plate ought always to be provided by Government, because, if it was necessary for every new President to buy these articles, it might put him to great inconvenience; besides, when he retired from his situation, they would not sell for half the first cost. He therefore wished this part of the report to stand, together with the rent of a house; but would join in striking out all the rest.

Mr. MADISON did not think the report interfered with either the spirit or letter of the Constitution, and therefore was opposed to any alteration, especially with respect to the property of a fixed nature. He was sure, if the furniture and plate, and house rent, could be allowed, some of the other articles might also. The horses and carriages will cost money, and sell for little, after being used for four years; this will be a certain loss to the President, or his family; besides, the House have already undertook to defray expenses of this kind, and so set a precedent for the enumeration which had been reported.

Mr. WHITE said, if a certain sum was assigned for the expenses, the report would be better; but as it now stood, there was no certainty in it. One President might circumscribe it to a quarter part of the expense another would; consequently, the compensation could not be fixed.

He admitted the propriety of paying the salary in advance for the first year, as mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina. He expected this would be sufficient to defray the extra expenses without subjecting the President to any inconvenience.

Mr. BOUNDNOT.—If the Legislature may provide the house and furniture, they may go further on the same principle, and provide for the rest; he was satisfied it should be so, because it could be no infringement on the Constitution.

Mr. LIVERMORE hoped the words would be struck out; indeed he was sorry they had ever been put in. The clause in the Constitution is intended to tie down the Legislature, as well as the President; they shall make him no complaints while in office, he shall receive nothing but a fixed compensation for his services. Give him then this compensation, let it be equal to his usefulness; but do not direct him to employ so much to one use, and so much to another; it cannot be called a compensation when you direct how it is to be expended; besides, it was wrong on another account; why should we pretend to direct him in the style in which he shall live? Let him have a salary, and expend it in the manner he shall think proper.

Mr. PAGE was for striking out all the words, because he conceived it would be against the spirit of the Constitution. It would be much more handsome to make one general provision, than to be thus particular in enumerating the articles of expense. It has been hinted, that these articles of expense would amount to half the sum mentioned in the report to be given as a compensation; if so, he would propose to strike out all that related to the subject, and to insert twenty-five or thirty thousand, as the House shall deem most eligible.

Mr. STONE thought the President ought to be at liberty to live in any style he thought proper, and that the House ought to give him such compensation as they thought his services merited. If you furnish him with a house, horses, and carriages, you declare that this is the house, these horses, and the carriages which he shall use. There is certainly some degree of indecency in this; if he was a private gentleman, he would be at liberty to use such as he liked best. Suppose he dislikes them, and will not have them, he is guilty of a breach of the law; is it intended by the House to impeach him for it? I apprehend it is not, for no part of the Constitution gives us a right to dictate to him on this head. He would rather let the President set the example how he ought to live, than to see the Legislature direct him. Economy is by no means disadvantageous to the United States; if the President chooses to live in an economical manner, we ought not to prevent him.

Mr. VINING thought, as the President was the representative of the nation, that there ought to be a proper degree of dignity attached to the office; he did not wish for splendor, but hoped to avoid the appearance of penury. If he was right in this opinion, the House had a right to show what they expected of the President, and, consequently, had a right to enter into the enumeration proposed in the report, and establish a uniform rule of conduct in the Presidential chair.

With respect to its Constitutionality, his mind was perfectly easy, the Constitution appeared to be silent; if so, the House had the right of interfering. He wondered how gentlemen could agree

[H. or R.]

New Jersey Election.

JULY, 1789.]

The committee, said he, have applied to the House for a power to send a commission into New Jersey, to take testimony, in contradiction of what has been certified by the Executive Magistrate; now I submit to the House, whether this certificate, admitted to be true on all hands, is not the best evidence the nature of this case requires, and whether it will be necessary to send through that State a commission to examine every person, who chooses to offer evidence on the subject. I think such a measure will produce great evils; in a precedent, and many others in its operation; in the first place, such evidence will be taken ex parte, because it will be next to impossible for the opposite party to attend, in order to cross-examine the witnesses. It will put the petitioners to great expense and inconvenience, and, after all, the uncertainty will be as great as it is at this moment.

But the precedent, I conceive, will be extremely dangerous. If a contested election should take place in New Hampshire or Georgia, we shall be obliged to send a commission into those States, for the purpose of obtaining testimony, which, after all, can never be so satisfactory as viva voce evidence; and more time may be spent in executing this commission, where the judges have to travel from district to district, through a State of 5 or 600 hundred miles extent, and examine every judge, inspector, and elector, than the representation is chosen to sit.

We thought it proper to lay these reasons before the House, and there leave the matter to their decision, to which we shall submit with all cheerfulness. We came here with an ardent desire to carry the Constitution into effect: actuated by this motive, we mention to the House the great attention which ought to be paid to secure the freedom of election, upon which alone the whole fabric depends. It is not that we dread the fullest investigation, that we submit these sentiments; it is our anxiety to have the question of our election speedily determined, and not delayed by what we conceive a useless measure.

The question before the House appears to be, whether it is necessary to obtain a few additional witnesses, at great uncertainty and expense; or whether the evidence already before them, and what may further be advanced by the petitioners, viva voce, is not sufficient to decide upon.

Mr. AMES brought forward several resolutions, which he thought would bring the question alluded to by the honorable gentlemen from Jersey (Mr. BOUNDINOR) fairly before them; the first prescribed the mode of taking depositions by commission.

This being read, together with the papers containing the charges, &c. and the certificate of the Governor;

Mr. BENSON observed that the House had referred this business to the Committee of Elections, to report facts arising from the proofs; that it appeared to the committee, that certain facts respecting the manner in which the election was conducted, might be material, but the testimony could not be procured by them, without the aid of the House; they had therefore made a report of this nature. He thought the House had better consider whether the facts alluded to by the committee were material or not; if they were not material, the House would not adopt the resolutions proposed by Mr. AMES; but if they were, then those resolutions will come properly before them.

Mr. VINING opposed Mr. AMES's proposition for empowering the judges of New Jersey to take this evidence. He was in favor of receiving this testimony viva voce before the House; the vicinity of that State would render this mode not inconvenient; and if it should be found necessary to form commissions for this purpose in distant States, provision might be made accordingly.

Mr. LAWRENCE remarked, that it had been questioned how far the House had a right to interfere in the election of particular States, but that Congress has received a discretionary power from the Constitution to regulate the time, manner, and place, of holding elections; and it is stated in another clause, that the election and qualification of its own members shall be judged by the House; by this means, all transactions relative to such elections are included; consequently they may determine in what manner the investigation of such a subject shall be prosecuted. If any doubts arise on that point, the sense of the House must be taken thereon.

Mr. BENSON proposed a day to be assigned on which the parties should have a hearing before the House on the question, either by themselves or by counsel, whether, by the Constitution, an inquiry can take place before the House relative to the facts alleged.

Mr. WHITE objected to counsel being introduced in the present instance; he judged the House as competent to decide this business as they had already been to determine many other Constitutional questions.

Mr. JACKSON was of opinion, that no such question could be admitted with propriety: One election has been determined without the aid of counsel or ex parte evidence, and he saw no reason in the present case why a different mode should be substituted. The authority of this House is not to be called in question by an individual; there cannot be a doubt of its jurisdiction in the case. One gentleman has been tried by the House upon the evidence that was brought before us: it will not be pretended that the delicacy and feelings of that gentleman could be less than those of the gentlemen concerned in the present question; it would be inconsistent and unjust to subject one member to a particular mode of trial, and then deliberate whether that same mode shall be adopted with respect to another.

Mr. SENEY said, he did not doubt the jurisdiction of the House, but as some objections had been made by the petitioners, and they had prayed to have the point settled, he thought they ought to be indulged; that every citizen had a right to be heard in his own defence, where he considered his right concerned.

It was then moved that the report of the committee should lie on the table, in order to take up the proposition of Mr. BENSON.

And a committee was appointed, consisting of Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. BROWN.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to provide for the settlement of accounts between the United States and individual States, agreeably to the ordinance of the late Congress.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. STURGIS, and Mr. SMITH, (of South Carolina.)

An engrossed bill to regulate the collection of duties imposed on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, was read the third time, and the blanks therein filled up.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States."

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said bill to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

And then the House adjourned.

NEW JERSEY ELECTIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the report made yesterday by the Committee of Elections on the petition of a number of the citizens of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House, as elected within that State.

This report stated that certain allegations in the petition required the testimony of some witnesses, which the committee did not think themselves authorized to collect: they, therefore, requested the direction of the House in the manner of proceeding with respect to such testimony; also with respect to the request of the petitioners in favor of the sitting members, that they might be heard by counsel.

Mr. BOUNDINOR observed, that he could answer for himself, and he believed for the other Jersey members, that the suffrages of their constituents had not been solicited by them, nor had they been anywise concerned in any of the transactions at the election complained of. In consequence of the commissions received from the Governor and the Council of New Jersey, who had declared the election legal, he and his colleagues appeared in the House; the Governor's conduct had been censured on the occasion; however, their proceedings have been published and laid before the House, and the petitioners have agreed that they shall be admitted as evidence in this case. He thought it unnecessary that the petitioners in favor of the election should be heard by counsel. He said the sentiments of the other sitting members coincided with his. They gave up every advantage that might arise from this, rather than occasion the great delay that must attend it.

TUESDAY, July 14.

NEW JERSEY ELECTIONS.

Mr. AMES, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of a number of the citizens of New Jersey, complaining of the illegality of the election of the members holding seats in this House, as elected within that State, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

to provide plate and furniture, yet hesitate with respect to the clerk and secretary. Were not the latter as necessary as the former? If so, they ought to be equally provided for.

The question on Mr. LAWRENCE's motion was now taken, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PAGE now moved to strike out twenty thousand dollars, and insert thirty thousand.

Mr. SMITH inquired whether it was the intention of the House to saddle the President with the expense incurred, in consequence of their resolution of the 15th April. He understood that near ten thousand dollars had been laid out in purchasing furniture, and putting the house in order for his reception; it might be disagreeable to the President to take it. Perhaps he would be a considerable loser by such a bargain, and many of the things might be of a nature he disliked. He thought the House had been inconsistent with itself in ordering these things for the President, and then refusing to let them be applied to his use.

Mr. SHERMAN thought the House need not be embarrassed on this point. The expense is to be paid by the United States, and the furniture will be their property, to do what they please with. Neither did he think the House inconsistent, because it was the object of the Legislature, by their former vote, to provide only for the temporary accommodation of the President.

Mr. BENSON said, the business had been properly conducted. It was not in contemplation to throw the furniture or any other expense upon the President. He presumed the property belonged to the United States, but they would sell to the President such part as he chose to purchase. As to the House, the President was not confined to it; he might give it up when he pleased, and take another if he thought proper.

The question on striking out twenty thousand and inserting thirty thousand was divided, and the first part was agreed to, but the latter rejected. It was now moved to strike out the words secretary and clerk.

Mr. MADISON thought the Executive Magistrate ought not to have the power of creating officers; yet if he appointed his secretary and clerks, and they were recognised, either with respect to salary or official acts, they became officers of the Government.

Mr. BENSON did not think it necessary to recognise any such officers; they were to be esteemed the mere instruments of the President, and not as sharing in the Administration.

The motion was put, and carried in the affirmative, and then the House adjourned.

H. or R.]

Light-Houses, &c.

[JULY, 1789.]

Mr. Ames objected to this proposition, as the greatest inconveniences might arise from it; it would discourage a number of people from applying for justice, especially those who lived remote from the seat of Government, provided they were obliged to attend in person, and give their testimony. The eligibility of taking depositions in many instances, particularly the present, in preference to the delays, uncertainty, and enormous expenses that would inevitably attend the mode proposed by the motion, was clear to his mind. After some desultory conversation, Mr. Benson withdrew his proposition.

Mr. Lee proposed, that the report should be re-committed, and the committee authorized to send for evidence, papers, and records, and report a special state of facts. He said that it was the custom of the British House of Commons, upon similar occasions, to leave the whole business to a committee; and observed, that the example of so old and so experienced a Legislative body could be followed with safety and propriety.

This motion was withdrawn, after some desultory conversation had taken place upon it.

The question on the report of the committee then recurred, on the question whether the judges of the Supreme Court in New Jersey should be authorized to take depositions on the subject of facts alleged by the parties; when

Mr. SENEY moved, that Wednesday next be assigned for the parties to appear and be heard by their counsel before the House, of which notice should be given; and that the committee be discharged.

Mr. LIVESMORE observed, that the House was much embarrassed; but, sir, I saw it from the first appointment of the committee. I object to counsel being introduced into this House to discuss a previous question. This House is the judge of its own elections. We have appointed a committee to examine, but have not vested them with power to determine. They have not so much as a power to hear. If we have pursued a wrong step, why should we proceed any further? Let the committee be discharged, and a day appointed to hear the parties. It is my determination to hear, before I judge. The committee should be discharged, if they cannot proceed further without our aid. The subject now before the House is material, and of the greatest importance; and although we have been heretofore wrong, we may now set ourselves right.

I have no objection that counsel should be heard upon the merits of the principal question. Though after an investigation of facts, we have determined in one instance, and why we cannot do the same now I cannot conceive.

Each House is to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. What means the word judge? Why it corresponds with the ancient maxim, to hear and determine. Now how can the House determine without hearing? If the House is to judge, we must bring all the evidence before us, although the committee may have heard it twenty times over.

Mr. MADISON thought, if the jurisdiction of the House was called in question, it would be proper to hear counsel on that point, because it must be indicated to determine a question respecting their own jurisdiction, without hearing what could be advanced against it.

Mr. PACE was in favor of recommitting the report, and letting the committee proceed upon the duty to which they were originally appointed. He said, if the jurisdiction of the House was questioned, the parties had an indubitable right to be heard by counsel, and he hoped no gentleman would refuse the people of the United States a privilege of this important nature, which had been always enjoyed by the subjects of Great Britain.

Mr. STONE thought the authority of the House to determine any question respecting the election of any of its members, was so clearly expressed and understood, from the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution, that no doubt could be entertained by the petitioners, or any one else; consequently, it would be a waste of time to spend any hearing of counsel on that point. He had no objection to admitting a limited number on the merits of the main question, if required.

Mr. BOUNDINOR informed the House that the petitioners meant to withdraw their request to be heard by counsel.

Whereupon Mr. SENEY withdrew his motion for making it the order of the day.

The question again recurred for inserting a commission to go into Jersey to take evidence; but, it growing late, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, July 16.

A petition of John Christopher Stobel, of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that an exclusive privilege may be granted him for a term of years, to construct and navigate boats with wheels, upon the principles of a model which he has invented, to facilitate the passage of boats up and down streams and rapids, without the use of oars.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States; which was received and read the first time.

Mr. FRIZZMONS, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to provide for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio; which was received and read the first time.

LIGHT HOUSES, &c.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the bill for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, and for authorizing the several States to provide and regulate pilots.

Mr. BOUNDINOR took the chair of the committee,

JULY, 1789.]

Compensation to the President, &c.

[H. or R.]

and after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported progress.

COMPENSATION OF THE PRESIDENT, &c.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the compensation of the President, Vice President, and members of Congress.

The blank occasioned by striking out on Monday last, was now proposed to be filled.

Mr. LIVESMORE moved to fill it with 18,000 dollars.

Mr. BURKE said there were some members of the committee in favor of 15,000 dollars; others, indeed, were for a much larger sum—he believed they went so far as 70,000 dollars; that 20,000 dollars was an accommodation, and as such he had agreed to it; but he was of opinion that 15,000 dollars was sufficient; that 20,000 had been once agreed to, but the expenses were added at a subsequent meeting of the committee; now, as the House had concurred in striking out 20,000 dollars, and a proposition had come forward more correspondent to his judgment, he should give it support.

Mr. FRIZZMONS presumed it was not a question before the House what the report of the committee had been, nor were the sentiments any gentleman had there delivered to operate against the sense expressed by the committee in their report; if any thing done in committee was to influence the decision of the House, it must be the report, which spoke the sense of the majority. He further presumed, that when the 20,000 dollars were struck out, after all the expense had been erased, it was in the contemplation of the honorable mover to increase the sum so as to include both articles. It was with this view he voted in favor of striking out the 20,000 dollars.

Mr. TUCKER said it might happen, that the expenses a President would incur at the first entering on the office would be so great as to injure his private fortune, and distress his family. A quarter's salary might be insufficient to defray the expense; yet if the President continued but three months in office, this sum would be all he was entitled to. He thought it just and requisite to provide against accidents of this kind, if it could be done consistently with the Constitution. With this object in view, he would propose that the President's compensation should be 28,000 dollars for the first year, and 16,000 dollars for every other year; that 10,000 dollars should be paid him in advance, on his coming to the chair, and the remainder in quarterly payments. Its amount, he said, would be nearly what was proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVESMORE); and if the House was disposed to fix on that sum as a proper compensation, they might, without any material change, admit his proposition; but if they meant to grant either a greater or less sum, he hoped they would accommodate it to his principle.

Mr. STONE said that a sum of 25,000 dollars would be as small a sum as would answer the purpose; and provided that amount should be agreed to, the expense of the Executive would be less to the people than that of any Government in the world. If it is considered that the unavoidable expense will be great, and that the assistance of two or more secretaries will be necessary for the President to discharge his high and important trust, and that it cannot be expected that persons in such a station should be in straitened or dependent circumstances, this sum will not be found to exceed the absolute expense, with a moderate compensation for the services of the President. It is also a maxim of sound policy, that Executive officers should be independent.

Mr. WHITE.—Sir, I do not say that 25,000 dollars will or will not be sufficient; but in order to determine the necessary sum, I should wish to know the style in which the President is expected to live. If a style of magnificence and splendor is to be adopted, this sum is too small; and if economy is pursued, it may be too much. Until this is known, it will be extremely difficult to decide upon a proper sum; and when I give my vote, I wish to do it on such information as will satisfy my mind with respect to its propriety, and show my constituents the reasonableness of the measure. Will he live in a more expensive style than the former Presidents of Congress, or will he live nearly in the same? If so, what was that expense, or what will be the probable increase? How was that money applied, and what will now be necessary? If these questions can be answered, gentlemen may decide with more precision than they can while the subject is left aloft.

Mr. BALDWIN said it was impossible to get the information the gentleman required; the committee had made all the examination in their power with respect to the actual expense of supporting the office. They found former Presidents of Congress, whose office, by the by, was less important, and whose assistants were less numerous, expended 7,000, 8,000, and so on to 13,000 dollars annually. From this, some gentlemen were led to believe 17,000 dollars might be sufficient in this instance. But we were, said he, left without any thing satisfactory on this subject; and when the question was pressed on the committee, they varied from 15,000 to 25,000 dollars; we were therefore obliged to average the sum.

We were satisfied that it must be left to experiment to determine what the allowance ought to be; and we were certain that the gentleman who had to make the first experiment would do it in such a manner as to give satisfaction to every body. He knows the way to blend dignity and economy; and I would rather, on this account, make the allowance too much than too little. I would, therefore, prefer making the experiment at 25,000 dollars; a sum that, in the President's hands, will give umbrage to no one.

Mr. BOUNDINOR made some further observations respecting the examination made by the committee, from which it appeared that the expenses of the President of the United States would exceed the expenses of the late President of Congress in a variety of cases. Two secretaries would be wanting; they must be men of abilities and information; but the committee conceived extra provision would be made for them by the House. If the whole was to be comprehended in one grant to the President, he would rather increase the sum reported by the committee, than diminish it. Originally he was in favor of allowing 16,000; but then he thought the expense of secretaries, carriages, furniture, &c. was to be an additional allowance. Since the House had determined otherwise, he favored an addition to the 20,000 dollars.

Mr. JACKSON was disposed to move 30,000 dollars; but he was willing to accommodate, and agree to 25,000 dollars.

Mr. VINING observed, that the committee had no documents whereby they could form a judgment; they had no light to guide them. They could not foresee what ambassadors and foreign ministers might be sent to this country, nor the expenses the President must necessarily incur upon that account, to support the honor and dignity of the United States. He further remarked, that there are cases in which generosity is the best economy, and no loss is ever sustained by a decent support of the Magistrate. A certain appearance of parade and external dignity is necessary to be supported. Did I, said he, represent a larger State, I would speak with more confidence on the subject. We are haunted by the ghost of poverty; we are stunned with the clamor of complaint throughout the States. But under the auspices of an energetic Government, our funds will be established and augmented, and, I make no doubt, will be found sufficient to answer all the purposes of the Union. But our calculations ought not to be confined to the present moment alone. If it should be contended by any gentleman, that we have it not in our power to support the Government in a proper style, then there is an end of the business. We should remember that the present time is the season for organizing the Government. A patient and mature deliberation is requisite to investigate it, and by that means the amount of the civil list will be increased; in future the sessions will be short, and the load of expense greatly diminished. He was opposed to any reduction of the sum, as he had always thought it too small, and would rather propose to fill the blank with 30,000 dollars.

Mr. PAGE mentioned that 30,000 dollars had been proposed; though he thought the sum adequate, it was not sufficient to support pomp and parade. Those, he said, were entirely out of the question. He had made a calculation upon the probable necessary expenses, and found, that exclusive of that dignity and pageantry talked of, this sum would suffice. If he had contemplated the splendor and pageantry alluded to, he should not have thought of 30,000 dollars, nor 40,000 dollars, for he believed 100,000 dollars insufficient. But if the committee, upon investigation, were convinced that 20,000 dollars would be a compensation for his services, exclusive of an allowance for his expenses, when the whole was taken together, it must at least amount to 30,000 dollars; for this reason, he moved to fill the blank with that sum.

The question upon 30,000 dollars was put, and rejected.

Mr. PAGE then moved 25,000 dollars, which was carried; affirmative 30, negative 17.

The House then proceeded to the second part of the report, viz: "That there be paid in like quarterly payments to the Vice President of the United States, 5,000 dollars per annum."

Mr. WAITE.—I do not like the principle on which this provision is made for the Vice President; there is nothing, I believe, in the Constitution which gives him a right to an annual sum; it fixes no duty upon him as Vice President, requiring a constant attendance. He may be called upon to act as President, and then I would give him the salary of the President; at other times, he is to preside as President of the Senate, then I would pay him for his services in that character. On this principle, I shall move to strike out the clause; if that is agreed to, I propose to offer one, allowing him the pay of President, when he acts as President; and a daily pay during the time he acts as President of the Senate.

Mr. PAGE would second the motion for striking out five thousand dollars, but with a different view from what had been intended by his worthy colleague. He wished it struck out, in order to introduce a larger sum. His idea was, that a proper proportion was not observed between the salary of the First and Second Magistrates. As to the utility of the office, he had nothing to say. He had no hand in forming the Constitution; if he had, perhaps he should never have thought of such an officer; but as we have got him, we must maintain him; and those gentlemen who talk of respectability being attached to high offices, must admit, in a comparative view, that he is not supported with dignity, provided a situation deserves its dignity from the money given him by way of salary; for his part, he thought money, abstractedly considered, could not bestow dignity. Real dignity of character proceeds from a much nobler source; but he apprehended the people of the United States, whose representative the Vice President was, would be displeased to see so great a distinction made between the President and him.

Mr. SENEVIER said, the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WAITE,) did not strike him with any force, nor did he see the impropriety spoken of. One reason why the pay of the members of the Senate and House is per diem is, because they contemplate their being together but a very inconsiderable part of their time; but I suppose, said he, that every gentleman who has considered the subject, has determined in his own mind that the Vice President ought to remain constantly at the seat of Government; he must always be ready to take the reins of Government when they shall fall out of the hands of the President; hence it will be necessary that he should, for this cause, if not for any other, preclude himself from every object of employment, and devote his whole time to prepare himself for the great and important charge for which he is a candidate. Under these circumstances, it is necessary that he should be provided with a constant salary, to support that rank which we contemplate for him to bear; I therefore conceive it must be such a perpetual salary as the President is entitled to receive. If the principles of the motion are inadmissible, it cannot be supported by argument, because very little information can be obtained on which to ground our reasoning.

Mr. SENEVIER said, that, according to the Constitution, a compensation is to be made for services performed. The Vice President may absent himself the whole time. He proposed giving him a handsome allowance while employed, but thought he ought to be paid per diem.

Mr. SHERMAN adverted to the circumstance of salaries being allowed to Lieutenant Governors in the several States where such officers are appointed; so that, according to this mode, the grant made to the Vice President would correspond with the practice of the States individually. It appeared also, he said, to be necessary, inasmuch as this officer would be taken from all other business.

Mr. WAITE.—If I thought, sir, the attendance of the Vice President as necessary as that of the President, I would not hesitate to allow him an annual salary; but I do not conceive it to be so necessary; it is not made so by the Constitution. If he had been appointed Vice President as a perpetual counsel for the President, it would have altered the case; he would then have had services to render, for which we ought to compensate him. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SHERMAN) has intimated that he will be precluded from following any other business; there is nothing in the Constitution which precludes him from following what profession he thinks proper. I am willing to pay him a full and liberal allowance for all the services he renders; but I do not think we are authorized to institute sinecures for any man.

It ought to be considered that the Vice President has personal advantages from the appointment to that office; it holds him up as the successor of the President; the voice of the people is shown to be considerably in his favor; and if he be a deserving person, there will be but little doubt of his succeeding to the Presidential chair; not that I would make this an argument to diminish his compensation. I would pay him amply for all the services he renders, at least as amply as the Government and circumstances of the people will admit. When performing the duties of President, he should receive the salary as such.

The Constitution has stipulated, that the President shall be compensated for his services, that we shall ascertain it by law; but it has not said one syllable with respect to the pay of the Vice President; hence I consider it would be improper to pay him on any other principle than in proportion to his services. If these require five thousand dollars a year, it may be made to amount to that sum, at so much per diem.

As to the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. SHERMAN,) that Lieutenant Governors receive salaries in the several States, and therefore it will be proper to grant one to the Vice President, in order to comport with the practice of the States individually, I shall only remark, that in some States they have no such officer; in others, where they have such an officer, they give him no pay at all; in some, they are paid according to their attendance on business, in the manner that I propose to pay the Vice President. But admitting that every State had an officer of this kind, and that they paid him a salary like that proposed in the report, it would be no argument why the General Government should pursue a practice inconsistent with that economy and sense of propriety which it ought to be the study of the Representatives of the people of the United States to preserve to their constituents.

Mr. MANIXON.—I do not concur, Mr. Speaker, in sentiment, with my colleague on this subject. I conceive, sir, if the Constitution is silent on this point, that it is left to the Legislature to decide according to its nature and its merits. The nature of the office will require that the Vice President shall always be in readiness to render that service which contingencies may require; but I do not apprehend it to be in our power to derive much advantage from any guides furnished by the examples of the several States; because we shall find them differently provided for by the different Governments. If we consider that the Vice President may be taken from the extremity of the continent, and be from the nature of his office obliged to reside at or within the convenient reach of the seat of Government, to take upon him the exercise of the President's functions, in case of any accident that may deprive the Union of the services of their first officer, we must see, I think, it will often happen that he will be obliged to be constantly at the seat of Government. No officer under a State Government can be so far removed as to make it inconvenient to be called upon when his services are required; so that, if he serve without a salary, it may be he can reside at home, and pursue his domestic business; therefore the application in that case does not appear to me to be conclusive.

My colleague says that he will derive advantages from being in the line of appointment to the Presidential Chair. If he is to be considered as the apparent successor of the President, to qualify himself the better for that office, he must withdraw from his other avocations, and direct his attention to the obtaining a perfect knowledge of his intended business.

The idea that a man ought to be paid only in proportion to his services, holds good in some cases, but not in others. It holds good in Legislative business, but not in the Executive or Judicial departments. A judge will be sometimes unemployed, as in the case of the Vice President; yet it is found necessary to claim the whole of his time and attention to the duties for which he is appointed. If the principle of proportioning the allowance to the quantum of services performed obtains, it will be found that the Judiciary will be as dependent on the Legislative authority, as if the Legislature was to declare what shall be their salary for the succeeding year; because, by bridging their services at every session, we could reduce them to such a degree, as to require a very trifling compensation indeed. Neither do I, Mr. Speaker, consider this as a sinecure; but that will appear from the reasons already given. The office of a judge is liable, in some degree, to the same objection; but these kinds of objections are levelled against the institutions themselves. We are to consider his appointment as a part of the Constitution; and if we mean to carry the Constitution into full effect, we ought to make provision for his support, adequate to the merits and nature of the office.

Mr. ALEX said that the Vice President's acceptance of his appointment was a renunciation of every other avocation. When a man is taken from the mass of the people for a particular office, he is entitled to a compensation from the public; during the time in which he is not particularly employed, he is supposed to be engaged in political researches for the benefit of his country.

Every man is eligible, by the Constitution, to be chosen to this office; but if a competent support is not allowed, the choice will be confined to opulent characters. This is an aristocratic idea, and contravenes the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. SENEX.—This, sir, is a subject of a delicate nature, and the discussion of it rather disagreeable; but I think it my duty to declare my sentiments freely upon it. No argument has been adduced to convince me that the Vice President ought to receive an allowance any more than the other members of the Legislature. He cannot be compelled to perform any duty. This is an important subject, and ought to be maturely considered, as a great deal depends on the decision which will now take place.

Mr. BUNKE observed that the situation of our finances was so much embarrassed, as to disempower us from giving such simple salaries as we might, under different circumstances, think necessary; that it was but reasonable the Vice President should receive a compensation adequate to the second officer in the Government. He will be subject to extra expenses by living at the seat of Government, and will be obliged to maintain his dignity. Mr. B. further suggested that the sum might not be fully sufficient, but in our present situation, it was as much as we could afford.

Mr. AMES, in his reply to Mr. SENEX's observations, pointed out the difference of the situation of the Vice President and the members of the Legislature.

Mr. SEPOTWICK made some additional remarks of a similar nature, and further observed, it would be necessary that the members of the House should return and associate with their constituents, in order to learn their sentiments and their feelings, and witness their situation and wants, that they may consequently resume their former occupations: but with respect to the Vice President, his acceptance must be considered as an abandonment of every other pursuit; he must reside at the seat of Government, and will necessarily incur extra expenses in consequence of his office.

Mr. STONE.—I am for giving such salaries to the officers of this Government, as will render them easy in their situation. But we are confined by the Constitution; salaries are to be given for services performed; they are considered in no other light. The Vice President cannot be viewed in any other light than that of the President of the Senate. I am for his being paid per diem, but would allow him a generous support. I do not think five thousand dollars are sufficient; I would allow him a larger sum, which allowance, per diem, would amount to what would be fully adequate.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that by the Constitution, the Vice President could not be considered as a Senator, and therefore could not, with any propriety, be paid as such. Considering him as an officer in the Government, next in dignity to the President, and particularly designated by the Constitution, he must support a correspondent dignity in his style of living, and consequently ought to have a competent allowance for that purpose. He did not think five thousand dollars would be considered too much, and would vote for that sum. The idea of a daily allowance must be given up, as inapplicable to the situation assigned him by the Constitution. He is there recognised as Vice President, and as such ought to be provided for. A daily pay of twenty-five or thirty dollars would appear a large compensation; yet Congress sat but one hundred days, which, in all probability, would be the length of their future sessions, it would be insufficient for his support. But suppose it one hundred and fifty days; this, at thirty dollars per day, would come so near the proposed salary, that the saving would be an inconsiderable trifle; but if the session was longer, it might amount to more than is contemplated by any gentleman.

Mr. PAGE was clearly for making the allowance by annual salary, because the office was permanent; a daily allowance could not be relied upon, because if the Senate sat but a few days, it would be incompetent, even at one hundred dollars per day; whereas, if the session was of long continuance, that sum would be more than the services could require, if they are to hold a comparison with those of the President. If the House agreed to strike out the five thousand dollars, he would propose eight thousand, which was not one-third of what was given to the President.

Mr. BOUTWORTH.—The question seems to turn merely on this point, whether the Vice President shall receive a per diem allowance, or an annual salary? The Constitution ought to serve as the ground on which to determine it; therefore we are to consider the point of view in which this office is placed by that instrument. The second article calls him into view with the President; he is to be elected in the same manner as the President, in order to obtain the second best character in the Union to fill the place of the first, in case it should be vacated by any unforeseen accident. The Constitution considers him a respectable officer; he is to supersede the President, when it shall happen that the First Magistrate dies, or is removed on impeachment and conviction. These are the great objects of his appointment. His duty as President of the Senate is only collateral; consequently he ought to be respected, and provided for according to the dignity and importance of his principal character. If still inferior duties were attached to him, it would be an argument for reducing the compensation to an equality with inferior duties only? I apprehend it is a principle of this nature which urges gentlemen on to press the amendment. I cannot see any reason for differing with the Constitution on a point in which I think it ought to guide our decision.

I think there is an affinity between the duration of the office and the compensation. The Constitution establishes the office for four years; the compensation ought to be made commensurate with that idea.

The question on Mr. WHITTE's motion was taken and lost, as was Mr. PAGE's motion for striking out 5,000 and inserting 8,000 dollars.

The proposition being then agreed to,

The House proceeded to consider the following: That the daily pay of the members of the Senate, and House of Representatives, for their attendance at the time appointed for the meeting of their respective Houses, and for the time they shall be going to, and returning therefrom, allowing the travel of twenty miles for each day, be six dollars, and of the Speaker of the House of Representatives twelve dollars.

Mr. SEPOTWICK moved to amend this proposition, so as to give to the members of the Senate six dollars per day, and five to the members of the House of Representatives. His reasons for introducing this distinction was, that the convention had made it in the Constitution. The Senators are required to be of an advanced age, and are elected for six years. Now this term taken out of the life of a man, passed the middle age, may be fairly deemed equal to a whole life; for it was to be expected that few, if any, of the Senators could return to their former occupations, when the period for retirement arrived; indeed, after six years spent in other pursuits, it may be questioned whether a man would be qualified to return with any prospect of success.

He did not say six dollars was more than a compensation for their services and expenses; but as economy ought to be particularly studied by the Legislature, he had moved to reduce it. He hoped gentlemen would pay some deference to the public opinion, on the present occasion; this he thought to be in favor of small salaries. Not but a different sentiment might prevail in some of the States; perhaps different circumstances might warrant the difference of opinion. It was probable that five dollars, laid out in that part of the Union from which he came, would be more advanced lagnous to the person, than a like sum laid out at the other extremity of the continent; but he believed, nevertheless, that something would be left to those gentlemen, out of the five dollars per day, after their expenses were paid; but even if a little self-denial was the consequence of this reduction, it would do but little harm; whereas the precedent might have a salutary influence upon the future administration of the Government.

Mr. JACKSON.—I am opposed to this discrimination, because all have alike abandoned their particular pursuits in life, and all have equally engaged in the service of their common country. On what principle can this distinction then be contended for? Is it expected that a Senator shall eat more, or drink more costly liquors than a member of the House of Representatives? I presume it is not; their expenses must be nearly equal. I can see but one reason that can be assigned for this difference, which is, that the Senate may sit longer than the House; but considering they are to receive pay accordingly, this reason is of no weight. The duties of both Houses are equal, and the pay ought to be alike.

I will submit to the gentleman who brought this motion forward, whether it is not much worse to the personal interest of men in business to be taken off in the prime of life, than after the successful pursuit of some profession at an advanced age, when the natural and proper time of retirement arrives; and if so, his argument falls to the ground. But if the reverse is true, it will not support his motion, because, if we look around, our senses will inform us that this House contains as venerable and aged members as any within the walls of the Senate; thus again we are upon a footing. Now, unless gentlemen mean that we should depress ourselves, and thereby set the Senate above us, I cannot conceive what foundation there will be for the motion for discrimination.

Mr. LEE.—I am in favor of the motion for discrimination between the Senate and this House, because the Constitution has done it in a variety of modes. The qualifications are superior; a Senator must be a man advanced in life, and have been nine years a citizen of the United States; while a younger man, who has been but seven years a citizen, may obtain a seat in this House.

The Constitution has made a difference in the mode of election. The Senators are selected with peculiar care; they are the purified choice of the people, and the best men are likely to be preferred by such a choice; those who have shown the fullest proofs of their attachment to the public interest, and evinced to their countrymen their superior abilities. In order to bring forth such characters to partake of our public councils, I think every motive of honor and of interest ought to be called into action. If men are not brought forth who will maintain their own dignity, and promote the public interest by a firm and independent conduct, regardless of the voice of calumny and popular clamor, our Government will soon lose its importance and its energy. I contemplate, Mr. Speaker, the Senate as a barrier between the Executive and this branch of the Legislature, shielding the people from any apprehension of being attacked by an aspiring Magistrate on the one hand, and on the other from being desolated by the anarchy often generated by a time-servingness to veering popularity. We shall gain these desirable objects at a trifling price if we make a distinction of two or three dollars per day—a trifling allowance indeed to our most worthy sages. But, said the gentleman last up, there are as young men in the Senate as in this House; although there be, the time will come when none but the most venerable and respectable of our citizens, men whose hoary heads are silvered over with the honors of an experienced old age, men illustrious by their virtues and capacity, will have the public confidence ensured to them by the purity and notoriety of their principles.

Now is the time to deliberate and view every future circumstance which may arise from our decision; the importance of this principle hereafter, is infinitely above every advantage which the present members may derive from it. By it alone you may secure dignity and permanency to the Government, and happiness under its administration.

It is with difficulty, Mr. Speaker, that you can draw forth men of age and much experience to participate in the political concerns of their country. Retirement and reflection are incident to that period of life; they are sought for, and, when obtained, they are highly prized. The wise and virtuous sage, who, from the monitions of nature has discovered that his remaining years will be but few, must be incited by every motive that can operate on the human heart to continue those labors which he seeks to bury the remembrance of in the depths of solitude. Honor may stimulate the ingenuous mind; but interest is a great reason of action, and may be usefully employed to influence old age.

What I have now urged is in favor of the Constitutional distinction; I approve of the amendment, but I wish the sum had been left out, that the provision might be determined according to the sense of the House, and not affect the principal question of discrimination. I am satisfied, sir, that there is no heart within these walls but beats with patriotic ardor, and has determined to pursue the noblest object, the public good. Nothing but the anxiety I feel for this, as connected with the present question, could have induced me to trouble the House with a repetition of what was dilated upon, on a former occasion. Let it then be considered, that on our decision depends the dignity of the Legislature, and the perpetuity of that Government, the glory and the hopes of the people of America, which, if now disappointed, must be succeeded by confusion and gloomy despair.

Mr. WHITE.—I object, sir, to a discrimination. I cannot perceive that difference in the Constitution alluded to by the gentlemen. Among the Senators and the people in some of the ancient commonwealths, an artificial and political distinction was established, which was the case at Rome, in particular. There the Senators were considered as possessing some degree of divinity, and the rest of the people were not admitted to associate with them. Can it be supposed that the name of Senators will render those members superior to their fellow-citizens? I cannot see any difference in the general estimation between a Senator and a Representative, however great their sentiments may vary in their respective States; and cannot conceive why any discrimination should be made in their allowances.

The independence of the members of this House may be injured by such a distinction; and the Senate, at some future day, may have it in their power to carry points, and be enabled to prolong the session, when it may be of great inconvenience to the House.

Mr. MADISON was of opinion that a discrimination was necessary; he observed that it had been evidently contemplated by the Constitution, to distinguish in favor of the Senate, that men of abilities and firm principles, whom the love and custom of a retired life might render averse to the fatigues of a public one, may be induced to devote the experience of years, and the acquisitions of study, to the service of their country. And unless something of this kind is adopted, it may be difficult to obtain proper characters to fill the Senate, as men of enterprise and genius will naturally prefer a seat in the House, considering it to be a more conspicuous situation.

Mr. MOORE did not see the propriety of the discrimination proposed; the business of each House is equal, or if there is a difference in their legislative concerns, it is in favor of the House. He had no idea of giving the public money for such an idle purpose as the support of a fanciful dignity and superiority. His idea of the business was, each member ought to be compensated for his services and nothing further.

Mr. VINING.—The arguments brought forward by my honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. LEE,) have not proved satisfactory to my mind, that his favorite opinion with respect to discrimination is right. He has told us that the sages of America will be selected, and placed in this distinguished situation. True, sir, I expect venerable and respectable characters will find their way into every branch of the Government; but when I consider the mode in which the Senate is elected, I apprehend we may have there men whose wealth has created them the influence necessary to get in. If any thing is to be expected by this refined choice, it is that men of rank and opulence will draw the regard of the small and select circle of a State Legislature; while the Representatives in this House, being the choice of their fellow-citizens, among whom rank and dignity is rather unpopular, will consist of men in middling circumstances. Now if any thing is to be drawn from arguments like these, it is in favor of this House. But the whole of this is a subject on which we are better able to decide from our feelings, than from our discussions.

I am against the motion for another reason, sir; it goes to reduce the compensation, which I think is already set too low, to furnish good security for the happy administration of the Government. In considering this subject, there are two important objects necessary to engage the attention of the Legislature. First, that the compensation be not made an object for indigence to pursue; and second, that it be not so low as to throw the business of legislation into the hands of rich and aspiring nabobs, but such as to compensate a man in the middle grade of life. These are generally men of business, who are fittest to conduct the concerns of their fellow-citizens. Now, in compensating this class of men, (for I would have the compensation proportioned to this class,) I do not take into consideration the sacrifices they make, by dedicating their time and abilities to the service of their country; but I confine myself merely to a compensation for their time and services. If the compensation is made an object for indigence, we shall have the sessions protracted to an extreme length, and the expense will be increased; if we make the reward barely commensurate with the services, you will have men of abilities, who will despise the public business, and return to their private pursuits. If the business is done without pay, it may be productive of the most enormous evils. Were every member of the British House of Commons allowed a thousand guineas a year, they would be less venal; we should not find them purchasing their seats, and selling their votes for places and pensions. The very money given in this way would furnish a handsome compensation for every member, and add something considerable, annually, to their sinking fund.

I apprehend, in establishing a compensation, we shall put it in the power of gentlemen, while here, to live as independent as they can at home. Perhaps I hazard a conjecture, when I say there is not a gentleman on this floor, I am certain there are not many, but have found, from experience, that six dollars per day is adequate to that object; certainly it cannot be the wish of any man to make the public service unpleasant, by rendering the situation of the members of Congress less eligible than a solitary retirement from patriotic pursuits would be. Any man who lives decently, will find six dollars a day not more than sufficient to defray the expense of a casual residence in a splendid city.

The experiment has been made. If a gentleman keeps a servant and his horses, and means to reciprocate the civilities he receives, I again assert the compensation is inadequate. It is true, we may live for two dollars a day; but how? There is a dignity attached to the situation of a Representative, with respect to his country; and the compensation might be 7 or 8 dollars per day, without granting the members more than a bare compensation. From all these considerations, I am induced to hope that gentlemen will indulge a little, and rather support an increase, than a diminution of pay.

As to the discrimination, it has been once decided against by a considerable majority; I have no doubt but it will now meet a similar fate; avocation; their attention will be wholly taken but be the decision of the House what it may, with respect to the quantum, or manner of compensation, I shall never fear to deliver my sentiments. On the present occasion, I wish them known to my constituents, and I am much mistaken if they are not coincident with their own.

Mr. SENEY.—I am sorry, sir, that the question of discrimination has been brought before the House. Can any reason be assigned for making this distinction? Are the services of the Senate of more importance than those of the Representatives? I think not. Gentlemen have brought forward the Constitution upon this occasion, but I conceive it to be opposite to the very principle they mean to advocate. This will destroy the independence of the several branches, which is to be strictly observed. If a discrimination should be established in favor of the Senate, will it not naturally tend to create a sense of inferiority in the minds of the Representatives? And the time may come when they may find it their interest to become subservient to the views of the Senate. I feel so sensibly, sir, the impropriety and unconstitutionality of this measure, that had I the most distant idea it would comport with the sentiments of a majority of the members of this House, I should call for the yeas and nays on a division of the House upon the question. But as I do not conceive that to be the case, I shall waive the proposition for the present.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that whenever he had a motion to make before the House, he endeavored to satisfy himself of the reasonableness and propriety of it. If he thought it proper, he did not consider the mode of decision that might be adopted of any material consequence; but in determining the present question, he hoped the yeas and nays would not be called. There is a principle in mankind which revolts at the idea of inferiority: a proposition, for example, shall be made, that has for its object the establishment of a superiority (howsoever necessary;) that principle is alarmed and excited to opposition; to discuss such a question as the present, we ought to be divested of every partiality and prejudice, that might bias our judgment in deciding an affair that will not bear the test of reason and experience. I conceive the precedence of the Senate has been clearly pointed out by the Constitution. There are grades in society which are necessary to their very existence. This is a self-evident proposition; it is recognised by every civilized nation, and by the House in the report before us. For what reason have we made a difference between the President and Vice President? Is it not on account of his superior station and his dignity? And between the Vice President and the Senate? This distinction is likewise established by the Constitution in the difference of the terms for which the members of the Senate and those of the House of Representatives are chosen. The time for which the Senate is chosen, demonstrates the propriety of a difference being made in the pay they ought to receive; the duties of their office require they should renounce every other avocation; their attention will be wholly taken up in the discharge of public business; therefore they should have an adequate and an independent allowance. The generality of the members, being so far advanced in years, will drop every idea of engaging any more in their several professions, after having once engaged in the service of their country. Their age, wisdom, and experience, all warrant this discrimination. He concluded by saying, that the real dignity of the House was, he thought, so far from being diminished by adopting the proposition, that he conceived it was essentially connected with it.

Mr. STONER thought the House ought not to assist in elevating one branch of the Government more above the other than the Constitution had done. This had given influence to the Senate by a negative in the cases of treaties and appointments. It had given importance to the House, by vesting them with the sole power of originating money bills. But both these powers could be exercised without a discrimination being made in the pay of the members; therefore he inferred that it was not contemplated by the Constitution to make any such distinction.

A discrimination may eventually operate to the public injury; the House of Representatives may be desirous of terminating the session, but the Senate, finding the compensation they receive quite agreeable, may be inclined to protract it. He thought the true way of deciding on this subject, was to make the same allowance to both, and let it be such as not to induce them to protract the session on the one hand, or have a tendency to hurry over the business on the other.

Mr. JACKSON said, in reply to the inquiry of Mr. SEDGWICK—"Why have we made a difference between the President and the Vice President?" that the whole of the President's time would be taken up in the duties of his station; that the Vice President may retire to his farm whenever he thought proper. We refer, said he, to the wisdom of the Senate; but how is this superior wisdom to be discerned? If on this account a distinction is to be made, it necessarily follows that a difference should be made between the members of this House and those of the Senate. We cannot be too cautious how we establish an undue pre-eminence, and give an influence and importance to one branch of the Legislature over the other. All Governments incline to despotism, as naturally as rivers run into the sea. Despotism makes its way gradually, by slow and imperceptible steps; despotism is never established all at once; we shall, ere we are aware, get beyond the gulf, and then we shall be astonished how we reached there. The services of the Senate are not more arduous than ours: their proper business is legislation, and I will never consent to any discrimination. If I imagined the question would be determined in favor of discrimination, I would call the yeas and nays, and should it be determined in favor of it, I will still call them on purpose that my constituents may see that I have voted against a measure which I look upon as injurious to the Government.

Mr. PAGE.—If he thought the discrimination proposed would have the tendency which some gentlemen apprehended, he would be the last man on the floor to support it. He would be as careful as any man how he extended the influence of any part of the Government, or gave it the least inclination towards aristocracy. But he apprehended gentlemen were deceived in their principle—he did not believe the doctrine that money confers importance, and he wished to evince to the world that money, under this Government, would have no such effect. The Senate having more duties to perform, may require a larger pecuniary gratification; but this will not add to their importance. It will require something of this kind to stimulate gentlemen to undertake the service; for his part he might consent to come here for two years, in order to assist in public business, but no inducement, hardly, could engage him to undertake it for six years. On this consideration, he thought the Senate ought to have annual salaries, and to such an amount as would render their situation independent and eligible.

If gentlemen are afraid of an aristocracy, they ought to be careful not to make the compensation too low, so as to exclude men of middling fortunes; the men of rank and distinguished opulence might serve without any pecuniary compensation; but the Government would not be safe if it was exclusively in such hands. He wished to discriminate in favor of the Senate, but he would rather increase their pay to eight dollars than reduce that of the members of this House, while he considered it but a moderate compensation.

The question on Mr. SEDGWICK's motion was taken, and lost by a considerable majority.

The House having now gone through the report, it was—Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant thereto, and that Messrs. BURKE, STONE, and MOORE, be a committee to prepare and bring in the same, with instructions to insert a clause or clauses making provision for a reasonable compensation to the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively, for their services.

After which the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, July 17.

A petition from Leonard Harbaugh was presented to the House, and read, praying that an exclusive privilege may be granted him for a term of years, to make, use, and vend three machines, which he has invented for threshing and reaping grain, and for deepening docks, and which are calculated to facilitate labor, and aid the two great objects of agriculture and commerce.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Ebenezer Hazard, Postmaster General of the United States, submitting the propriety of some immediate provision, by law, for the ar- rangement of that department, which was read, and ordered to be referred to Messrs. BOUNDINOT, GOUGH, and LEE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A bill for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

A bill to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the bill for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, and for authorizing the several States to provide and regulate pilots; and after some time spent therein—

The Chairman reported that the committee had had, according to order, the said bill under consideration, and gone through the same, and made several amendments thereto, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, July 20.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed the bill for establishing an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the House; that they have also passed a bill to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills, providing for the establishment of hospitals for sick and disabled seamen, and for the regulation of harbors; and that Messrs. SMITH, (of South Carolina,) CLYMER, and CARROLL, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resumed the consideration of the report on the petition of Andrew Ellicott, which lay on the table.

Whereupon, Ordered, That the said report be recommitted to the same committee.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for establishing an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs," and, the same being read, were agreed to.

The bill sent from the Senate, "to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the bill to provide for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, Mr. BOUNDINOT in the Chair; And, after some time being spent in considering the same, the committee rose and reported that they had, according to order, had the said bill under consideration, and gone through the same.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

TUESDAY, July 21.

An engrossed bill to provide for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, was read the third time and passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MADISON begged the House to indulge him in the further consideration of amendments to the Constitution, and as there appeared, in some degree, a moment of leisure, he would move to go into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, conformably to the order of the 8th of last month.

Mr. AMES hoped that the House would be induced, on mature reflection, to rescind their vote of going into a committee on the business, and refer it to a select committee. It would certainly tend to facilitate the business. If they had the subject at large before a Committee of the Whole, he could not see where the business was likely to end. The amendments proposed were so various, that their discussion must inevitably occupy many days, and that at a time when they can be ill spared; whereas a select committee could go through and cull out those of the most material kind, without interrupting the principal business of the House. He therefore moved, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged, and the subject referred to a select committee.

Mr. SEDGWICK opposed the motion, for the reasons given by his colleague, observing that the members from the several States proposing amendments would, no doubt, drag the House through the consideration of every one, whatever their fate might be after they were discussed; now gentlemen had only to reflect on this, and conceive the length of time the business would take up, if managed in this way.

Mr. WHITE thought no time would be saved by appointing a select committee. Every member would like to be satisfied with the reasons upon which the amendments offered by the select committee are grounded; consequently the train of argument which gentlemen have in contemplation to avoid, must be brought forward.

He did not presume to say the Constitution was perfect, but it was such as had met with the approbation of wise and good men in the different States. Some of the proposed amendments were also of high value; but he did not expect they would be supported by two-thirds of both Houses, without undergoing a thorough investigation. He did not like to refer any business to a select committee, until the sense of the House had been expressed upon it, because it rather tended to retard than despatch it; witness the Collection bill, which had cost them much time, but after all had to be deserted.

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN.—The provision for amendments made in the fifth article of the Constitution, was intended to facilitate the adoption of those which experience should point out to be necessary. This Constitution has been adopted by eleven States; a majority of those eleven have received it without expressing a wish for amendments; now, is it probable that three-fourths of the eleven States will agree to amendments offered on mere speculative points, when the Constitution has had no kind of trial whatever? It is hardly to be expected that they will. Consequently we shall lose our labor, and had better decline having any thing further to do with it for the present.

But if the House are to go into a consideration, it had better be done in such a way as not to interfere much with the organization of the Government.

Mr. PAGE hoped the business would proceed as heretofore directed. He thought it would be very agreeable to the majority of the Union, he knew it would be to his constituents, to find that the Government meant to give every security to the rights and liberties of the people, and to examine carefully into the grounds of the apprehensions expressed by several of the State conventions; he thought they would be satisfied with the amendments brought forward by his colleague when the subject was last before the House.

Mr. PARTRIDGE knew the subject must be taken up in some way or other, and preferred, for the sake of expedition, doing it by a select committee.

Mr. JACKSON was sorry to see the House was to be troubled any further on the subject; he looked upon it as a mere waste of time; but as he always chose the least of two evils, he acquiesced in the motion for referring it to a special committee.

Mr. GERRY asked, whether the House had cognizance of the amendments proposed by the State conventions? If they had not, he would make a motion to bring them forward.

Mr. PAGE replied, that such motion would be out of order, until the present question was determined.

A desultory conversation ensued, and it was questioned whether the subject generally was to be before the Committee of the Whole, or those specific propositions only which had already been introduced.

Mr. GERRY said, that it was a matter of indifference how this question was understood, because no gentleman could pretend to deny another the privilege of bringing forward propositions conformably to his sentiments. If gentlemen, then, might bring forward resolutions to be added, or motions of amendment, there would be no time saved by referring the subject to a special committee. But such procedure might tend to prejudice the House against an amendment neglected by the committee, and thereby induce them not to show that attention to the State which proposed it that would be delicate and proper.

He wished gentlemen to consider the situation of the States; seven out of thirteen had thought the Constitution very defective, yet five of them have adopted it with a perfect reliance on Congress for its improvement. Now, what will these States feel if the subject is discussed in a select committee, and their recommendations totally neglected? The indecency of treating the application of five States in a manner different from other important subjects, will give no small occasion for disgust, which is a circumstance that this Government ought carefully to avoid. If, then, the House could gain nothing by this manner of proceeding, he hoped they would not hesitate to adhere to their former vote for going into a Committee of the Whole. That they would gain nothing was pretty certain, for gentlemen must necessarily come forward with their amendments to the report when it was brought in. The members from Massachusetts were particularly instructed to press the amendments recommended by the convention of that State at all times, until they had been maturely considered by Congress; the same duties were made incumbent on the members from some other States; consequently, any attempt to smother the business, or prevent a full investigation, must be nugatory, while the House paid a proper deference to their own rules and orders. He did not contend for going into a Committee of the Whole at the present moment; he would prefer a time of greater leisure than the present, for the business of organizing the Government.

Mr. ALEX declared to the House, that he was no enemy to the consideration of amendments; but he had moved to rescind their former vote in order to save time, which he was confident would be the consequence of referring it to a select committee.

He was sorry to hear an intention avowed by his colleague, of considering every part of the frame of this Constitution. It was the same as forming themselves into a convention of the United States. He did not stand for words, the thing would be the same in fact. He could not but express a degree of anxiety at seeing the system of Government encounter another ordeal, when it ought to be extending itself to furnish security to others. He apprehended, if the zeal of some gentlemen broke out on this occasion, that there would be no limits to the time necessary to discuss the subject; he was certain the session would not be long enough; perhaps they might be bounded by the period of their appointment, but he questioned it.

When gentlemen suppose themselves called upon to vent their ardor in some favorite pursuit, in securing to themselves and their posterity the inestimable rights and liberties they have just snatched from the hand of despotism, they are apt to carry their exertions to an extreme; but he hoped the subject itself would be limited; not that he objected to the consideration of the amendments proposed, indeed he should move himself for the consideration, by the committee, of those recommended by Massachusetts, if his colleagues omitted to do it; but he hoped gentlemen would not think of bringing in new amendments, such as were not recommended, but went to tear the frame of Government into pieces.

He had considered a select committee much better calculated to consider and arrange a complex business than a Committee of the Whole; he thought they were like the senses to the soul, and, on an occasion like the present, could be made equally useful.

If he recollected rightly the decision made by the House on the 8th of June, it was that certain specific amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole; not that the subject generally be referred, and that amendments be made in the committee that were not contemplated before. This public discussion would be like a dissection of the Constitution; it would be defacing its symmetry, laying bare its sinews and tendons, ripping up the whole form, and tearing out its vitals; but is it presumable that such conduct would be attended with success? Two-thirds of both Houses must agree in all these operations before they can have effect. His opposition to going into a Committee of the Whole did not arise from any fear that the Constitution would suffer by a fair discussion in this or any other House; but while such business was going on, the Government was laid prostrate, and every artery ceased to beat. The unfair advantages that might be taken in such a situation, were easier apprehended than resisted. Wherefore, he wished to avoid the danger by a more prudent line of conduct.

Mr. TUCKER would not say whether the discussion alluded to by the gentleman last up would do good or harm, but he was certain it ought to take place no where but in a Committee of the Whole; the subject is of too much importance for a select committee. Now, suppose such a committee to be appointed, and that the amendments proposed by the several States, together with those brought forward by the gentleman from Virginia, are referred to them: after some consideration they report, but not one of the amendments proposed by either State; what is the inference? They have considered them, and as they were better capable than the House of considering them, the House ought to reject every proposition coming from the State conventions. Will this give satisfaction to the States who have required amendments? Very far from it. They will expect that their propositions would be fully brought before the House, and regularly and fully considered; if indeed then they are rejected, it may be some satisfaction to them, to know that their applications have been treated with respect.

What I have said with respect to the propositions of the several States, may apply in some degree to the propositions brought forward by the gentleman (Mr. Madison) from Virginia; the select committee may single out one or two, and reject the remainder, notwithstanding the vote of the House for considering them. The gentleman would have a right to complain, and every State would be justly disgusted.

Will it tend to reconcile the Government to that great body of the people who are dissatisfied, who think themselves and all they hold most dear unsafe under it, without certain amendments are made? Will it answer any one good purpose to slur over this business, and reject the propositions without giving them a fair chance of a full discussion? I think not, Mr. Speaker. Both the Senate and this House ought to treat the present subject with delicacy and impartiality.

The select committee will have it in their power so to keep this business back, that it may never again come before this House; this is an imprudent step for us to take; not that I would insinuate it is an event likely to take place, or which any gentleman has in contemplation. I give every gentleman credit for his declaration, and believe the honorable member means to save time by this arrangement; but do not let us differ on this point. I would rather the business should lie over for a month, nay, for a whole session, than have it put into other hands, and passed over without investigation.

Mr. GERRY inquired of his colleague, how it was possible that the House could be a federal convention without the Senate, and when two-thirds of both Houses are to agree to the amendments? He would also be glad to find out how a committee was the same to the House as the senses to the soul? What, said he, can we neither see, hear, smell, nor feel, without we employ a committee for the purpose? My colleague further tells us, that if we proceed in this way, we shall lay bare the sinews and tendons of the Constitution; that we shall butcher it, and put it to death. Now, what does this argument tend to prove? Why, sir, to my mind, nothing more nor less than this, that we ought to adopt the report of the committee, whatever the report may be; for we are to judge by the knowledge derived through our senses, and not to proceed on to commit murder. If these are the arguments to induce the House to refer the subject to a select committee, they are arguments to engage to go further, and give into the hands of select committees the whole Legislative power. But what was said respecting a public discussion? Are gentlemen afraid to meet the public ear on this topic? Do they wish to shut the gallery doors? Perhaps nothing would be attended with more dangerous consequences. No, sir, let us not be afraid of full and public investigation. Let our means, like our conclusions, be justified; let our constituents see, hear, and judge for themselves.

The question on discharging the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from proceeding on the subject of amendments, as referred to them, was put, and carried in the affirmative—the House divided, 34 for it, and 19 against it.

It was then ordered that Mr. Madison's motion, stating certain specific amendments, proper to be proposed by Congress to the Legislatures of the States, to become, if ratified by three-fourths thereof, part of the Constitution of the United States, together with the amendments to the said Constitution, as proposed by the several States, be referred to a committee, to consist of a member from each State, with instruction to take the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States generally into their consideration, and to report thereupon to the House.

The committee appointed were, Messrs. VINING, MADISON, BALDWIN, SHERMAN, BURKE, GILMAN, CLYMER, BENSON, GOODHUE, BOUDINOT, and GALE.

Then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, July 22.

Mr. BURKE, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States; which was received, and read the first time.

Ordered, That it be an instruction to the committee appointed to bring in a bill for making a compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, that they do insert a clause or clauses, making compensation to the Sergeant-at-Arms, Messengers, and Doorkeepers of the two Houses, for their services.

A petition was presented from Hannah Adams, praying that an exclusive privilege may be granted her, for a limited time, to publish and vend a work which she has compiled, entitled "An Alphabetical Compendium of the various religious sects which have appeared in the world from the Christian era to the present day, with an appendix, containing a brief account of the different schemes of religion now embraced among mankind."

Ordered, That the petition do lie on the table. The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and, after some time spent therein, the committee rose, and reported that they had gone through the same, and made no amendment thereto.

On motion, Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from further proceedings on the said bill, and that it be recommitted to Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. STURGES, and Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina.

WESTERN LANDS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair; and, after some time spent therein, the committee rose, and reported that they had had the state of the Union under consideration, and came to a resolution thereupon, which was read and then delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That an act of Congress ought to pass for establishing a Land Office, and for regulating the terms and manner of granting vacant and unappropriated lands, the property of the United States; that the said office be under the superintendence of the Governor of the Western territory; that the land to be disposed of be confined to the following limits, viz:

That the tracts or parcels to be disposed of to any one person, shall not exceed — acres; that the price to be required for the same shall be — per acre; and that every person actually settled within the said limits shall be entitled to the pre-emption of a quantity not exceeding — acres, including his settlement.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SYLVESTER, and Mr. MOORE, do prepare and bring in the same.

THURSDAY, July 23.

A bill for allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States was read the second time and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion, Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine into the measures taken by Congress and the State of Virginia respecting the lands reserved for the use of the officers and soldiers of said State, on Continental and State establishments, in the cession made by the said State to the United States, of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, and to report the same to this House, and that Mr. WHITE, Mr. PETER MCHENRY, and Mr. SENEY, be of the said committee.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. VINING, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Boudinot in the Chair.

Mr. VINING introduced a resolution for the adoption of the committee, by which it is declared: That an Executive department ought to be established, and to be denominated the Home Department; the head of which to be called the Secretary of the United States for the Home Department; whose duty it shall be to correspond with the several States, and to see to the execution of the laws of the Union; to keep the great seal, and affix the same to all public papers, when it is necessary; to keep the lesser seal, and to affix it to commissions, &c.; to make out commissions, and enregister the same; to keep authentic copies of all public acts, &c.; and transmit the same to the several States; to procure the acts of the several States, and report on the same when contrary to the laws of the United States; to take into his custody the archives of the late Congress; to report to the President plans for the protection and improvement of manufactures, agriculture, and commerce; to obtain a geographical account of the several States, their rivers, towns, roads, &c.; to report what post roads shall be established; to receive and record the census; to receive reports respecting the Western territory; to receive the models and specimens presented by inventors and authors; to enter all books for which patents are granted; to issue patents, &c.; and, in general, to do and attend to all such matters and things as he may be directed to do by the President.

JULY, 1789.]

Home Department.

[H. or R.]

Mr. BENSON objected to some of the duties mentioned in the resolution. He thought the less the Government corresponded with particular States the better, and there could be no necessity for an officer to see to the execution of the laws of the United States, when there was a Judiciary instituted with adequate powers.

Mr. WHITE was not convinced that there was a necessity for establishing a separate department for all or any of the duties contained in the resolution. The correspondence with the States belonged to the Executive. To see to the execution of the laws was the duty of the Judiciary. The great seal might be kept by the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; the lesser seal might be deposited in the same hands. Commissions might be made out by the departments to which the officer is connected. The Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House might transmit the public acts, and keep records thereof. What have Congress to do with the acts of States? If they interfere with the Constitutional powers of the Government, the Judges will prevent their operation. The papers of the late Congress may be distributed among the offices to which they relate; the rest may be deposited with the officers of Congress. The want of the reports on manufactures, agriculture, and commerce, may be supplied by Congress. The post roads may be left to the Postmaster General. The census must be returned to Congress, and they will preserve it among their files. And it can hardly be thought necessary to establish a great department for the purpose of receiving the models, specimens, and books, presented by authors and inventors. If none of these things are requisite to be done by a great department, why should the United States incur the expense which such an arrangement must necessarily draw along with it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON thought the Secretary of Foreign Affairs was not so much overcharged with business but that he might attend to the major part of the duties mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. VINING said he had waited until the great Executive departments were established; but none of those had embraced the duties contained in his proposition, which he conceived to be of great importance; many of the duties were as essential as those of any other department, except the Treasury. As for their belonging to the Executive, as was said by the gentleman from Virginia, he admitted it; but they were, nevertheless, as proper to be put into the hands of a principal officer under the President, as the War office, or office of Foreign Affairs; the duties of these were specially within the Executive Department of the Government. He conceived that the President ought to be relieved from the inferior duties of his station, by officers assigned to attend to them, under his inspection; he could then, with a mind free and unembarrassed with the minutiae of business, attend to the operations of the whole machine.

If the office was admitted to be necessary, and he was certain the performance of the duties were useful and essential, the expense could be no solid objection, because the information it would furnish would more than counterbalance that article.

The question he conceived to be reduced to this, whether a confidential officer would not be more useful than any other, and whether the duties could be distributed among the officers already instituted. For his part he conceived most of them foreign to either of those officers; and that they could not be performed with advantage any other way than by an officer appointed specially for the purpose. He thought every gentleman would admit that the duties were important, and he assured them that his only reason for bringing the motion forward was, to provide for the public good. He had no personal motives in pressing it; he disclaimed every idea of serving any particular man by the arrangement, and rested it solely upon its merits.

Mr. SAGWICK believed the honorable gentleman in his assertions, that he had no personal motive in pressing this business. He believed that he thought it essential, and if his sentiments were the same, he would join the gentleman in supporting the motion; but, after duly considering the subject, he was inclined to believe that the office was unnecessary, and that it would be squandering the public money, at a time when the greatest economy is requisite. He thought the principal part of the duties might be assigned to the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; and he would, if the committee negatived the present motion, introduce another for that purpose.

Mr. GEARY thought the burdens of the people would be sufficiently great in providing the supplies absolutely necessary for the support of the Government; therefore it would be improper to add expenses which might possibly be avoided. The people are viewing the proceedings of Congress with an attentive solicitude, and if they observe that we erect offices for which there is no apparent necessity, they will be apt to think we are providing sinecures for men whom we favor; they will reluctantly pay what is extracted from their earnings to a Government which they think is regardless of economy. They will suspect a further view in the change of Government. They will suppose that we contemplate the establishment of a monarchy, by raising round the Executive a phalanx of such men as must be inclined to favor those of whom they hold their places.

Mr. VINING.—Why do gentlemen say that such an office is unnecessary, when they are forced to admit that all the duties are essential? Or how can they say it is more expensive to establish it in this way than in another? Suppose these duties distributed in the manner which some gentlemen have mentioned, is it not fairly to be presumed that the departments to which any of them are attached, will require an extra pay for these extra services? If so, will there be any economy in this mode of procedure? All that is to be wished for, is to have a confidential person employed, let his salary be what you please: if it is not worth fifteen hundred dollars per annum, let it be five hundred. But it would be better to have a prin-

[H. or R.]

Committee of Ways and Means.

cial to manage the business than to have it consigned to clerks in the other departments.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that something was necessary to be done with respect to the business brought forward by the honorable gentleman from Delaware. He conceived that an officer of the rolls, or some inferior officer, ought to be appointed to transact the business detailed in the resolution; he did not insist upon making a great department.

Mr. SPENCER agreed with the gentleman from New York; but, he thought, the business might be thrown into some other department, and save to the Union the expense of the one which the gentleman from Delaware wished to establish, by the name of the Home Department. He thought the resolution proposed altogether so improper, that he hoped the committee would rise.

A desultory conversation arose, whether the committee should decide upon the resolution or not; after which a question was taken on the rising of the committee, and decided in the negative.

Then the question was put on the first part of Mr. VINING's proposition, viz: "That an Executive Department ought to be established, to be denominated the Home Department;" and lost by a considerable majority.

It was then moved and seconded that the committee rise, which being agreed to, the committee rose and reported that they had, according to order, had the State of the Union under consideration, but had come to no resolution thereon.

A motion was then made by Mr. SPENCER, that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill supplementary to the act for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs, declaring that department to be hereafter denominated —, and that the principal officer in that department shall have the custody of the records and seal of the United States, and that such bill do contain a provision for the fees of office to be taken for copies of records, and further provision for the due publication of the acts of Congress, and such other matters relating to the premises, as the committee shall deem necessary to be reported to this House.

And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

Another petition from Baron de Glanbeck was presented and read, praying the attention of Congress to his former petition, to be compensated for certain losses and military services rendered during the late war.

Mr. PAOR, from the committee appointed for the purpose, made a further report on Andrew Ellicott's memorial, after which the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, July 24.

The engrossed bill allowing a compensation to the President and Vice President, was read the third time; when, on motion, it was committed to a Committee of the whole House: whereupon the House resolved itself into a committee on the bill, and made some amendments therein.

They then reported the bill with the amendments to the House, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GERRY presented a bill for registering and clearing vessels, ascertaining their tonnage, and for regulating the coasting trade, which was read a first time, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the select committee to whom was committed the bill for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States, reported, that the committee had, according to order, had the said bill under consideration, and made amendments thereto, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was again read twice, amended, and agreed to by the House, and ordered to be engrossed.

A petition from Nathaniel Gorham, of the State of Massachusetts, was presented and read, setting forth that Oliver Phelps, Esq., and the petitioner, are interested, by purchase from the State of Massachusetts, in certain lands which will be materially affected by the line directed to be run between the United States and the State of New York, and praying that such measures may be taken therein as shall be consistent with a due regard to the rights of the said Phelps and the petitioner.

Ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—The finances of America have frequently been mentioned in this House as being very inadequate to the demands. I have ever been of a different opinion, and do believe that the funds of this country, if properly drawn into operation, will be equal to every claim. The estimate of supplies necessary for the current year appears very great from a report on your table, and which report has found its way into the public newspapers. I said, on a former occasion, and I repeat it now, notwithstanding what is set forth in the estimate, that a revenue of three millions of dollars in specie, will enable us to provide every supply necessary to support the Government, and pay the interest and instalments on the foreign and domestic debt. If we wish to have more particular information on these points, we ought to appoint a Committee of Ways and Means, to whom, among other things, the estimate of supplies may be referred, and this ought to be done speedily, if we mean to do it this session.

Mr. GERRY said, the estimate reported by a committee was as accurate as possible. From this it appeared that eight millions of dollars would be necessary for the support of Government, for the interest and instalments becoming due, and for the arrears already due. He remarked, that we had been already dunned on this subject by foreigners, and that Congress would have to make provision for their payment. If three millions of dollars were employed to this use, it would only be carrying the arrears into another year; but, as they must be paid at last, he recommended making an immediate exertion, as a better way of giving satisfaction than procrastination would be. He thought it best to lay the real situation of this country before the House, and not endeavor to make things appear better than they really are.

With respect to the publication of the estimate in the papers, he knew nothing about it; he admitted that it was such a one as ought not to be published by order of Congress. He approved of the idea of appointing a Committee of Ways and Means, if it were only to ascertain what part of the interest on the debt should be paid, and what of the principal extinguished within the current year, from the funds already provided.

Mr. FITZSIMONS did not mean to reflect upon the committee who had reported the estimate, in any thing he had said; but he thought it of such a nature as to require it to be referred to a Committee of Ways and Means. He observed, that the arrears were due by several of the States on the former requisitions of Congress, and if these were paid up, the great demand might be satisfied. He doubted whether the whole arrangement of interest on the domestic debt would be expected to be provided for at the first session of Congress; but he was certain, that, in a little time, the Government would be able to discharge all their debt with such a degree of punctuality, as would give satisfaction to every individual creditor.

A Committee of Ways and Means was then appointed, consisting of Messrs. FITZSIMONS, VINING, LIVERMORE, CADWALADER, LAWRENCE, WADSWORTH, JACKSON, SMITH, (of Maryland,) SMITH, (of South Carolina,) and MADISON, to whom it was referred to consider the report of a committee appointed to prepare an estimate of supplies requisite for the services of the United States for the current year, and to report thereon. The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, July 27.

The engrossed bill for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, was read the third time, and the blanks being filled, the bill passed.

JOINT RULES FOR ENROLMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the report of a Committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate, in preparing joint rules to be established between the two Houses for the enrolment, attestation, publication, and preservation of the acts of Congress, and to regulate the mode of presenting addresses and other acts to the President of the United States, Mr. BOWDWIN in the Chair.

After some time the committee rose, and reported, that they had had the said report under consideration, and gone through the same, and come to several resolutions thereupon, which were delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the following ought to be established joint rules between the two Houses, to wit:

That while the bills are on their passage between the two Houses, they shall be on paper, and under the signature of the Secretary or the Clerk of each House respectively.

After a bill shall have passed both Houses, it shall be duly enrolled on parchment by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House, before it shall be presented to the President of the United States.

When bills are enrolled, they shall be presented by a joint committee of one from the Senate, and two from the House of Representatives, appointed as a standing committee for that purpose, who shall carefully compare the enrolled with the engrossed bills, as proposed in the two Houses, and correcting any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report forthwith to the respective Houses.

After examination and report, each bill shall be signed in the respective Houses, first by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and then by the President of the Senate.

After a bill shall thus have been signed in each House, it shall be presented, by the said committee, to the President of the United States for his approbation, it being first endorsed on the back of the roll, certifying in which House the same originated; which endorsement shall be signed by the secretary, or clerk, (as the case may be,) of the House in which the same did originate, and shall be entered on the journals of each House. The said committee shall report the day of presentation to the President, which time shall be also carefully entered on the journals of each House.

All orders, resolutions, and votes, which are to be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation, shall also, in the same manner, be previously enrolled, examined, and signed; and shall be presented in the same manner, and by the same committee, as provided in case of bills.

That when the Senate and House of Representatives shall judge it proper to make a joint address to the President, it shall be presented to him in his audience chamber, by the President of the Senate, and in the presence of the Speaker and both Houses.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that a committee ought to be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills, to provide, without the establishment of a new department, for the safe keeping of the accounts, records, and seal of the United States; for the authentication of records and papers; for establishing the fees of office to be taken for commissions, and for copies of records and papers; for making out and recording commissions, and prescribing their form; and to provide for the due publication of the acts of Congress.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed, pursuant to the second resolution, and that Messrs. SPENCER, MATTHEWS, and WYNKOOP, be of the said committee.

TUESDAY, July 28.

Mr. VINING, from the committee to whom it was referred to take the subject of amendments to the Constitution generally into their consideration, and to report thereon, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Registering Vessels.

[August, 1789.]

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they had passed the bill to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States, with several amendments, to which they desired the concurrence of the House.

The House immediately took said amendments into consideration, and concurred therewith.

The petitions of the Baron de Glaubek, heretofore laid on the table, were referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. PAGE, SUMNER, and HEISTER.

The bill for registering and clearing vessels, and for regulating the coasting trade, was read a second time; and, on motion, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon it. Mr. BOUNDINOT in the Chair; and, after making some progress in its consideration, rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, July 29.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BOUNDINOT in the Chair, on the bill for registering and clearing vessels, and for regulating the coasting trade; and agreed to some amendments thereto; but not having got through the same, rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, July 30.

Mr. LIVERMORE introduced a resolution to supply each member, at the public expense, with two newspapers of the city, daily, such as he should choose. Ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed the bill for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States, without amendment.

REGISTERING VESSELS.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for registering and clearing vessels, and for regulating the coasting trade; and having gone through it, reported the bill with the proposed amendments. The House agreed to some of the amendments, negatived others, and made some additional ones. The House adjourned before the discussion on the bill was closed.

FRIDAY, July 31.

Mr. PAGE, from the committee to whom the petitions of the Baron de Glaubek were referred, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCOTT, from the committee appointed for the purpose, brought in a bill for establishing a Land Office for the Western Territory, which was read and laid on the table.

On motion,
Resolved, That a standing committee be appointed to examine the enrolled bills, and to present the same to the President for his approbation and signature.

Messrs. WHITE and PARTRIDGE were accordingly appointed.

Mr. WAITE, of the committee appointed to examine into the measures taken by Congress and the State of Virginia, respecting the lands reserved for the use of the officers and soldiers of said State, &c., brought in a report, which was read and laid on the table.

The House then resumed the consideration of the amendments agreed upon in Committee of the Whole, to the bill for registering and clearing vessels; which being finished, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed the bill for establishing the Treasury Department, with amendments; to which they desired the concurrence of the House.

Mr. SPENCER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, brought in a bill to provide for the safe keeping of the acts, records, and great seal of the United States, for the publication, preservation, and authentication of the acts of Congress, &c.; which was read and laid on the table.

MONDAY, August 3.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed the bill for the establishment of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, with several amendments; to which they desired the concurrence of this House.

The amendments of the Senate were immediately considered and agreed to.

The engrossed bill for regulating the coasting trade was read a third time; and, on motion, re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, to be taken up to-morrow.

The bill for establishing a Land Office for the Western Territory was read a second time, and made the order of the day for Thursday.

The bill to provide for the safe keeping of the acts, records, great seal, &c., was read, and made the order of the day for Friday.

The report of the committee on amendments to the Constitution was, on motion of Mr. MADISON, made the order of the day for Wednesday sennight.

Mr. BENSON made a motion as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join with a committee of the Senate to be appointed for the purpose, to consider and report when it will be convenient and proper that an adjournment of the present session of Congress should take place; and to consider and report such business now before Congress, necessary to be finished before the adjournment, and such as may be conveniently postponed to the next session; and also to consider and report such matters not now before Congress, but which will be necessary should be considered and determined by Congress before an adjournment.

The bill for establishing the Treasury Department, with the amendments proposed by the Senate, being read, were acceded to in part; the consideration of two articles was postponed till to-morrow.

Compensation of Members.

[H. OF R.]

The bill for allowing compensation for their services to the President and Vice President of the United States was taken up; and, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, a clause was added to the bill, by which the President is to have the use of the furniture and other effects now in his possession, belonging to the United States.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, August 4.

A petition of sundry freeholders of the county of Cumberland, in the State of Pennsylvania, whose names were thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House, and read, praying that the District and Circuit Judicial Courts of the United States, to be established in the said State, may be fixed in some central place therein, convenient to the citizens thereof at large.

Also, a petition of Christopher Collis, of the city of New York, praying that an exclusive privilege may be granted him in the benefits of an invention which he has reduced to practice, for counting, with the utmost precision, the number of revolutions or vibrations of any wheel, or other part of any mechanical engine or machine.

An engrossed bill for making compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States, was read the third time and passed, and sent to the Senate for their concurrence.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. BURKE, from the committee appointed for the purpose, brought in a bill for allowing a compensation to the members of both Houses, and to their respective officers.

This bill provides that the compensation shall be as follows, viz:

To each member of the Senate and House, six dollars per day.

Speaker of the House twelve dollars per day.

To the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House, each fifteen hundred dollars a year, and two dollars a day each during the session of the Legislature; one principal clerk to each, at three dollars a day during the session; one engrossing clerk to each, at two dollars a day during the session.

Sergeant-at-Arms, three dollars a day during the session.

Doorkeeper to the House and Senate, each seven hundred and thirty dollars a year.

Assistant Doorkeepers, during the session, one dollar and fifty cents a day each. This bill was laid on the table.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the bill for registering and clearing vessels, and regulating the coasting trade. After some time being spent therein, and going through the bill—

The Chairman reported that the committee had had, according to order, the said bill under consideration, and gone through the same, and had made several amendments thereto, which he delivered at the Clerk's table, where the same were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Mr. BENSON's motion of yesterday, respecting the adjournment, was agreed to by the House, and a committee appointed for the purpose, consisting of Messrs. WADSWORTH, CARROLL, and HARTLEY.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill to establish the Treasury Department. Whereupon—

Resolved, That this House doth agree to so much of the eighth amendment as proposes to strike out these words in the seventh clause of the bill, to wit: "The assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury shall be appointed by the President;" and doth disagree to such other part of said amendment as proposes to strike out the residue of the clause.

After which, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, August 5.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they had passed an act to establish an Executive department, to be denominated the Department of War, with several amendments, to which they desired the concurrence of the House. That they have also passed the bill to provide for the government of the territory north-west of the river Ohio, with several amendments, to which they desired the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments to the said bills, and they were severally agreed to.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to establish the salaries of the Executive Officers of the Government, with their assistants and clerks.

Whereupon Messrs. FITZSIMONS, LAWRENCE, and GAFFIN were appointed.

An engrossed bill for registering and clearing vessels was read a third time, and passed, and sent to the Senate for their concurrence.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses, Mr. BOUNDINOT in the Chair.

Mr. GOODHUE moved to strike out six dollars, as the pay of each member per diem.

Mr. CARROLL inquired if it was not out of order to alter principles, after they had been settled by the House?

Mr. PAGE wanted to know whether the gentleman meant to increase or diminish the sum, for he presumed it was not intended to be left a blank altogether; but he hoped the House would do neither. It had been settled, after mature deliberation, at six dollars; the House certainly thought that sum enough, and if it was more, that it would be too much; he was satisfied with this determination, and would adhere to it. Perhaps the gentleman meant to strike out the six dollars, in order to make a discrimination between the members of this House and the Senate; if so, he had better move to increase the compensation of the Senators, and here he would second him, because he thought their services required more.

He would once more mention his fears relative to a small sum. He dreaded the abuse of economy, and was suspicious that a parsimonious provision would throw the Government into the hands of bad men, by which the people might lose every thing they now held dear. He thought few would serve for a smaller sum than he would, and he was confident the allowance was as moderate as any man could expect. Gentlemen who come a great distance, are put to considerable expense, and their domestic arrangements destroyed: instead of laying up money by their attendance here, it was almost certain they would spend part of their private estates.

If it is meant that the Republic should be provided with good and wholesome laws, a proper provision should be made to bring into the councils of the Union such men as are qualified to secure them well; it is not to be expected that the spirit of patriotism will lead a man into the perpetual habit of making such exertions and sacrifices as are too often necessary in the hour of danger. No man ought to be called into the services of his country, and receive less than will defray the expenses he incurs by performing his duty. If he does, the public affairs, in the time of tranquillity, will get exclusively into the hands of nabobs and aspiring men, who will lay the foundation of aristocracy, and reduce their equals to the capacity of menial servants or slaves.

Mr. SEDGWICK seconded the motion for striking out. He had endeavored to view this subject impartially, uninfluenced by any local considerations or circumstances; and under these impressions, he was led to believe, from all the information he had received, whether from abroad, or from an examination in his own mind, of the effects it would produce, that it would be expedient to establish the compensation at a lower sum. He really did not see any solid ground for the apprehensions which his worthy friend from Virginia (Mr. PAGE) had discovered; he had heard it often said, that if salaries and allowances to public officers were small, you would not be able to command the services of good men; but it was contradicted by the fact. He would instance the late appointments, and ask gentlemen, whether they conceived better men could have been procured, if the compensation had been doubled? If it was fair to reason by experience and analogy, he should conclude there would be no difficulty in procuring good and respectable men, to serve in this House, at a less rate than six dollars per day. He had never yet observed that men of small property shrunk from the expense of serving in the councils of their country.

He thought the practice of the States was opposed to so high a compensation; many of the State Legislatures allowed their members a dollar and ten shillings a day, and yet they were served by good men.

He had been informed that it was thought by men of sense and intelligence, that although six dollars might not be too great an allowance for the services of the members of this House, yet, considering the present circumstances of the people, it would be good policy to reduce the same. He inclined to this opinion himself.

Impressed with these ideas, and knowing that it was generally the opinion of the people, that six dollars was more than a moderate compensation to the members of this House, he should support the motion for striking out with a view to reduce the sum.

Mr. VINING said, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CARROLL) had taken the subject up in a proper point of view, by inquiring into the point of order. He begged gentlemen to consider the manner in which the subject had been discussed already—twice in the House, and twice in committee; every decision had been the same; why should the point so often determined, be again agitated? It is contrary to all Parliamentary proceeding, and the House will never know when principles are settled.

He was certain that six dollars was but a moderate compensation, if a member is to reside at the metropolis of the United States. He would admit that they could live for less, in some more central part of the country; but the gentlemen from the Eastward should recollect that a small allowance would be an argument for removing Congress from this city, and when that time arrived, he should consent to a lower sum, but not till then.

Mr. FITZSIMONS did not expect to hear the subject discussed again; he thought it unnecessary, because he believed every gentleman would decide more upon his own feelings, than upon the arguments that could be adduced; he would however just remind the committee, that six dollars was about the average of what the members from the several States had under the late Confederation.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—According to the observation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it will be deemed insolent to reason on this subject: what I offered before, I brought forward with candor; but shall we be precluded from debate, because a subject has been once discussed? Sir, when I moved, some days ago, to reduce the pay of the members to five dollars, I was rather indifferent about it; but since then, I have been so well convinced of the necessity there is for such a measure, that I cannot decline pressing it once more upon the committee.

Mr. STONE thought the public mind would not be much influenced by the trifling difference between five and six dollars. They pay greater regard to the decisions of the House, on more important subjects. The gentleman from Massachusetts says his correspondents inform him, that the public mind is agitated on this subject; if we are to judge what is the state of the public mind from what our friends say, I should be apt to think the public mind quite unconcerned on the present question; for, among all my correspondents, not one has deigned to notice it.

The question was now taken on striking out, and there appeared sixteen in favor of it, and thirty-five against it: so the motion passed in the negative.

Mr. MADISON renewed the motion for making a difference in the pay of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives; which was also lost.

Mr. GOODHUE moved to strike out twelve dollars, the pay assigned the Speaker, and insert ten.

Mr. PAGE hoped this motion would share the fate of the two last; he was certain that twelve dollars was not more than a compensation for the Speaker's services; three times the sum would not induce him to accept such a situation.

Mr. BURKE was against the motion, because he thought that twelve dollars was not a reward for the Speaker's labor. The Speaker of the House of Commons in England, has an annual salary of £8,000 sterling.

Mr. CARROLL thought the Chair of the House of Representatives was one of the most important and dignified offices under the Government, and as such ought to be provided for.

This motion was lost by a large majority. The committee rose and reported progress.

THURSDAY, August 6.

CONGRESS LIBRARY.

Mr. GERRY moved that a committee be appointed to report a catalogue of books necessary for the use of Congress, with an estimate of the expense, and the best mode of procuring them. Ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that they insisted on the amendment to the Treasury bill, respecting the removability of the Secretary by the President. Also, that they had agreed to the resolution of the House, for appointing a committee to report what business ought to be finished previous to the adjournment, and appointed Messrs. STRONG, ELLSWORTH, and CARROLL, on their part.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for allowing a compensation to the members of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the committee rose, and reported the bill as amended: then the House proceeded to consider the same.

Mr. THATCHER moved to insert five dollars instead of six, as the pay of the members.

Mr. PARTRIDGE observed, that money was more valuable now than it had been for some years past; if, therefore, six dollars was the average of what the delegates received heretofore, five dollars was now equal to that sum. In short, he was convinced that six dollars was too much, and, in justice to his constituents, and his own conscience, he would vote against it, and perpetuate his vote by calling the yeas and nays upon the question.

Mr. GERRY.—I was not present when the subject was last before the House, therefore, I cannot say what was understood on this point; but I have seen some account of the debate in the papers, from which I am led to believe, that gentlemen view this matter in a very narrow point of light. It appears to me a question in which one's popularity is more concerned than any thing else. Gentlemen, perhaps, suppose that by voting for five instead of six dollars they will establish such a character for economy and patriotism as will redound to their honor; but I can easily conceive, that men of knowledge and sentiment, yet, our constituents in general, will discover, in a glaring light, the ruinous consequences of such a measure in a very short period. The difference of pay, as it now stands in the bill, and what my colleague has moved for, is one dollar a day, and on this important question the yeas and nays are to be called. For my part, I shall deliver my sentiments freely; I am willing to leave the question to the people to decide; I care not about the pay, and can assure them I never wish to have a seat in this House again: but I wish to guard against the subversion of the public liberty—against the introduction of pensions—against exposing the Legislature to corruption.

I would have gentlemen consider the principles upon which they are to pay the President, says, Judges, and themselves; the Constitution says, the members of this House; and the Senate, shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The President shall receive, at stated times, a compensation for his services, neither to be increased nor diminished; the Judges shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation in office; hence it appears, that the provision for the three branches is to be made on the same principle, namely, a compensation for their services. Now, though it is certainly a little embarrassing that we should have to estimate the value of our own services, yet we are bound to do it, and that upon a fixed principle. It has been said, that the Parliament of Britain receive no pay. This may be the case, but if they examine back, they will find that pay, of a mark per day, was regularly established for them. If we consider the difference of the value of money two or three centuries ago, we shall find this no inconsiderable allowance. But the policy of the British ministry has been, of late, to extend the influence of the Crown; the pay of members has dropped into disuse; but every one knows by what means a majority in Parliament is obtained and secured. Now, such is the extent of these means, that I venture to say, two important members of the House of Commons receive more per annum than the whole compensation given to the members of both Houses of Congress. I leave it to the world to judge, whether the people are likely to be better served by men who receive their wages of the Monarch, and who own themselves the servants of the Crown, or by those who are immediately paid by and dependent upon themselves. While Britain had funds enough to support this plan, they did tolerably well; but when the evil extended itself, and they feared they could no longer continue it without having recourse to other means, they bethought themselves of unconstitutional ones; they were desirous of obtaining a revenue out of this country, and placing upon our establishment men whom they could not provide for at home. This cause lost them America, and this cause will lose them every dependency, where they attempt to play the like game.

[H. or R.]

Compensation of Members.

[August, 1789.]

From this view, the importance of an independent Legislature may be seen. Will gentlemen then say, that to gratify a thoughtless regard for economy, they will risk the most invaluable part of the Government? If gentlemen say it is justice to their constituents, I am willing to appeal to their tribunal; let them know the reason upon which we act, and I will abide by their decision; but I am against being influenced by an apprehension that the people will disprove our conduct. I am not afraid of being left out, even if it were thought a disgrace to be left out. I would risk that disgrace rather than agree to an establishment which I am convinced would end in the ruin of the liberties of my fellow-citizens. It would give my heart more satisfaction to fall the victim of popular resentment, than to establish my popularity at the expense of their dearest interest.

As I mentioned before, the principle upon which we fix our own pay must go through the other branches of the Government. Your President ought to be retrenched to 16 or 18,000 dollars; your Judges must be kept poor; and I leave gentlemen to consider the happy consequences arising from a dependent and corrupt Judiciary. Your Legislature may be corrupt, and your Executive aspiring; but a firm, independent Judiciary will stop the course of devastation, at least it will shield individuals from rapine and injustice; but remove this security, and tyranny and oppression will rush forward as a flood, and overwhelm the country.

It has been said, that the proposed compensation bears no proportion to the pay of the members of the State Legislatures; let me ask, do members of the State Legislatures forego their business? Do they leave their State and relinquish their occupations? Does the lawyer neglect his client? Does the merchant forego his commerce, or the farmer his agriculture? No, sir, the short period they are in session, and the opportunity of being in the vicinity affords them of going home, even during their sitting, enables them to pursue their other avocations, while performing their duties in the Legislature. But are not gentlemen who come from the most distant parts of the Union, compelled to relinquish every thing to attend here? The representation from the States is so small, that a member can be spared at any time; his absence must give him pain, when even that absence is necessary, but cannot be often allowed. In short, I would have the allowance such, as to secure the services of men of abilities in every rank of life; or if that cannot be obtained, I would have all that part of the bill struck out, which relates to a compensation for the services of the members of this House.
